ſling from the middle part had two cords of an unequal ſize: now when as the ſlinger ſwung it about, as it lay even poiſed in the greater capacity of the leather thong out flew the dart and was driven with violence like a bullet. Many of the ſouldiers being very ſore wounded as well with this weapon as all other ſorts of ſhot, ſo as now for wearines they were not able to bear their own armour: the King was earneſtly in hand with them to yeeld and ſubmit, aſſuring them upon his faithful word their lives, yea and otherwhiles promiſed them rewards and recompences. But there was not a man whoſe heart enclined once thereto. Now as they ſtood thus ſtiff and reſolut to die there ſhone upon them a little comfort and ſome hope of evaſion beyond all their expectation. For certain of the forragers and corn purveiors, who hapned to flie for refuge unto the camp, brought word unto the Conſul, that the corps de guard aforeſaid was beſieged round: wher- L upon being moved with the jeopardy wherein ſo many citizens ſtood (for about 900 they were, and all citizens of Rome) he went forth of the camp with the cavalry and light armed ſouldiers, and unto them joyned certain new ſuccours of the Numidians as well horſe as foot, together with the Elephants: and gave commandment to the martial Colonels, that the enſigns of the legions ſhould follow after. Himſelf in perſon marched before toward the hill aforeſaid taking with him a certain number of skirmiſhers, for to ſtrengthen the light armed auxiliaries. Eumenes Attalus, and Maſagenes alſo the King of the Numidians, flanked the Conſ. on either ſide. When as the beſieged Romans had a ſight once of the formoſt enſigns of their friends and fellows, they took comfort and courage again upon their former extream deſpair. Perſeus, who had purpoſed in the firſt place not to ſpend any long time in laying ſiege to this corps de guard but to content himſelf with M the fortunat ſucceſs which at a venture hapned, in that he had taken and ſlain ſome of the forragers: ſecondly (when he was in ſome ſort entred into that action) to depart (whiles he had means thereof) without any damage received, as knowing that he had no ſtrength, to ſpeak of, about him: yet puffed up and caried as it were above the ground with the conceit of his late good hand, both ſtaid in perſon to attend the enemies coming, and alſo ſent out in all haſt for the [Macedonian] Phalanx. Which coming later than the preſent neceſſity required (albeit in great haſt they hurried) it fell out ſo, that they were to encounter (troubled and diſordred as they were in running) their enemies that were well appointed and provided aforehand. And the Coſ. who had prevented them preſently welcomed them with battail. At the firſt, the Macedonians made reſiſtance; but afterwards being in no reſpect equal unto the enemies after they had loſt three hun- N dred footmen with four and twenty of the moſt forward and braveſt horſemen out of that cornet which they call Sacra (amongſt whom Antimachus alſo their leader died) they endeavoured to retire and be gone. But the way by which they were to paſs, was more troubleſome to ſpeak of, than the skirmiſh and battail it ſelf. The Phalanx being ſent unto by a meſſenger in haſt, and conducted as haſtily, encountred affront in a certain ſtreight a troop of priſoners, and likewiſe the waggons charged with corn. Who being laid at to give way, thereupon aroſe a great trouble as well of the one part as the other; whiles no man took heed how to march in order: but the armed ſouldiers caſt down and overthrew the heaps of fardage and baggage. for otherwiſe there could no way be made: and the draught-beaſts being pricked and provoked forward, raged and made foul work in the preſs and throng. Hardly and with much ado were they diſengaged and O rid of this confuſed and diſordered company of captives, when they met with the King his company and the horſemen diſcomfited. In which place, the noiſe which they made crying unto the Phalanx. Back again Back again made a fright among them as if there had been ſomething ready to fall upon their heads: in ſuch ſort as if their enemies durſt have entred into the ſtreight and purſued farther after them, no doubt they had received a great overthrow. But the Conſul contenting himſelf with a mean good hand, in that he had reſcued and recovered his corps de guard from off

A the hill, retired with his forces into the camp. Some write that there was a great battail fought that day, and how 8000 enemies were ſlain; and among them Sopater and Antipater two of the Kings Captains. Alſo that there were taken priſoners about 2400: and military enſigns 27 caried away. Neither was the victory eaſily gotten but coſt blood, for not ſo few as 4300 were ſlain of the Conſul his army, and five guidons of the left wing loſt. This journey recomforted the Romans, but danted and quailed Perſeus in ſuch ſort, as after he had ſtaid a few daies at Mopſelum, eſpecially about enterring the bodies of his dead ſouldiers, and left a ſufficient garriſon at Gonnos, he retired his army into Macedony, leaving alſo at Phila one of his own Captains named Timotheus, with ſome ſmall forces, whom he commanded to aſſay the Magneſians and the borderers adjoyning. When he was come to Pella, he diſmiſſed his army out of the field, and ſent them to their
B wintring harbors, but himſelf together with King Cotys went to Theſſalonica.

Thither news came, that Atlesbius a petty King of the Thracians, and Corragus a Captain under King Eumenes, had invaded the marches of Cotys, and were maſters of the country which they call Marene. And therefore ſuppoſing that he muſt needs diſcharge Cotys to look to the defence of his own realm, he beſtowed rich preſents upon him at his departure: and gave him 200 talents for ſix months wages of his cavalry, whereas at the beginning he purpoſed to be at the charge of a whole years pay.

The Conſul after he heard that Perſeus was gone, approached with his army neer to Gonnos, and there lodged; if haply he might force and gain that alſo. Situat it was over againſt Tempe, at the very mouth and gullet of the ſtreights, and is the very frontier Town yeelding both a moſt aſſured
C defence and ſtrength to all Macedony, and alſo a commodious paſſage for the Macedonians to enter into Theſſaly. And being a place impregnable, as well for the naturall ſite thereof, as the ſtrong garriſon therein planted, he gave over the enterpriſe. So turning and bending his way into Perrhæbia, after he had forced Mallæa at the firſt aſſault and put it to the ranſack; and received Tripolis with the reſt of Perrhæbia, yeelded by compoſition, he returned to Lariſſa. And then having ſent Eumenes and Attalus home into their own country, and beſtowed Maſſagenes and the Numidians in divers Cities of Theſſaly neer at hand to remain there for the winter time, and diſtributed part of his forces throughout all Theſſaly, in ſuch ſort, that not only they had all commodious wintring, but alſo ſerved in ſtead of garriſons to the Cities. Q. Mutius his Lieutenant he ſent with a regiment of 2000 men to guard Ambracia and keep it in obedience. All the confederats of the D Greek Cities, ſave only the Achæans he licenſed to depart. With one part of his army he went into Theſſaly in Phthia, where he raſed down to the ground Pteleum, abandoned of the inhabitants. But Antrona he won with the good will of the Townſmen. Then afterward he approached before Lariſſa with his forces. The City was left deſolat, for all the people were retired into the forteſs, the which he began to aſſault: and firſt the Kings garriſon of Macedonians quit the place: of whom the Townſmen being forſaken and left to themſelves, ſubmitted incontinently. Then he ſtood in doubt whether he ſhould aſſail Demetrias firſt, or have an eye and look into the troubles and ſtate of Bœotia. For the men of Thebes being grievouſly moleſted and annoied by thoſe of Coronæa, had ſent for him into Bœotia: at whoſe praiers, thither he conducted his army; and beſides, Bœotia was a country more commodious to winter in than Magneſia.

The three and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

THe ſame ſummer, wherein the Romans wan the victory with horſe-fight in Theſſaly, the Lieutenant being ſent into Illyricum from the Conſul, compelled by force and arms two rich Towns to yeeld; unto which nevertheleſs he gave all their goods again, to the end that by an opinion of this clemency, he might win the hearts of the inhabitants of Carnus, that ſtrong City. But when he ſaw that he could not conſtrain them to render, no more than force them by ſiege; becauſe his ſouldiers ſhould not ſeem to have been wearied for nought in the beſieging of two Towns, he fell to rifle and ranſack that, which before he left untouched. The other Conſul C. Caſſius neither performed any memorable exploit in Gaul, which was his Province by lot; and having endeavoured to conduct his legions through Illyricum into Macedony, all his deſignment came to no effect at all. That the Conſul was entred upon this journey, the Senat was certified by the Embaſſadors of the Aquileians: who complained that their colony newly erected was feeble, and not as yet well ſecured among thoſe fierce nations of Iſtrians and Illyrians: and withal they made ſuit, that the Senat would provide and take order, that the ſaid colony might be fortified: and when the queſtion was put unto them, Whether they would be content that commiſſion ſhould be directed unto C. Caſſius in that behalf? they anſwered, That the ſaid Caſſius, having aſſembled his army at the Rendez vous in Aquileia, was departed through Sclavonia into Macedony. This at firſt was thought incredible, and every man ſuppoſed verily, that he had been gone to levy war, upon the Carnians haply or the Iſtrians. The Aquileians were able to reply no farther, nor affirm more upon their knowledge than this, That allowance of corn was made for the ſouldiers to ſerve thirty daies, and that guids were ſought and brought out, who knew the waies out of Italy into Macedony. Hereat the Senate (ye may be ſure) took great ſnuff and was highly diſpleaſed, that the Conſul ſhould be ſo hardy as preſume to leave his own provin.e for to paſs into that which belonged to another, and to lead his army an unknown and new way, and the ſame dangerous, through ſtrange and forrain countries, thereby to open paſſage as it were, for ſo many nations to come into Italy. Whereupon in a frequent aſſembly of the Senators, there paſſed a decree, That C. Sulpitius the Pretor ſhould nominat three Embaſſadors out of the body of the Senat, for to depart out of the City that preſent day, to make all the haſt they poſſibly could to overtake the Conſul whereſoever he was, and to give him warning to levy no war againſt any nation without direct warrant from the Senat. And theſe Embaſſadors went, namely, M. Cornelius Cethegus, M. Fulvius, and P. Martius Rex. The preſent fear as touching the Conſul and the army, was the occaſion that the care of fortifying Aquileia was deferred for that time.

After this, were the Embaſſadors of certain States in both Provinces of Spain admitted to come into the Senat: who complained of the covetouſnes and pride of the Roman Officers and Governors among them; humbly beſeeching the Senat upon their knees, Not to ſuffer them (being allies and confederats) to be more ſhamefully pilled and ſpoiled than the very enemies. Among other indignities for which they ſhewed themſelves aggrieved, notorious it was, that the ſaid Magiſtrats had taken bribes, yea, and uſed extortion in wringing mony from them. Whereupon a commiſſion was granted to L. Canuleius the Pretor (unto whom Spain by lot was faln) to ordain five judges or commiſſioners (and thoſe out of the rank and degree of Senators) for every perſon of whom the Spaniards claimed to recover ſuch monies; and likewiſe to permit the plaintifs to take unto them what Advocats and Counſel they would. Then, after thoſe Embaſſadors were called again into the Senat, this decree and act of the Senat was read unto them, and willed they were to nominat their Advocats; who named four, to wit, M. Porcius Cato, P. Cornelius Scipio the ſon of Cnæus, L. Æmylius Paulus the ſon of Marcus, and C. Sulpitius Gallus. And firſt they took commiſſioners to proceed againſt M. Titinius, who had been Pretor in the hither Province of Spain, when Au. Manlius and M. Junius were Conſuls. Twice was the cauſe of the accuſed party adjourned to a farther time, but at the third ſeſſion he was quit and found unguilty. Then aroſe ſome variance and diſſention between the Embaſſadors of thoſe two Provinces. The States of this higher Spain, took for their patrons and Advocats, M. Cato and Scipio; they of the farther and lower Spain, made choice of L. Paulus and Gallus Sulpitius. They of high Spain convented before the delegate judges, P. Furius Philus; the other of the baſe Spain, M. Matienus. Philus had been L. Deputy there three years paſt, when Sp. Poſthumius and Q. Mutius were Conſuls; but this Matienus two years before, during the Conſulſhip of L. Poſthumius and M. Popilius. Charged they were both of them with right grievous matters and imputations, and a farther day granted of a final judgment: but when they were to anſwer judicially again, they made default, and for excuſe it was alledged, that they were both out of the country; and ſo they departed into voluntary exile, Furius to Præneſte, and Matienus to Tyber. The voice went, that the patrons of the plaintifs would not ſuffer them to follow proceſs ſtill againſt ſuch noble and great perſonages: and the ſuſpition hereof was more pregnant, by reaſon that Canuleius the Pretor let this matter fall, and began to take muſters and levy ſouldiers for the war; and ſo forthwith directly went into the Province, to the end that no more men ſhould be brought into queſtion and troubled by theſe Spaniards. By this means, all former matters paſt were buried in ſilence and no more ſpeech made of them; but for future time, the Senat took order and provided for the Spaniards ſo well, that they obtained an immunity, That no Roman Magiſtrate ſhould have power and authority to ſet the price upon any grain, nor force the Spaniards to ſell the Viceſimes at what rate he pleaſed to ſet down: alſo that there ſhould be no commiſſioners appointed within their Towns for the gathering and receiving of the revenues and mony iſſuing from thence. Beſides, there came another embaſſy of a ſort of people out of Spain, after a new and ſtrange manner: for there were above four hundred perſons, avouching themſelves the children of Roman ſouldiers and Spaniſh women not joyned in wedlock: who appeared before the Senat and beſought them, for

to

A to allow them a City to inhabit. Wherupon ordained it was, That they ſhould enter their names and be matriculated before their Pretor L. Canuleius: and look whomſoever of them he affranchiſed and made free, thoſe they thought meet to be ſent to Carteia neer the Sea ſide, and there planted: alſo that thoſe Carteians, who were willing ſtill to keep home and remain there, ſhould be priviledged as Coloners and ſo enrolled, and to enjoy beſides a portion of Lands aſſigned unto them. This was a Latine colony, and was called the Colony of the Libertins.

At the ſame time there came as Embaſſador out of Africk, Guluſſa the ſon of Maſaniſſa, and likewiſe the Carthaginian embaſſage. Guluſſa firſt was brought into the Senat; who declared what his father had ſent unto them againſt the Macedonian: promiſing withal, that if it pleaſed them to impoſe more upon him, he would be ready to perform the ſame in remembrance of the benefits
B received from the people of Rome: finally, he gave the LL. of the Senat a caveat by the way to take heed that the Carthaginians deceived them not in the end: for that reſolved they were, and went in hand to prepare a great navy, under pretence of ſending it to the Romans againſt the Macedonians; which if it were once ready rigged and furniſhed, it was in their choice then, to make whom they would either friends or foes. * * * * * * * * *

Being entred the camp and ſhewing the heads aloft, they ſtruck ſuch a fear, that if immediatly the army had come forward and advanced againſt them, the camp might have been won: and yet even then as it was, they fled amain: and ſome there were who gave their opinion, to ſend Embaſſadors to treat and with praiers to intreat for peace. Upon the news reported hereof, many Cities ſubmitted and were ſurrendred. Such as made excuſe, and laid the fault upon the folly of two
C perſons only, who had of their own accord offered themſelves to be puniſhed, obtained pardon of the Pretor. And then forthwith he went in expedition againſt other Cities; but finding them all ready to do whatſoever they were commanded, he paſſed quietly with his army through that countrey in peace, which but a while before was all up in arms and on a light fire. This lenity of the Pretor, which he uſed in taming and ſubduing this moſt fierce and proud nation without effuſion of blood, was by ſo much more acceptable to the LL. of the Senat and the whole body of the people, as the Conſul Licinius and the other Pretor Lucretius had warred in Greece with greater cruelty and avarice. As for Lucretius, the Tribuns of the Commons accuſed him daily in their ordinary Orations before the people for his abſence: Notwithſtanding his excuſe was alledged, that abſent he was, and employed about the affairs of the State. But in thoſe daies, ſo unknown were
D things done hard by, that even at that preſent he was at his farm within the territory of Antium, and buſy in conveighing a conduct of water out of the river Coracina to Antium: the charges whereof he defraied with the money raiſed out of the ſale of prizes taken from the enemies. Some ſay that he bargained to have that peece of work effected, for the ſum of a hundred and 13000 Aſſes. Moreover he embelliſhed and adorned the Temple of Æſculapius, with the painted tables found in the pillage. The envy and ill will, the obloquy alſo and diſhonor like to grow to Lucretius, turned upon his ſucceſſor Hortenſius, by occaſion of the Embaſſadors of Abdera, who in piteous wiſe complained with tears before the Senat, that their Town was by Hortenſius forced and ranſacked: How the cauſe of this ruin and deſtruction of their City was no more but this, that being enjoined by him to make paiment of a hundred thouſand Denarii, and allowance
E of fifty thouſand Modii of wheat, they requeſted ſome reſpit of time, wherein they might addreſs their Embaſſadors, as well to Hoſtilius the Conſul as unto Rome, concerning this impoſition. For ſcarcely were they come unto the ſaid Conſul, but they heard how their City was forced, the principal citizens thereof beheaded, and all the reſt ſold in port-ſale under the garland. Theſe were grievous indignities in the ſight of the Senat, whereupon they paſſed the ſame ordinance in the behalf of the Abderits, that the year before had been directed in the like caſe as touching the Coronæans; and commanded the Pretor Q. Manius to publiſh the ſaid decree before the publick aſſembly of the people. In like manner two Commiſſioners were ſent, namely C. Sempronius Bleſus, and S. Julius Cæſar for to re-eſtabliſh the Abderits in their freedom: who alſo had in charge to ſignify from them both to the Conſul Hoſtilius, and alſo to the Pretor Hortenſius, That
F the Senate judged the hoſtility offered unto the Abderits injurious, and the war unlawful, and therefore that all ſuch as were brought into ſervitude, ſhould be ſought out and reſtored again to liberty.

At the ſame time preſentation was made unto the Senat of certain complaints againſt C. Caſſius who had been Conſul the year before, and at that time was emploied in quality of a Colonel-marſhal together with A. Hoſtilius in Macedony. Likewiſe there arrived the Embaſſadors of Cincibilus a pety King of the Gauls. A brother of his having audience granted in the Senat made a ſpeech, wherein he complained, that C. Caſſius had given the waſt to the lands and territories of the people inhabiting the Alps who were their allies and confederats, and from thence had led away into captivity many thouſand perſons. And much at one inſtant there came the Embaſſadors
G of the Carnians, Iſtrians and Japides with complaints againſt Caſſius. That firſt he had enjoined them to furniſh him with guids for to ſhew and direct him the beſt way to march with his army into Macedony, and ſo departed in peace from them, as if he had meant to war elſe-where: but afterwards out of the midway of his journey, he returned upon them, and in hoſtile manner overran their frontiers, robbing, ſpoiling & burning wherſoever he went: and to this day they cannot deviſe and know the reaſon wherefore the Conſul ſhould hold them for enemies and deal ſo cruelly by them. As well the Prince of the Gauls aforſaid being abſent as theſe Embaſſadors in place received this anſwer, That as touching the outrages for which they ſhewed themſelves grieved, the Senat neither knew thereof beforehand, that ever they were intended, nor yet approved of the ſame, ſince they were committed. But againſt all right and equity it were to condemn unheard in his own defence, and abſent, ſuch a perſonage as he is, namely, a man who had been Conſul; conſidering alſo that his employment about the C.W. is the occaſion of his abſence. When C. Caſſius is once returned out of Macedony, then if they would ſhew themſelves and accuſe him face to face, the Senat would hear the cauſe and take knowledge accordingly, yea, and endeavour that they ſhould be ſatisfied and contented. Moreover, thought good it was, that theſe nations ſhould not be diſpatched only with this bare anſwer, but that Embaſſadors alſo ſhould be ſent: two unto the foreſaid King beyond the Alps: and other three to the people above named, for to acquaint them with the reſolution of the Lords of the Senat. And they gave order beſides to ſend preſents to each of the Embaſſadors to the value of two thouſand Aſſes over and above, to the two Princes that were brethren, theſe gifts following, to wit, two chains of gold weighing after they were wrought five pound of gold: alſo five peeces of plate in ſilver, amounting to the weight of twenty pound: two bard horſes with their riders and lackies: likewiſe horſemens armour and their caſſocks: and liveries likewiſe for all thoſe of their train, as well bond as free. Theſe were the things ſent unto them. But at their own requeſt granted it was beſides, that they might for their mony buy each of them ten horſes, and be allowed to tranſport them out of Italy. The Embaſſadors ſent with the Gauls beyond the mountains, were C. Lælius and M. Æmylius Lepidus: to the other nations C. Sicinius, P. Cornelius Blaſio, and T. Memmius.

Moreover, there met together in Rome at once, the Embaſſadors of many States both of Greece and Aſia. And firſt the Athenians were brought into the Senat, who related, That they had ſent unto the Conſul P. Licinius and the Pretor C. Lucretius, what ſhipping they had, and all the fighting men they were able to make: but ſeeing they had no uſe of them, they had raiſed a levy of a hundred thouſand Modii of corn. Which, albeit their land was but barren for tillage, and the very husbandmen themſelves lived of fortain corn brought in unto them, yet they had made means to do accordingly, becauſe they would not ſeem to be wanting in any dutiful ſervice: and willing they were yet, and preſt to perform whatſoever they would require. The Mileſians for their part ſaid, That hitherto they had done nothing, marry they offred themſelves to be ready to accompliſh all that the Senat ſhould command them toward this war. The Alabandians ſhewed, That they had built a * Temple to the City of Rome, and ordained beſides, that in the honour of that goddeſs there ſhould be a ſolemnity of games and plaies exhibited every year. Alſo, that they had brought with them for a preſent, a crown of gold weighing fifty pound, to ſet it up in the Capitol as a gift and offering to Iup. Opt. Max. and withal, three hundred horſmens ſhields, which they were minded to beſtow upon thoſe, unto whom it pleaſed them to appoint and command. Their petition was, that they might be permitted to offer their preſent in the Capitol, and there to ſacrifice. The men of Lampſacus came with a golden crown weighing fourſcore pound, proteſting, That they had quit and abandoned Perſeus, ſo ſoon as ever the Roman army was arrived in Macedony, notwithſtanding they owed allegeance unto Perſeus, and were homagers to his father Philip before him. In which conſideration, as alſo for that they had performed their devoir to their full power to the Roman Generals, they requeſted no other favour to be gratified withal, but to be received into the amity of the people of Rome: and in caſe there ſhould be peace concluded with Perſeus, that they might be excepted and exempted in the accord, for being reduced under his obedience. The reſt of the Embaſſadors had a gracious anſwer returned unto them. As for the Lampſacens, order was given to Q. Manius the Pretor, to enter and enrol them in the number of allies. Every one of theſe Embaſſadors were rewarded with a preſent worth two thouſand Aſſes. The Alabandians were appointed to carry back with them into Macedony their ſhields aforeſaid, and to deliver them unto A. Hoſtilius the Conſul. Over and beſides, the Carthaginian Embaſſadors out of Africk, made relation that they had brought from thence ten hundred thouſand Modii of wheat, and five hundred thouſand of barley, which they had on ſhipboard at the ſea-ſide, ready to cary the ſame whereſoever the Senat would appoint. This benevolence of theirs they accompanied with good words, ſaying, they knew well that this gift and recogniſance of their duty, was inferior either to their own good will, or the demerits of the people of Rome. Howbeit many times heretofore they had ſhewed themſelves to do the part of thankful, faithful, and truſty allies, in all things tending to the profit and good of both ſtates. In like ſort the Embaſſadors of Maſaniſſa promiſed the ſame proportion of corn, with 1200 horſe, and twelve Elephants, aſſuring them in his name, to do whatſoever the Senate would impoſe and ſhould be thought needful; and that with as free an heart as the benevolence offered of his own accord. Thanks being given both to the Carthaginians and alſo to the King, requeſted they were to tranſport over into Macedony to the Conſul A. Hoſtilius, thoſe things which they had promiſed. To the Embaſſadors were ſent by way of preſents, two thouſand Aſſes apeece. The Cretenſian Embaſſadors, related how they had ſent into Macedony ſuch a number of Archers, as the Conſul P. Licinius had impoſed upon them: and when they denied not upon the queſtion asked, that there ſerved more Archers of theirs under Perſeus than with the Romans, this anſwer was made unto them, That if the Cretenſians would well and truly and in good earneſt prefer the friendſhip of the people of Rome before that of King Perſeus, the Senat of Rome likewiſe would give them anſwer as certain and aſſured allies: in the mean while, they ſhould [illegible] to underſtand,

* Rome a goddeſs.

A ſtand, that it was the will and pleaſure of the Senat, that the Cretenſians ſhould with all ſpeed poſſible call home all thoſe ſouldiers whom they had in any garriſon of King Perſeus. The Candiots being diſmiſſed with this diſpatch, then the Chalcidians were called in: and at the very firſt ſight of them, it ſoon appeared upon what terms of neceſſity they were driven to ſend an embaſſage: when Miccion the chief man among them, by occaſion that he was lame with the gout in his feet, was brought into the Senat in a litter. In which extremity diſeaſed as he was, there was no pleading of any excuſe by his infirmity, nor craving pardon, ſince he was to go without, when he had all done. He began by way of preface and præamble, ſaying, "He had nothing left alive but his "tongue, for to deplore and bewail the calamities of his country: then he went forward, and firſt "ſhewed what courteſies and good turns the State wherin he lived had performed to the Captains
B "General and armies of the Romans, both of old, and alſo of late in the war againſt Perſeus. After "this, he declared what parts of pride, covetouſnes, and cruelty, firſt, C. Lucretius a Roman Pretor "had exerciſed upon his country-men, and afterwards what L. Hortenſius practiſed, at that time "above all others: alſo how the Chalcidians were reſolved to endure all calamities, were they "more grievous than thoſe which they preſently ſuffred rather than they would yeeld to Perſeus. "And as for Lucretius and Hortenſius, they knew full well, that it had been better and more for "their ſafety to have ſhut their gates againſt them, than to receive them into their City. For ſuch "as had excluded them forth, as namely, they of Emathia, Amphipolis, Maronea, and Ænus, remain "ſtill entire and in good eſtate; but with us (ſay they) the Temples have been robbed of all their "beautiful ornaments, and utterly ſpoiled by theſe ſacriledgers, C. Lucretius hath carried all away
C "by water over to Antium, and hath led away into bondage and captivity the perſons free born. "So as the goods and fortunes of the allies of the people of Rome, both have been and daily are pil-"led & rifled. For according to the uſe & faſhion brought up by C. Lucretius, Hortenſius likewiſe "houſeth his mariners as well in ſummer as winter, and our houſes are ful of a rabble of theſe ſailers "and ſea-men, in ſuch ſort as our wives and children be forced to converſe among ſuch grooms as "make no account at all what either they ſay or do. Hereupon thought good it was, to ſend for Lucretius into the Senat, that he might ſee his accuſer, anſwer face to face, and purge himſelf of theſe challenges. But when he was come in place, he heard much more in preſence, than had been ſpoken againſt him in his abſence. Over and beſides, there ſhewed themſelves and joined together againſt him, two other more ſtout adverſaries and bitter accuſers, to wit, M. Iuventius Talva and D Cn. Auſidius. And theſe two not only courſed him before the Senat, but alſo having drawn him perforce into the general aſſembly of the people, and charged him before them with many reproaches, took out proceſs alſo and arreſted him to make his appearance and anſwer judicially at a day before the people. Then Q. Manius the Pretor, by order from the Senat, anſwered the Chalcidians in this manner: Wheras ye alledge and ſay, That ye have well deſerved of the people of Rome both heretofore and alſo in this preſent war now in hand, the Senat knoweth all that to be true, and accepteth the ſame thankfully in the beſt part, as of right they ought. As touching your grievances and complaints for the lewd parts which C. Lucretius hath plaied, and which L. Hortenſius ſtill practiſeth (both Pretors of Rome) the ſame neither have been nor are committed and done by the will and allowance of the people of Rome. For who would not judge ſo of it, that knoweth how E they levyed war upon King Perſeus and his father Philip before him, for to enfranchiſe Greece and ſet it at liberty; and not that their allies and friends ſhould thus hardly be intreated by their Magiſtrats and Governors ſent from hence? Write therfore they would unto L. Hortenſius the Pretor, to let him underſtand, that the Senate is not well pleaſed with theſe pranks of his which the Chalcidians complain of. Alſo if any free-born perſons were become thrall and bound, that with all convenient ſpeed he ſhould take order to ſeek them up and reſtore them again to their former freedom. Laſt of all, that they deemed it meet and reaſon, that no ſailer or mariner, but only the maſters of ſhips ſhould be lodged and entertained in your houſes. And theſe were the contents of the letters written unto Hortenſius, by commandment from the Senate. Unto the Embaſſadors were gifts ſent, to every one aſmuch as came to 2000 Aſſes. As for Miccion, he was allowed his F carriage in chariots at the charges of the City, and order given that he ſhould with all eaſe ride in them to Brunduſium. As for C. Lucretius, when the day of appearance was come, the Tribuns commenſed an action againſt him before the people, to be a fined at a million of Aſſes. And in a generall aſſembly and Seſſion holden for this purpoſe, caſt he was and condemned by the ſuffrages of all the tribes, even thirty five and no fewer.

In Liguria no memorable exploit was that year performed: for neither the enemies entred into arms, nor the Conſul led his legions into their country; and when he was aſſured of peace for that year, he diſcharged the ſouldiers of two Roman legions, within 60 daies after his firſt coming into the Province. As for the army of the Latine allies, he brought it early into the Cities of Luna and Piſa there to winter: and then himſelf with the cavalry viſited moſt of the Cities in the G Province of Gaul.

In no place was there any war but in Macedony: howbeit they had in ſuſpition Gentius and the King of the Illyrians. Therefore the Senate ordained to ſend from Brunduſium eight ſhips ready rigged and fully furniſhed, unto the Lieutenant C. Furius at * Iſſa, who was Governor of the Iland with the guard and ſtrength of two Iſſean Veſſels; in which were put aboord and ſhipped 2000 ſouldiers, which Q. Manius the Pretor by a warrant directed out of the Senate, enrolled in that quarter of Italy which lieth oppoſite to Illyricum. In like manner the Conſul Hoſtilius ſent

* Liſſa.

Appius

Appius Claudius into Illyricum with four thouſand footmen, for to defend the people in thoſe H parts: who not content with thoſe forces of his own which he had brought with him thither, demanded here and there aids and ſuccours of the allies, until he had put in arms eight thouſand men of divers and ſundry nations. And after he had made his progreſs through all that region, he ſet him down and reſted at Lichnidum a City of the Daſſaretians. Not far from thence there ſtood a frontier Town called Uſcana, and for the moſt part ranged under the obedience of Perſeus. There were within it one thouſand citizens, and a ſmall garriſon of Cretenſians for their better ſafeguard and defence. From thence there came to Claudius ſecret courriers, advertiſing him, that if he would approach neerer with his army, there would be ſome ready at hand to betray the Town into his hands: and worth the adventure it was (ſay they) and would quit for all the pains: for able it was with pillage to enrich not himſelf and his friends only, but alſo all his ſouldiers. The I hope of this cheat, fitting ſo well his covetous humour, ſo blinded his ſpirit and underſtanding, that he had not the ſence to keep with him any one of thoſe courriers that came unto him, nor the wiſedom to demand hoſtages for aſſurance of his enterpriſe which was to be accompliſhed by ſtealth and fraud, nor yet the forecaſt to ſend out ſcouts and eſpies, or ſo much reaſon and mother-wit as to require their oath and bond of faithful promiſe. Only at the day appointed he departed from Lychnidum, and within twelve miles of that City toward which he went, he encamped.
Then by night at the relief of the fourth watch, he removed and ſet forward, leaving behind him a regiment of a thouſand, for the guard of the camp. At length, to the City they come, diſordered in a long train, marching nothing cloſe, but far aſunder looſly one from another and ſcattered, by reaſon that in the night ſeaſon they went many of them out of the way. This negligence of theirs K was the more, when they ſaw no man appearing upon the walls: but ſo ſoon as they were approached within a darts caſt, the inhabitants iſſued forth at once out of 2 gates and together with the ſhout of them that ſallied forth, a mighty noiſe and outcry beſides aroſe from the walls, of women howling, yelling, and ringing braſen baſons and bells on every hand; beſides, the confuſed multitude of the baſe people and bond-ſlaves together, ſet up moſt hideous and diſſonant cries.
Theſe manifold terrors preſented from all parts, were the cauſe that the Romans could not abide and ſtand out the firſt tempeſt and violent ſtorm, as it were, of their ſally and charge. Down they went therefore, and were ſlain more in flight than fight: and ſcarce 2000 men with the Lieutenant himſelf, eſcaped and recovered the camp: for the longer way they had thither, the more means and opportunity had the enemies to chaſe and overtake a great number of them, wearied L upon the way. Appius ſtayed not ſo long in the camp, until he had rallied thoſe that were diſper-ſed in the rout, (which had been the only way to have ſaved thoſe that were ſtragled in the fields) but immediatly retired with the broken reliques of his army after this overthrow, to Lychnidum.
This infelicity and ſuch other like misfortunes hapning in Macedony, were made known at Rome, by occaſion of Scx. Digitius a Colonel, who was returned home for to celebrate a ſolemn ſacrifice. In regard whereof, the LL. of the Senat fearing to receive ſome greater ignominy and diſhonour, addreſſed Embaſſadors into Macedony, M. Fulvius Flaccus and M. Caninius Rebulus, to make a true report upon their knowledg how the world went there. Alſo that A. Hoſtilius the Conſul ſhould publiſh the aſſembly general for the election of Conſuls, ſo as it might be holden in the month of January; and then repair himſelf with all convenient ſpeed to the City. In the mean time, M
M. Retius the Pretor had in charge, by vertue of an edict, to call home into the City all Senators from every quarter of Italy, unleſs ſuch as were abſent about the affairs of the ſtate: alſo to give ſtreight warning to them who now were at Rome, not to abſent themſelves farther than a mile from the City. Theſe things were done according to the advice of the Senat. So the grand aſſembly for the election of the Conſuls, was holden the * 28 day of Auguſt; wherein were created Conſuls, Q. Martius Philippus the ſecond time, and Q. Servilius Cæpio. Three daies after, the Pretors alſo were choſen, namely, Caius Decimius, M. Claudius Marcellus, M. Sulpitius Gallus, C. Martius Figulus, Ser. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Fonteius Capito. Unto theſe Pretors elect, beſides the two charges within the City of civil juriſdiction, theſe four provinces and governments were aſſigned, to wit, Spain, Sardinia, Sicily, and the admiralty of the navy. N

At the very end of February, the Embaſſadors aforſaid returned out of Macedony; who recounted the acts atchieved fortunatly by Perſeus the ſummer paſt, and in how great fear the allies of the people of Rome ſtood, after ſo many Cities reduced under the obeiſance of the King. Moreover, that the Conſul his army was diſfurniſhed of men, by reaſon that ſo many of them made friends to be diſcharged and ſo for favour had their paſs-port and were diſmiſſed: the fault herein, the Conſul laid upon the military Tribuns or Colonels, and they again upon him. The LL. of the Senat perceived well that they made but light of the ſhameful foil received by the inconſiderate raſhneſs of Claudius, in ſaying, That there were but very few ſouldiers loſt of the Italian nation, and thoſe for the moſt part taken up in haſt and enrolled on a ſuddain. The Conſuls elect ſo ſoon as they entred into their magiſtracy, were commanded to propound unto the Senat con- O cerning the Province of Macedony, and to them were aſſigned the governments of Italy and Mace-dony. This year was leap-year, and the third day after the feaſt * Terminalia, was the day inſerted between, which hapned upon the calends [of March.] Within the compaſs of that year certain Prieſts to wit, L. Flaminius, and two Pontifies or Biſhops, L. Furius Philus, and C. Livius Salina-tor, departed this life. The colledge of theſe Pontifies, elected T. Manlius Torquatus in ſtead of Furius, and Marcus Servilius in the room of Livius.

* Ad quintum calendas Septembris. I doubt, that for [Septembris] it ſhould be [Februarii.] and then is it the 28 of Ianuari: which conſidering the precedent meſſage and the ſubſequent circumſtances, ſuiteth better to the ſtory.

* To the God of Bounds, Terminus. Solemnized it was toward the end of February the laſt month of the year, as appeareth by Ovid. Faſt. 2. Qui ſequitur annum veteris fuit ultimus anni: Tu quoque ſacrorum, Termine, finis eras.

A In the beginning of the year next following, after that the new Coſſ. Q. Martius and Q. Servilius, had moved in the Senat as touching their provinces, adviſed it was, That with all ſpeed poſſible they ſhould either agree between themſelves, or elſe caſt lots for the governments in Italy and in Macedony. And before that the lots determined this matter ſo doubtful and uncertain, to the end that nothing afterwards ſhould be done for favour partially, thought good it was, to ordain before hand a competent and ſufficient number of ſouldiers for the ſupplement of the armies in both Provinces; namely, for Macedony 6000 footmen of Romans, and as many of Latine allies; 250 horſemen Romans, and 300 allies: alſo to caſs the old ſouldiers, ſo as in every Roman legion there ſhould not be above 6000 foot and 300 horſe. As for the other Conſul, he was not gaged with any certain ſtint of Roman citizens, to be levied for the full accompliſhment of his legions.
B Only this was determinatly ſet down, That he ſhould enrol two legions, and either of them to contain 5200 foot and 200 horſe: but for footmen of Latins, he had a greater number allowed than his colleague; namely, 10000 foot and 600 horſe. Moreover, commandment was given to enrol four legions more, to be led forth into the field, upon what need and occaſion ſoever ſhould fall out. The Marſhal-Colonels of the army the Conſuls might not be permitted to elect, but created they were by the people. The allies of the Latine nation were enjoined to ſet out ſixteen thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe. And this power was only to be in a readineſs at an hours warning, for to be led forth as occaſion ſhould be offered. Their principal care was about Macedony. Ordained alſo it was, That for the ſervice at Sea, there ſhould be enrolled to ſerve the navy, of the Roman citizens (ſuch as were libertins and newly enfranchiſed) out of all parts of C Italy one thouſand, and as many out of Sicily. And unto whether of the Conſuls the Province of Macedony fell, he ſhould give order for their tranſporting thither, to the armado whereſoever it was. For Spain there were three thouſand Roman footmen and three hundred horſemen appointed to make up the decaied bands. There alſo, a certain number was ſet down for every legion, to wit, five thouſand foot and three hundred and thirty horſe. Moreover, that Conſul whoſe lot was to govern in Spain, had commiſſion to levy of the allies four thouſand footmen, and three hundred horſe.

I am not ignorant, that from the ſame prophane negligence and irreligion, whereby commonly men now adaies are of belief, that the Gods portend and fore-ſignify nothing to come by ſigns and tokens; it proceedeth alſo, That no prodigies which happen, ſhould any more, either be pu-
D bliſhed and reported abroad, or recorded in the annals and chronicles. Howbeit, for mine own part, in writing of theſe acts and monuments of ancient times, I know not how, but me thinks I cary a mind, that is become (as it were) antique alſo; yea, and ſome ſcrupulous devotion ariſeth in my ſpirit, which moveth me to account the things not unworthy to have place in my hiſtories, which thoſe ſage fathers and moſt prudent perſonages in old time thought meet to be conſidered of by the State, yea, and to require publick expiation. Well, to proceed, from Anagnia were two fearful ſights reported that year, namely, That a burning and blazing flame was ſeen in the skie; and a cow known to ſpeak, kept and nouriſhed at the publick charges. At Minturne alſo much about thoſe daies, the welkin ſeemed to be on a light fire. At Reate there fell a ſhower that rained ſtones. In the fortreſs at Cumes the image of Apollo wept three daies and three nights continually. In the E City of Rome, two ſextons or keepers of the Temples made report, the one, That in the Church of Fortune there was a Serpent ſeen by many men, creſted with a mane: the other, That about the chappel of * Fortuna Primigenia, which ſtandeth upon the Capitol hill, there hapned two divers and different prodigious ſigns, namely, That in the Chappel-yard there ſprung up a palm-tree; and all one day it rained blood. Two other ſtrange things there were, whereof there was no regard nor account made; the firſt, becauſe it chanced in a privat place; for T. Martius Figulus reported That there grew up a palm or dare-tree in his court-yard: the ſecond, becauſe it hapned in a forrain place: for ſpoken it was, That at Fregellæ in the houſe of M. Atreus, a lance or ſpear which he had bought for his ſon a ſouldier, burned in the day time for two hours ſpace and more, yet ſo, as the fire conſumed nothing thereof. In regard of thoſe publick prodigies, the Decemvirs had recourſe
F to the books of Sibylla: who out of them declared, That the Conſuls ſhould ſacrifice forty head of greater beaſts, and they ſhewed alſo to what Gods. They added moreover and gave advice to hold a publick proceſſion, and that all the Magiſtrats at every ſhrine and upon every altar of the Gods ſhould ſacrifice greater beaſts, and the people wear garlands and chaplets of flowers. All things were executed accordingly, as the Decemvirs ſuggeſted and directed.

* Cum primogenita ſanguis when the wan good to the firſt born. Barth. Marlianus.

After this, the aſſembly was publiſhed for the chuſing of Cenſors. In election there were for this dignity of Cenſorſhip, the very principal perſons and of beſt note in all the City, C. Valerius Lævinus, L. Poſthumius Albinus, P. Mutius Scævola, C. Junius Brutus, C. Claudius Pulcher, and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus. Theſe two laſt rehearſed the people of Rome choſe for Cenſors. When as by occaſion of the Macedonian war, a greater care was had about the taking of muſters, than at other G times before, the Conſuls found much fault with the common people, and complained unto the Senat, that the yong and able men for ſervice being called, would not anſwer to their names. But C. Sulpitius and M. Claudius two Tribuns of the Commons, maintained the cauſe againſt them in the behalf of the Commons, ſaying, That it was no hard and difficult matter for Conſuls to levy ſouldiers: mary, for corrupt, affectionat and popular Conſuls, it was not ſo eaſy a thing, and namely, ſuch as would be ſure to enrol no ſouldiers againſt their wills. And to the end that the LL. of the Senate might know this to be a truth, they ſhould ſee the Pretors (if the Senate were so content, and thought well thereof) whose power of command, and authority of government was * less than the Consuls, to go through with the musters without empeachment. So that charge was committed to the Pretors with the great assent of the Senators, but not without some backbiting and detraction of the Consuls. And the Censors for to assist and set forward that affair, made it known, and protested in the full assembly of the people, that they would publish an act, as touching the review and estimat of every mans demeanour and hability, that besides the ordinary oath of all citizens, they should swear to these points in this form following: Art thou under six and forty years of age? then by vertue of the edict made by the Censors C. Claudius and Tib. Sempronius, come forth and shew thy self at the musters so often as there shall be any levy taken: and what Censors soever shall happen to be in place, thou shalt appear and be enrolled, in case thou wert not a prest souldier before. Moreover, because the voice went, that many souldiers of the Macedonian legions were absent from the army, and had obtained large pasports without limitation of return, and that through the corruption and favour of the Generals, they published an edict as touching the souldiers enrolled for Macedony, when P. Ælius and C. Popilius were Consuls, or any time after, That as many of them as remained within Italy, after they were enrolled and registred first under their hands, should within thirty daies repair again to their colours into the province: and whosoever of them were at the disposition of father or grandsire, their names should be presented and declared before them. Semblably, they would take knowledge of their causes who were clean dismissed and cassed: and look whomsoever they judged to have obtained their discharge by any special grace and favour, before they had served out their full time by law required, they would command them to be enrolled souldiers again. By vertue of this edict of the Censors, as also by their letters sent out and divulged abroad in all incorporat Towns and places of resort for market and merchandise, there assembled together and came to Rome such a multitude of lusty, yong, and able men, that their unusual and extraordinary number was chargeable and cumberous to the City. Thus besides the former levy taken of those that were to be sent and employed in supply of the old armies, four legions more were enrolled by C. Sulpitius the Pretor, and within eleven daies the musters were accomplished and ended.

Then the Consuls cast lots for their provinces. For the Pretors had their governments allotted unto them before, and the sooner, by reason of the civil causes which required their jurisdictions. The one over the citizens was faln to C. Sulpitius, the other over forrainers to C. Decimius. M. Claudius Marcellus obtained the regiment of Spain, Serg. Cornelius Lentulus of Sicily, P. Fonteius Capito ruled Sardinia, C. Martius Figulus had the conduct of the navy. And then, I say, to Q. Servilius one of the Consuls fell the government of Italy, and to Q. Martius the other of Macedony. This Martius so soon as the Latine feasts were solemnised, departed toward his province immediatly. After this, upon the motion of Capio to the Senat to know their pleasure, which two legions of the new he should conduct into Gaul? the LL. ordained, That the Pretors C. Sulpitius and M. Claudius should give unto the Consul, which it pleased them of those legions that they had enrolled. This he took to the heart, that he a Consul was thus subjected to the will of the Pretors; yet after the Senat was risen, he stood waiting at the Tribunal of the Pretors, and required them according to the order set down by the Senat, to assign him his two legions. But the Pretors submitted the choice thereof to the Consul himself. This done, the Censors took a review of the Senat and chose new Senators: and M. Æmylius Lepidus was elected president of the Senat; and these were the third Senators that made choice of him consequently one after another. Seven were displaced and deposed from their Senators dignity. Now in taking the number of the people, and in assessing them, they compelled to return into Macedony those who were departed from the army there: and by means of this assesment, they soon knew who were absent from their companies: they examined them for what causes they were discharged from souldery; and whose licence they judged not to be grounded of good and sufficient reason those they forced to take the military oath again in this manner and form: According to the edict of C. Claudius and Tib. Sempronius the Censors, thou shalt well and truly swear, to return willingly and with all thine heart, into the province of Macedony; and this shalt thou do to thy power without fraud or covin. In making the review of them that served on horseback, their censure was executed with great rigour and extremity. They took from many their horses of service: upon which occasion having given offence to the whole estate of Knights and Gentlemen of Rome, they blew the coals and kindled the fire of ill-will and heart-burning against themselves: by a certain edict of theirs besides, wherby they intimated, That none of them who in time that Q. Fulvius and Au. Posthumius the Censors had taken to farm the revenews, fruits and profits of the City, or undertaken at a price the publick works and provisions, should be so hardy as to present themselves to their spear set up, either to be farmers or undertakers, no, nor to be partners, or have any thing to do with those that were in such negotiation, commerce and bargain. The old Publicans and farmers had oftentimes complained hereof to the Senat: but when they could obtain no comfort from them; to moderate and abridge this infinite power of the Censors, at length they met with a Tribune of the Commons, one Rutilius, to stand with them and defend their cause; a man who upon a particular and private quarrel of his own was offended and bare a grudge against the Censors. And this was the occasion: They had commanded one of his late vassals and enfranchised retainers, to pull down a wall standing in the street Sacra over against a publick edifice; pretending that the said wall was built upon the City ground. The man a private person, called unto the

A the Tribuns for their lawful help and favour: but when as none of them all but only this Rutilius would meddle in the matter and interpose their helping hand, the Censors sent to strain and take gages for to bind him to answer the cause, and before the body of the people intended an action against him, and set a grievous fine upon the head of that party aforesaid. By means I say of this debate begun upon such an occasion, when as the old publicans betook themselves for succour to this Tribune, presently there was a bill preferred and subscribed with the name of the said Tribune alone, in this form, That what publick revenews and profits of the State, C. Claudius and T. Sempronius had to farm let for a rent, or what publick works and provisions they had put out to be made and purveied at a price, the same leases and bargains should not stand for good but be cancelled, and new demises drawn and made. Also that it might be lawfull for all men indifferently
B either to be farmers or undertakers of the premisses. And the said Tribune assigned a day for a general assembly and session, to have this bill to be cast by the voices of the people. When the day was come, the Censors advanced and put themselves forward to disswade and plead against the bill. So long as Graechus spake, he was heard with patience and silence. But at Claudius, when he opened his mouth, they hissed and kept a muttering, so as he was forced by an oiez made by the crier to procure audience: which being made, the Tribune found himself grieved and complained, that the people there assembled were withdrawn and called away from him, to the prejudice of his authority and honour, and with that flang out of the Capitol where this assembly was holden. The next day he kept a great coil and made a foul stir: first, he interdicted the goods of Tib. Gracchus as condemned and accursed, for that in setting a fine, and streining gages of him,
C who had appealed to a Tribune, and in not obeying and condescending to his opposition, he seemed to set light by his Tribunes authority, and prejudice his reputation. As for C. Claudius, he arrested him to answer at a day, for that he had withdrawn the assembly from him: nay, he professed that he would indite both the Censors of treason or felony in the highest degree, and required of Sulpitius Pretor for the citizens, a day of assizes for their judicial tryal. The Censors refused not to have this matter put to an issue with all speed, and to be tried by the doom of the people. So the time for the hearing and determining of this hainous crime of majesty or treason aforesaid, was assigned the * daies immediatly before the eight and seventh calends of October. Upon this, the Censors incontinently ascended up into the Porch of Liberty: where after they
D had made sure and sealed the publick Registers and Records, shut up and locked all the offices of the Chancery, and discharged for the time the publick Clarks and proto-Notaries attending upon that Court, they protested that they would not go in hand with any publick affairs of state, before the sentence and judgment of the people were passed upon them. The day came, and Claudius first pleaded his own cause and spake for himself: and when of twelve Centuries that were of Gentlemen, eight had found the Censor guilty and cast him, yea and many other centuries of the first Classis. Then presently, the principal persons of the City in the very sight of the people, changed their weed, laid away their rings, and went about from one to another in humble manner, to crave the commons to be good unto the Censors. But that which most of all either staid or reversed the definitive doom against him, was (by report) Tib. Gracchus himself the other Censor: for that when the commons cried from all parts, that there was E no danger growing toward Gracchus, he sware by expres words, That if his colleague were condemned, he would (without attending the judgment of the people as touching himself) accompany him into banishment. Howbeit the defendant and accused person, was driven to this neer point and hard exigent of extremity, that he came within eight centuries of being cast and condemned. Thus when Claudius was acquit, the Tribune said he would not trouble and molest Gracchus.

* in ante 3 & 4 Calendas Octobris, that is, the 29 and 29 of September.

This yeat at the earnest suit of the Aquileian Embassadors unto the Senat, for to have the number of their colonies encreased: a thousand and five hundred families (by vertue of a decree granted out of the Senate) were enrolled: and for the conducting of them to Aquileia, were sent as
F Triumvirs or commissioners these three, to wit, T. Annius Luscus, P. Decius Subulo, and M. Cornelius Cethegus. The same year C. Popilius and Cn. Octavius Embassadors, who had been sent into Greece, having first read and published at Thebes the arest and ordinance of the Senat, carried it afterwards throughout all the Cities of Peloponnesus, to this effect, That no person should contribute toward the wars, and put into the hands of the Roman Magistrats, more than that which the Senat had set down. This put them in good hope and assurance for the future time that they should be eased of those charges and expenses, by which they were impoverished and wasted, whiles every one imposed upon them some taxation or other, and never gave them repose. In the Achæan general councel holden at Argos, they had audience given them and were heard in gracious sort: from whence leaving this most loyal and faithful nation in singular good hope of happy estate for the time to come, they passed into Ætolia. There was as yet no sedition broken out
G there; but all were in jealousy and suspicion one of another, and full of natural accusations: in regard of which jars and troubles, the Embassadors only demanded hostages, and without any other end made, went directly into Acarnania. The Acarnanians granted unto these Embassadors a Diet to be holden at Tyrrheum: where some debate was between the partakers of divers factions. Some principal men of the States required that there should be garrisons received into their Cities, to bridle the wilfull folly of those that enclined to the Macedonian nation: others gainsaid this course, and besought the contrary, for fear lest that peaceable and confederat Cities ſhould be put to receive that diſgrace and diſhonor, which uſually falleth upon known enemies and thoſe that are conquered by force of arms. And this requeſt was reputed juſt. Then the Embaſſadors returned to Lariſſa unto Hoſtilius the Pro-conſul, for from him they were employed in embaſſage. Octavius he retained ſtill with him: but Popilius together with a 1000 ſouldiers or very neer, he ſent to Ambracia, there to lodge for the winter time.

Perſeus in the beginning of winter durſt not go forth of the frontiers of Macedany, for fear leſt the Romans would invade with violence his realm in ſome place or other, if they found it void and diſfurniſhed. But toward the mids of December about mid-winter, when by reaſon of the deep ſnow the mountains are unpaſſable and unſuperable from out of Theſſaly, thinking he had then a fit ſeaſon and opportunity to cut off the hopes and break the hearts of the neighbor-borderers, that when he ſhould be averted another way and buſied in the Roman war, he might be ſecured of danger from them: conſidering that from the parts of Thracia he had peace with Cotys; and likewiſe from Epirus ſide (by the means of Cephalus, who ſuddainly of late was revolted from the Romans:) moreover having newly vanquiſhed the Dardanians in war; and ſeeing only that quarter to infeſt and annoy Macedony, which regardeth and affronteth Illyricum; and that theſe Illyrians alſo were not quiet and at peace, but ready to give entrance unto the Romans; but if he had ſubdued and tamed thoſe Illyrians which were next unto him, then King Gentius alſo, who a long time hung between in doubtful terms, might be induced & drawn wholly into ſociety with him: he reſolved at length, and with ten thouſand footmen heavily armed, whereof part were Phalangitæ, and other two thouſand lightly appointed; and five hundred horſe, he made a rode and preſented his forces before Stubera: from whence after he had provided himſelf of corn to ſerve for many daies; and given order that the ordinance and engins of battery ſhould follow after: at the third daies end he lodged neer Uſcana, the head City of all that Land Peneſtia. But before that he offered any aſſault, he ſent certain of purpoſe to ſound and ſollicit the affections, one while of the Captains of the garriſon, and another while of the Townſmen. Now there lay within the City, together with the manhood and youth of the Illyrians, a garriſon alſo of the Romans. And when he ſaw that they brought no news of any peaceable dealing from thence, he began to bend his forces againſt them, and aſſaid to inveſt them round about, and ſo to force the City. And albeit both night and day without any reſt and intermiſſion, they preſſed upon the inhabitants, and evermore one ſucceeded another; whiles ſome reared ladders againſt the walls, others threw balls of fire againſt the gates, yet the defendants of the City held out and endured that furious and violent tempeſt: becauſe they hoped that neither the Macedonians lying abroad were able any long time to endure the rigor of the cold winter; nor the King on the other ſide could have ſo much releaſe and relaxation from the Roman war, as to ſtay there and make his abode. But after they perceived once the mantilets approach, and the frames of turrets and fabricks erected their perſiſtance was over-matched & they began to relent. For beſides that in plain force they were the weaker and not able to reſiſt, diſtreſſed alſo they were for want of corn, neither had they ſtore of any other proviſion, as being taken on a ſuddain, and looking for nothing leſs than ſiege at ſuch a time of the year. Therefore when they were paſt all hope to be able any longer to reſiſt, C. Carvilius Spoletinus and C. Afranius were ſent from the Roman garriſon, to crave of Perſeus, firſt that he would permit them to depart in their arms, and to carry with them their bag and baggage: ſecondly, if they might not obtain ſo much, that he would but give them aſſurance of life and liberty. The King was more free and liberal to promiſe, than faſt and faithful to perform. For after he had commanded them to go forth and carry with them all that was their own: the firſt thing that he did was to diſarme them and take away their weapons. * * * * They were not ſo ſoon departed out of the Town but both the company of the Illyrians, to the number of 500 men, and alſo the inhabitants of Uſcana rendred themſelves and their City. Perſeus when he had put a garriſon in Uſcana led away the whole multitude of the yeelded Townſmen (and thoſe were well-neer as many in number as his own army) and tranſported them to Stulera: where after he had ſent the Romans (all beſides their Captains) who were 4000 fighting men, into ſundry cities to be kept in ward, and ſold the Uſcanians and Illyrians; he led his army back into Peneſtia, intending to be maſter of Oeneum. a Town ſeated otherwiſe commodiouſly, and withal it is the very key and highway that openeth paſſage into the country of the Labeats, within the realm of King Gentius, and where he kept his roial ſtate. As he paſſed by a ſtrong borough-Town well inhabited, named Draudacum, one about him that was well acquainted with the coaſts of that country put into his head, that bootleſs it was and to no purpoſe to win Oeneum, unleſs he had Draudac alſo in his hands, as being a Town ſituate more commodiouſly in all reſpects. Whereupon he advanced forward, and ſo ſoon as ever he preſented his army before it, incontinently all the inhabitants ſubmitted and yeelded. Being much animated and encouraged with this ſurrender of theirs, which they made far ſooner than he hoped or looked for; after that he perceived how terrible this redoubled army of his was, all the way as he marched he brought under his ſubjection eleven other Caſtles and ſtrong holds, upon the like fear that they were put into. Violence he uſed againſt very few of them; the reſt yeelded willingly: wherein were taken 1500 Roman ſouldiers, placed there in ſeveral garriſons. In great ſtead and to very good uſe ſerved Carvilius Spoletinus in all their parlies, who evermore gave it out that there had been no cruelty nor rigor exerciſed upon him and his fellows. At length the King came before Oeneum, which could not poſſibly be won without a ſet and full ſiege. For the Town had far more youth and able men

A men within it then the reſt, was fortified with a ſtrong wall about it, and defended of the one ſide with the river called Artatus, and of the other with an exceeding high hill, and the ſame of hard and difficult acceſſe. All theſe things conſidered, the townſmen were in good hope to be able for to make reſiſtance. Perſeus, having entrenched the town and caſt a rampier round about it, began likewiſe to raiſe a terrace & mount from the upper part thereof, to that height as might ſurmount and over-top the wals. But during the time that this peece of work was in hand and brought to perfection, a great number of the inhabitants within were conſumed by divers and ſundry adventures, whiles they skirmiſhed oft and ſallied forth, endeavouring both to defend their own wals, and alſo to empeach the fabricks and deviſes of their enemies. And thoſe that remained alive, what with toilſome labour night and day, and what with many a wound, were paſt all
B ſervice and good for nothing. So ſoon as the terrace and mount aforeſaid was raiſed cloſe unto the wall, both the Kings cohort (whom they call Nicatores) mounted up into it, and alſo with ladders the aſſault was given unto the City in many places at once. All that were above fourteen yeers old he put to the ſword: their wives and ſmall children he caſt into priſon. The reſt of the booty and pillage fell to the ſouldiers ſhare. As he returned from thence with victory to Stubera, he ſent as Embaſſadors unto Gentius, Pleuratus the Illyrian (a baniſhed perſon who ſojourned with him) and Aputeus a Macedonian of Berrhæa. Them he gave in charge to declare unto Gentius, what he had atchieved againſt the Romans and Dardanians the ſummer paſt, together with the late exploits performed in that winter expedition; and withall to perſwade the K. for to be knit in amity with him and the Macedonians. Theſe Embaſſadors having tranſmounted the top of the C hill Scordus and traverſed the wilds and wolds of Illyricum, which the Macedonians of purpoſe had laid waſt and deſert, to the end, that the Dardanians might have no eaſie paſſage either into Illyricum or Macedony) after much pain and travell they arrived in the end at Scodra. Now was K. Gentius at Liſſus, and thither were the Embaſſadors ſent for, where they deliuered their meſſage with gracious audience: but they went away with an anſwer to no effect; namely, that he wanted no will, and his heart was good enough to war upon the Romans; but his coffers were empty, and he lacked mony eſpecially, to go in hand and enterpriſe that which he deſired. This anſwer they related unto King Perſeus at Stubera, at what time as he was moſt buſie in ſelling of his captives taken in Illyricum. Then forthwith were the ſame Embaſſadors addreſsed again unto D him, accompanied with Glaucias one of the Kings guard and ſquires of his body, without any mention made of mony, and that was the only means to induce the bare and needy barbarous Prince to levy war. After this, Perſeus ranſacked the City Ancyra, and once again reduced his army into Peneſtines country, and having ſtrengthned the garriſons in Vſcana, and in all the forts and peeces about it, he returned into Macedony.

L. Celius a Roman lieutenant, lay in guard for the defence and rule of Illyricum, who durſt not ſtir ſo long as King Perſeus was in thoſe quarters; but in the end after his departure, he endeavoured to recover Vſcana in the Peneſtins country, but was repulſed from thence by the garriſon of the Macedonians there, and caried away nothing but many a dry knock and bloudy wound, & ſo retired with his forces to Lychnidum: from whence, ſome few daies after he ſent M. Trebellius Fregellanus into the Peneſtins country, with a ſtrong power, for to receive hoſtages of thoſe Cities who faithfully had perſiſted in amity & friendſhip. He commanded him alſo to go forward to E the Partins (for they likewiſe had covenanted to put in pledges) for that of both theſe nations, the ſaid hoſtages might be gotten without any ſtir and trouble. The hoſtages of the Peneſtins were ſent to Apollonia, but thoſe of the Partins to Dyrrhachium, which in thoſe daies was more uſually called by the Greeks Epidamnus.

App. Caudius, deſirous to raſe out the blemiſh and make amends for the diſhonour received in Illyricum, ſet in hand to aſſault Phanotes a fort of Epirus, having brought thither with him the Athamans and Theſprotians (over and above the Roman army) to the number of 6000 men; but he got nothing there but travell for his paines, by reaſon that the place was valiantly defended by F Clevas, left there with a ſtrong garriſon by K. Perſeus. Perſeus likewiſe made an expedition to Elymea, and after he had taken a ſolemn ſurvey of his army about it, he conducted his power to Stratus at the requeſt of the Epirots This Stratus then, was the ſtrongeſt City of all Ætolia. Situate it is upon the gulf of Ambracia, neer the river Achelous. he advanced thither with 10000 foot & not above 300 horſe of them the took the fewer with him in number, by reaſon of the ſtraight paſſages and rugged waies. Being come at the third daies end ſo far as to the mount Citius, after he had with much difficulty paſſed over it, the ſnow lay ſo deep, that hardly and with much ado could he find a convenient place to encamp in. From thence he removed, more for that he could not there abide and remain, then for any intolerable way and weather he met withall in his diſmarch and journey forward: ſo with paſſing great travell and trouble, of his beaſts eſpecially, the G ſecond day he arrived at the temple of Jupiter called Niceus, and there lodged. Then after he had taken an exceeding long journey, he abode at the river Arachthus, being ſtaied there by reaſon of the deep water: during which time, he made a bridg over and tranſported his forces; and when he was gone a daies journey onward, he encountred on the way Archidamus a principall perſon of the Ætolians, by whoſe means the City of Stratus was to be delivered up unto him. And that day he lodged upon the frontiers of Ætolia: from whence next morrow he journeyed as far as to Stratus, where having encamped neer the river Achelous, he looked that the Ætolians would run out unto him by heaps at all their gates, to yeeld themſelves to his protection: but inſtead ſtead thereof he found their gates ſhut & gariſons of the Romans received into the City that very night when he came, together with the lieutenant C. Popilius. For the chief of the City (who induced and enforced by the authority of Archidamus whiles he was preſent in place, had ſent for the K.) became more ſlack and negligent, by occaſion that Archidamus was gone forth to meet with him, and thereby gave advantage and opportunity to the adverſe faction, to ſend for Popilius with a 1000 footmen from Ambracia. In very fit time and to right good purpoſe came Dinarchus alſo a captain of the Ætolian Cavalry, accompanied with 600 foot and a 100 horſe. Known it was for certain, that he marched toward Stratus, as intending to band and take part with Perſeus; but changing his mind together with the turning of fortune, he joyned with the Romans, and banded againſt him for whom he ſet out at the firſt. Neither was Popilius, among theſe waverings and inconſtant ſpirits, more ſecured then he ſhould be; and therefore incontinently gat the keies of the gates into his hands, and poſſeſſed himſelf of the guard of the wals. And for Dinarchus and the Ætolians, together with the youth and able men of Stratus, he beſtowed them all in the forreſſe, under a colour of guarding the ſame. Perſeus, having aſſaied to parly with them from the hils which commanded the higher part of the City, finding them perverſe and obſtinat, and ſeeing them ready to ſet him farther off with ſhot of their darts, encamped five miles off from the City, beyond the river Peneus. There, he called a councell; in which, Archidamus together with the revolts and renegats of the Epirots, exhorted him there to ſojourn and continue: but the captains of the Macedonians contrariwiſe were of advice that there was no ſtriving with that troubleſome and dangerous ſeaſon of the yeer, conſidering their proviſions were not ready; and the aſſailants were like ſooner to feel the ſcacity and want thereof, then the defendants: in reg.rd whereof, and eſpecially for the enemies wintred not far from thence, he diſlodged and removed to Aperantia. The Aperantians by reaſon of great credit of Archidamus among them, received him with a generall conſent. And the ſame Archidamus was made captain there over a garriſon of 800 ſouldiers. And ſo the King returned into Macedony, with leſſe trouble both of his men and beaſts, then he came thither. Howbeit the bruit blown abroad, that Perſeus led his forces againſt Stratus, cauſed Appius to levy his ſiege from before Phanotes. And Clevas with a brave regiment of luſty men well appointed, followed hard after him, and at the foot of the hils which were almoſt unpaſſable, he ſlew wel-neer a 1000 of them as they marched heavily armed, and took priſoners above 200. But after that Appius was paſſed through ſtreights & come into the plain called Eleon, he lay encamped there ſome few daies: mean while Clevas, accompanied with Philoſtratus the chief commander of the Epirots, paſſed over into the territory of Antigonea. The Macedonians went about to rob and ſpoil: but Philoſtratus with his cohort ſet him down in a-wait, under a covert and hidden place for the purpoſe. And when as thoſe of Antigonia iſſued forth in arms & charged upon the forragers as they ranged over the fields, and diſperſed in ſtraggling-wiſe, purſuing them too eagerly in their flight, they chanced to engage themſelves over far within the valley where the enemies lay in ambuſh: and there to the number of a 1000 of them loſt their lives, and almoſt a 100 were taken priſoners. And ſo the enemies having ſped well in all their enterpriſes, removed their camp cloſe to that of Appius, to the end that the Roman army might do no violence and outrage upon their friends and allies. Thus Appius ſpending the time in theſe parts to no purpoſe, and doing no good, after he had diſcharged the companies of the Chaonians, & as many of the Epirots as were with him, returned in Illyricum with his Italian ſouldiers: and when he had diſtributed them among the confederat Cities of the Partynians, there to winter, returned himſelf to Rome by occaſion of a certain ſolemn ſacrifice. Perſeus ſent to Caſſandrea for to lie in garriſon there, a 1000 foot and 200 horſe, whom he had cauſed to come again out of the countrey of the Peneſtins. And they that returned from Gentius related ſtill the ſame long from him, yet never reſted he nor gave over to tempt and importune him, ſending Embaſſadors after Embaſſadors unto him, knowing right-well, that in him reſted great importance: yet could not by any meanes poſſible bring the man to expend ought and to be at any charge, in a matter every way of great conſequence.

The four and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

IN the beginning of that spring which immediatly followed the winter wherein these occurrents hapned, Q. Martius Philippus the Consul came to Brundusium with five thousand men, whom he intended to transport over the seas for the supply of his legions. And M. Popilius (one who had been Consul) and other brave gallants of noble parentage as well as himself, followed after the Consul to be martial-Tribunes in the Macedonian legions. Also about the same time C. Martius Figulus the Pretor, and Admirall of the navy, repaired to Brundusium. Who weighing anchor, loosed to sea from Italy together, and arrived the next day at Corphu; but the morrow after that, they put within Actium, an haven of Acarnania. From thence the Consul set
C sail for Ambracia, where he disbarked and travelled by land to Thessaly. But the Pretor having doubled the point of Leucas, entered the gulf of Corinth; leaving his vessels at Crusa, journied likewise by land to Chalcis unto the naval forces, making such expedition that he crossed through the midst of Beotia in one day. At the same time A. Hostilius lay encamped in Thessaly, neer to Palepharsalus. Who albeit he had performed no memorable exploit of warlike feats, yet he had reclaimed his souldiers from all licentious loonsess, wherewith they were corrupted, and ranged them within good order of discipline. Also by his faithfull corraige in government, he had entertained and kept the love of the allies still, yea, and protected them from all manner of wrong
D and injury. Now when he was advertised of the arrivall of his successor, he assembled with all diligence his forces both men and horse, & gathered together all armor, as well offensive as defensive; and so with a brave army right well appointed, he went forth to meet the Consul upon the way. As their first encounter and meeting was honourable, and befitting as wel their own reputation as the greatest ate of the Roman name, so for the managing of the affairs afterward [* it was very expedient to the Consul Philip. For the pro-consul turning to his own army, exhorted the souldiers to perform valiant service; and to when he had delivered it to the Consul, returned to Rome.] Some few daies after, the Consul made an oration in a solemn audience of all his souldiers: Wherin first he began with the parricide of Perseus, committed upon the person of his own brother, but projected against his very father. Then he proceeded forward and declared the wicked and divelish means whereby he attained to the crown, also his practises of poysoning, his bloudy murderers, he laid await for King Eumenes his life by way of detestable brigandage and robbery: more-
E "over, the injuries offered to the people of Rome, and sacking of associat Cities against the covenants of accord. All which dealings of his he should find one day (quoth he) by the issue of his "affairs, how odious and cursed they are in the sight also of the immortall gods. For the gods are "evermore favourable and gracious to piety and fidelity, the only means whereby the people of "Rome is mounted to that pitch and height of felicity. Then he compared the forces of that State "which already compassed the round world, with the strength of Macedony; he set armies to ar-"mies, making remonstrances how far greater was the puissance of Philip and Antiochus before, "and yet was it defeated utterly by no greater power then the Romans now were able to shew. "Having thus enkindled and enflamed the courages of his souldiers by this maner of exhortation, he began to debate in counsel as touching the principal and main point of the whole war. And F thither repaired unto him from Chalcis, the Pretor C. Matius, after he had taken the charge of the armado and sea-forces. Resolved it was and concluded to make no longer abode in Thessaly, and there to lose time, but pretently to dislodg and remove directly into Macedony: that the Pretor also should endevour and cast, how at one and the self same time he might infest and annoy the sea-coasts of the enemies. Now after that the Pretor was dismissed & went away, the Consul commanded his souldiers to bring every man with him provision for a month: and to the tenth day after he had received the conduct of the army, he removed the camp and set forward. When he had gone a daies journey, he called together the guids, and after he had commanded them every one to declare before the Councel there assembled, which way each of them intended to direct the army, he caused them to go aside; and then debated it was in councel, which course to take above all o-
G thers. Some were of opinion to lead by the way of Pythium; others advised to passe over the Cambunian mountains, like as the yeer before Hostilius the Consul conducted his army; and there were who gave advice to go neer to the moor of Ascaris. Now there remained yet some part behind of the way, which lay indifferent still and common to all these places; and therefore their consultation of this point was put over to the time when they should encamp neer to the parting and division of the said wayes. So from thence he led the army to Perrhæbia, and sat him down between Azorus and Doliche, for to consult once again for all, which way to take.

* The place is here defective, but may be supplied, as Sigonius thinketh in this manner as you see between these markes [ ]

The ſame time Perſeus knowing that the enemy approached, but yet ignorant which way he meant to come, determined to beſet all paſsages with ſtrong guards. Whereupon he ſent ten thouſand yong and luſty men lightly armed, to the pitch of the Cambaunian hils (which the inhabitants themſelves call Voluſtana) under the conduct of captain Aſclepiodotus. But he commanded Hippias with a power of twelve thouſand Macedonians to ſeiz the ſtreights of a certain fort ſituat upon the marſh Aſcuris, and is called Lapathus. Himſelf in perſon accompanied with the reſt of the forces, lodged firſt neer to Dium: but afterwards ſeeming as if he were unprovided of counſel and void of ſenſe and underſtanding, he with his light horſmen made rodes and courſes along the ſtrand, one while toward Heraclea, and otherwhiles to Phila; and ſo backward again the ſame way to Dium. In this mean time the Conſul reſolved fully to lead his army by that paſs where we ſaid before that the army of King Philip encamped ſometimes neer a place called Oſſolopis. Howbeit he thought good to ſend out before four thouſand armed men, for to prevent the enemies and be poſſeſsed firſt of the moſt commodious places of advantage: this regiment was commanded by M. Claudius and Q. Martius, the Conſuls ſon; and incontinently all the forces in generall followed after. But the way was ſo ſteep and difficult, ſo rough, uneven and rugged, that in two daies ſpace, they which were ſent before, albeit they were not charged with the carriage of any thing, had much ado to march fifteen miles: where they lodged, and the place which they made choice of was called the Tower Eudieru. From whence the morrow after they journied ſeven miles forward and ſeized a hill not far from the enemies camp: where they diſpatched a courrier back to the Conſul, to give intelligence, that they were come neer to the enemy, and tarried in a place of ſafety, commodious alſo for all purpoſes; and withall to adviſe him for to make all poſsible ſpeed after, for to overtake them and join together. This meſſenger encountred the Conſul at the Mear Aſcuris, where he was greatly perplexed as well for the difficulty of the way which he was to enter himſelf, as alſo in regard of the danger of them whom in ſo few number he had ſent before, even through the midſt of the enemies corps de guard. Whereupon he took a better heart to himſelf; and having united all his forces, encamped upon the foreſaid hill which his men already held, on that ſide which (conſidering the nature of the ground) was moſt commodious. And there they might diſcover within the view of eie, not only the enemies camp diſtant from thence a little above a mile, but alſo the whole countrey as far as to Dium and Phila, yea, and all the ſea coaſt by reaſon that the high pitch and top of the mountain yeelded a proſpect far and neer round about. And this was it that ſet on fire the ſouldiers hearts, when they beheld the whole weight of the war, the Kings forces altogether, and the enemies countrey ſo neer unto them. In which ſpirit of cheerfulneſs when they were earneſt with the Conſul, and exhorted him to advance directly againſt the enemies camp, they had but one day granted them to reſt after their weariſome journey. So upon the third day the Conſul leaving part of his forces to guard the camp, led the reſt againſt the enemy. Now had Hippias been lately ſent from the King to keep and guard the paſſage, who ſince the time that firſt he eſpied the Roman camp upon the hill, had prepared the minds of his men to a battel, and ſo encountred the army of the Conſul and met it half way. The Romans advanced forth to fight, nimbly appointed; and the enemies likewiſe were lightly armed, and by reaſon thereof moſt fit and provided for to give the charge and begin skirmiſh. So ſoon as they affronted and encountred one another, preſently they fell to lancing of their darts on both ſides. Many a wound was given and received of the one part as well as the other by their raſh charging at ranſom, and few of both ſides were ſlain. Thus were their ſtomacks whetted and edged againſt the morrow; and then had they skirmiſhes, and maintained fight with greater forces, and more deadly feud, if the ground would have ſerved them to have diſplaied their battallions at large: but the top of the mountain was ſtreight and aroſe to a ſharp creſt in form of a coin or wedg; and ſcarcely afforded room enough for three ranks of armed men affront; and therefore when ſome few were in fight, all the reſt and ſpecially they that were heavily armed, ſtood as lookers on. As for the light armour of one part, they would run forth at the broken crags of the hill, and ever from the ſides join battel with the like of the other part: yea, and find meanes to charge their enemie, were the place even or uneven, it skilled not whether. But after that more that day alſo were wounded then killed, the night at length parted the fray. The third day, the Roman General was to ſeek and wiſt not what to do; for neither could he ſtay any longer upon that hill, for want of all things; and retire back from thence it was not poſsible, without diſhonour and danger both. Moreover, if he had retired, the enemy might preſſe upon him from the upper ground with advantage. There remained therefore no other meanes to amend that which was the audaciouſly enterpriſed, with as reſolute & hardy perſiſtance in execution; a thing that otherwhiles proveth well in the end, as if it proceeded from wiſe and deliberat counſel. And verily to this hard paſſe and difficult terms they were come, that if the Conſul had been to deal with an enemy like to any of the Macedonian Kings in old time, he might ſoon have received a great foil and overthow. But K. Perſeus as he coaſted and ranged with his cavalry upon the ſtrand neer Dium (albeit for the ſpace of 12 miles wel-neer, he heard the cries and ſhouts of them that were in fight;) neither reenforced the companies by ſending freſh ſouldiers in place of the wearied, not ſhewing himſelf in perſon at the battel: (which had been a thing I aſſure you of moſt importance) whereas the Roman General being above 60 yeers of age, corpulent beſides, & unweldy, performed himſelf right luſtily all military ſervices of a valiant warrior; perſiſting in that to the very end moſt bravely, which he had begun and enterpriſed ſo boldly:

and

A and having left Popilius for to guard the hill top, paſſed over places that had no tracts at all to direct them, by ſending out before, certain men of purpoſe to ſcour and prepare to make a paſſage. As for Attalus and Miſagenes, he commanded them both, with the auxiliary ſouldiers of their own nation to guard them that opened the way before. Then he putting before him in the march the horſmen with baggage, came behind with the legionary footmen in the rereguard. No tongue is able to expreſſe what a toil and painful labour they found in going down the hill, the ſumpter horſes with their backs & carriages tumbled ſo down one with another: in ſo much as when they had ſcarcely gone four miles forward, they wiſhed in their hearts nothing more, then to return the way they came, if it had been poſsible. The elephants troubled the march as much in maner as the enemies could: for when they were come to a place where they could ſee no way, down
B they caſt their riders and governors, laying them along on the earth, and with the horrible braying that they made, affrighted their horſes eſpecially, untill ſuch time as a device was found for their paſſage. They began firſt to make the head or entrance of the bridg at the very bow and edg of a ſteep downfal: this done, in the lower ground beneath, they ſet faſt in the earth good ſtrong and long poſts of wood, two by two diſtant one from the other traverſe while little more then the largeneſs of one of their beaſts. Upon which reſted faſt joined [with ten on & morteiſe] certain rafters like wal plats 30 foot in length, and thoſe being couched with planks croſſe over in form of a bridg, had earth and mould caſt thereupon. A little way off beneath it, ſuch another bridg was made; and ſo a third likewiſe, and many more conſequently according as the craggy ground was broken and uneven. Now the elephant from the firm ground entred upon the firſt
C bridg aforeſaid; but before he was gone as far as to the foot and end thereof, the poſts abovenamed were cut in two underneath; to the end that the bridg might fall, and in the eaſie reeling therof the beaſt alſo gently ſlide, as it were, and he carried therewith as far as the head of the ſecond bridg. Thus ſome of them glid and kept themſelves ſtanding upright on their feet others reſted upon their buttocks. Again, when they were come to the plain and levell floor of another ſuch like bridg, by the fall of it in maner aforeſaid they were driven unto a third bridg beneath it, untill ſuch time as they were come to a more plain and even valley. In this order the Romans could rid little more then ſeven miles that day. And the leaſt part thereof went they upright on their feet but were fain moſt-what to tumble and roll over and over with the armor and fardels about them: and thus they gat forward in all kind of pain and trouble, in ſuch ſort that he who induced them
D to this journey & conducted them therein, could not deny but the whole army (with a ſmal power coming againſt them) might utterly have been defeated. By night they arrived at a prety plain; but the place being encloſed on all ſides, they had no ſpace and room to view round about, whether it were dangerous or no. At length after much ado and beyond their expectation, they met with a firm peece of ground, whereas they might take ſure footing; and there they were forced the morrow following to attend in the hollow valley the coming of Popilius and the companies left with him: who alſo were exceedingly ſore vexed and plagued with the roughneſſe of the way, albeit the enemies troubled and affrighted them no whit at all. The third day, after they had joined their forces together, they took their way through a paſſe, which the inhabitants call Callipence. The fourth day they paſſed over a place that had no more meanes to direct them, then the other before; but by uſe and experience there were grown more skilfull: and better hope they
E had, for that the enemy in no place appeared, but approached neer to the ſea. When they were come once down into the plains between Haracetus and Lebethrus, the footmen (whereof the greater part kept the hils) pitched their tents and took up the valley, and a good part of the plain wherein the horſmen ſhould quarter. As the King was bathing himſelf, it is ſaid that word came, How the enemies were neer at hand: at which news he was ſo ſcared, that he leapt out of his bathing veſſel, and in haſt gat him out of the bame, crying aloud, That he was vanquiſhed without drawing ſword and ſtroke given: neither wiſt he for fear which way to turn him, taking ſundry counſels one of another, and commanding he knew not what, ſometime this and ſometime. In this perplexity he ſent for Aſclepiodorus (one of his two eſpecial friends) out
F of the place where he lay in garriſon, to go to Pella where all his money and treaſure lay; and by this means opened all the avenues for the Romans to make war. Himſelf, after he had had in great haſt beſtowed and piled up in his ſhips, all the gilded images at Dium, to the end that the enemy ſhould make no prize of them, cauſed with all ſpeed poſsible to traſſe up and to remove to Pydna; & hereby gave occaſion, that the enterpriſe of the Conſul which might have ſeemed raſhneſs (in that he had engaged himſelf ſo far, that he could not poſsibly to retire again without leave of the enemy) proved in the end no inconſiderat and unadviſed deſignment. For now the Romans had the choice of two paſſages through which they might eſcape away, the one, by Tempe into Theſſaly, the other into Macedony, by the way neer Dium: both which before were held by the Kings guards. So as if a reſolute and fearleſs captain could have held out and endured but one ten G daies the firſt apparence and ſhew of terror that approached, the Rom. could never have returned into Theſſaly by Tempe, nor found way for conveiance of proviſion & victuals to the place where they were. For Tempe is of it ſelf a difficult paſſage, even without any force of arms to make it dangerous. And why? beſides the ſtraight gullet five mils in length, yeelding a very narrow way for one beaſt to go charged with burden; the rocks of either hands are ſo ſteep and upright, that hardly a man is able to look down from them, but his eyes will dazle, his brain turn, and his head be giddy withall. Moreover, the ſound and noiſe, yea, and the depth of the river Peneus running directly through the midst of the valley, encreased the fear so much the more. This place so perilous of its own nature, had been holden and guarded with the Kings garrisons in four several & distant places. The one kept at the very first entrance, neer to Comnus; the second at Condylos, a fort impregnable; the third about Lapathus, which also they call Charax; and the fourth was placed even upon the very avenue it self about the midst of the valley, where it is at the streightest, and which may easily be defended with ten men, if there were no more. In this maner (I say) the passage being stopped up by Tempe, as well for portage of provisions thither as for return from thence, the Romans must perforce have retired again up to the same mountains from whence they were descended. But as they come down and were not discovered, so being now descried, they could not possibly have gained them again in open view, considering that the enemies had possessed the tops of the mountains; and no doubt the difficulty thereof besides, which they had tried already, would have cut off all hope of that adventure: so as, being waded thus far into this rash enterprise there remaineth no meanes else for them, but to have passed through the midst of the enemies, at Dium, for to to escape and passe into Macedony: an adventure no doubt, (if the gods had not bereft the King of his right wits) most difficult and dangerous unto them. For it being so, that from the foot of the mountain Olympus unto the sea, there is little above a mile space between: the one half whereof, is taken up with the mouth of the river Baphyrus, which in this place spreadeth very broad and large; and another part of the plain, either the temple of Jupiter or the town it self occupieth: the rest besides, being but a very small place, might have been enclosed and made fast against them with a little trench and rampier: besides such store there was of stone ready at hand, and of timber out of the forrest, that they might either have raised a mure, or framed turrets and such like fabricks in their way. But the K. (whose spirit and understanding was blinded with suddain fear) foreseeing none of all these things, but disfurnishing every fort of their garrisons, made open passage for the current of war, and fled himself to Pydna. The Consul perceiving that he had gotten great advantage and many hopes by the folly and negligence of his enemy, dispatched a currier back toward Larissa unto Sp. Lucretius, willing him to seiz those forts into his hands about Tempe, which were abandoned by the enemy: and after he had sent Popilius before in spiall to discover all the passages about Dium, and perceived that the avenues were open in all parts, he marched forwards himself, and the second journy came to Dium; where commanded to encamp under the very temple, to the end, that no violent outrage should be committed in that holy place. Himself in proper person entred into the City, which as it was not great, so it was garnished with fair publick buildings, beautified with a number of goodly images, and passing well fortified besides: in so much as he could not well beleeve, that things of such importance were abandoned for nothing, but that there was some secret deceit and treachery lurking underneath. After he had staied there one full day, to espie and see that all coasts were cleer, he dislodged and marched on; & supposing verily that he should be provided of sufficient store of grain, he advanced forward that very day to the river named Mytis. The morrow after, he took possession of the City Agassa, which the inhabitants willingly rendred unto him. And to win the hearts of all other Macedonians, (contenting himself only with hostages) he promised to leave their City cleer without a garison, and to permit them to live under their own laws without paiment of any tribute. Being marched onward one daies journey from thence, he pitched down his tents fast upon the river Ascordus: but feeling and finding still (the farther he went from Thessaly, more and more want of all things, he retired back to Dium; and then all men saw plainly & made no doubt, to what streights he should be driven, in case he had been clean shut out from Thessaly, considering that it was not safe for him to remove far from thence where he was

Perseus having rallied all his forces, and assembled his captains into one place, checked and ratled up the captains of the garrisons and guards aforesaid over the passages: but above all he rebuked Asclepiodorus & Hippias most, saying, that those two had betraied unto the Romans the portgate to Macedony: whereas indeed no man was more justly to be blamed, for that than his own self

The Consul after he had discovered a far off from sea a fleet of Roman ships, conceived good hope that vessels were coming charged with provision of victuals (for now in his camp the dearth was great, and brought they were already to extream want and scarcity.) But he was advertised by them who were entred within the habor, that the hulks and ships of burden were left behind at Magnesia. Whereupon, being in great doubt what to do (so hard went all things with him for the present, that he had work enough to wrestle with that only difficulty, without being farther encumbred with any empeachment from the enemy) behold, in happy time, letters were brought unto him from Sp. Lucretius, importing thus much; That he was master of all the forts and holds planted upon Tempe and round about Phila, where he had found great plenty of corn and other necessaries. The Consul right joious for these good tidings, set his army on foot from Dium to Phila, as well to strengthen the garrison there, as also to deal corn among his souldiers; which would have required a long time ere it could have been brought over to them at Dium.

That departure & journey of his was nothing well spoken of: for some gave out that the General retired from the enemy for very fear; because that if he had staied there still, he should have been forced to a battel: others said, that he had no skill in war, neither in those occurrents, which fortunes wheele turning about altered every day, offering one new thing or other; who when occasions and opportunities were presented unto him, let the same slip out of his hands, which soon after might not possibly be recovered again. And verily he had not so soon quit the possession of

A of Dium, but he ſtarted and wakened the enemy, and put in his head now at length to regain thoſe matters, which had been loſt before through his own default. For hearing that the Conſul was departed, he returned immediately to Dium: where he repaired whatſoever had been demoliſhed and ruinat by the Romans: the battlements of the wals which were caſt down he ſet up again in the right place; and in all parts fortified the mure and bulwarks of the City. Which done, he encamped five miles off on this ſide Enipeus, intending that the river it ſelf (which is very hard to be paſſed over, ſhould ſerve in ſtead of a rampier and trench of defence. This river runneth out of the vale from under the mountain Olympus, and in ſummer ſeaſon is ſmall and ſhallow, but in winter it riſeth high and ſpreadeth broad by reaſon of rain: running alſo with a forcible current and ſtream, it ſurmounteth great rocks, and among thoſe ſtony crags and ſhelves maketh many B whirlpits: by occaſion likewiſe, that from thence it carrieth away with it into the ſea, ſtore of earth, there are many gulfs of exceeding depth: and by reaſon that it hath eaten a hollow chanell in the mids, the banks of each ſide are very high and ſteep upright. Perſeus, ſuppoſing that by the means of this river, the enemies were debarred from all paſſage, purpoſed in his mind to hold off, and drive out the reſt of the ſummer in that ſort.

But the Conſul in the mean while ſent Popilius from Phila into Heraclea with 2000 armed fighting men. This Heraclea ſtandeth about five miles from Phila, ſituat in the mid-way between Dium and Tempe, upon a rock that commandeth this river, Popilius, before that he cauſed his men to approach the wals, ſent certain perſons of purpoſe to perſwade the magiſtrats and chief C of the City, to make proof of the faithful protection and clemency of the people of Rome, rather then to trie their rigor and violence. But this motive and advice availed not, becauſe they might diſcern the fires out of the kings camp neer to Enipeus, whereupon both from the land and ſeaſide (for the fleet alſo being arrived anchored neer the ſhore) as wel by force of arms as by fabricks and engins of battery, they began to aſſail the town. Moreover, certain yong and luſty Roman ſouldiers (making uſe now in war of exerciſe which they had practiſed in the games Circenſes) gat over the wall where it was loweſt. The maner was in thoſe daies (before this waſt prodigality came up of filling the whole cirque or ſhew-place with beaſts fet out of all countries) to deviſe and ſeek ſundry ſorts of publick ſights & ſpectacles to be hold, & not running one courſe with the chariot, and another on horſeback, and ſo an end, to employ at both races the ſpace of one full hour. Among others feats of activity exhibited, the maſters and wardens of thoſe exerciſes and D games brought into the race commonly 60 (and otherwhiles more) luſty yong men in arms well appointed. There training in part repreſented a ſhew and apparance of two armies encountring and encountring and charging one another, in part alſo the uſe and practiſe of a more gentle and elegant exerciſe then military profeſſion, and coming neerer to the handling and managing of weapons after the order of ſword-fencers. Theſe yong galiants, after they had performed other ordinary running courſes, put themſelves into a four-ſquare ſquadron, with the bucklers or targets cloſe couched and joined together over their heads, in this manner: they that were formoſt in the front ſtood bolt upright; the ſecond rank ſtooped ſomewhat lower under the other; the third courſe more then they; and ſo the fourth untill the hindmoſt kneeled on their knees: and by this means they reſembled a pavoiſade riſing up higher & higher, like the pent-houſe or roof of ædifices. E This done, two men well armed, fetching their run fifty foot or thereabout backward from thence, and ſeeming to defie and challenge one another, mounted the foreſaid pavoiſade, ran from the nether end up to the top upon thoſe targets ſo jointly united and ſet cloſe and thick together: and one while they ſet their countenance as though they would defend the ſides and edges thereof, otherwhiles in the mids they ſeemed to performed their devoir and maintain combat one with another, as upon firm and ſteady ground. Like for all the world to this, was there a pavoiſade framed and brought cloſe to that part of the wall: and when armed men were mounted upon it, they that ſtood upon the very ridg thereof, were as high full as the defendants which kept the wall: who being once beaten back and turned down, two enſigns of ſouldiers gat over into the City. The only difference between this pavoiſade and the other above deſcribed was this, that they on- F ly who ſtood in the front before and in the flanks, bare not their targets aloft above their own heads, becauſe their ſides and bodies ſhould not be naked and expoſed to hurt, but caried them before after the uſuall manner of fighting men in a battell. By which means, neither the arrows and darts diſcharged from the wall hurt them affront, nor the ſhot that light upon their target-fence took any hold, but glanced and glid down-ward from the top without doing any harm, like to rain water that ſhooteth from the ridg of an houſe, and runneth down the eves. The Conſul likewiſe, now that Heraclea was won, advanced forwards with his army thither, pretending as though he marched toward Dium, and as if after he had chaſed and driven the King from thence, he minded to paſſed forward alſo into Pieria. But preparing now againſt winter, he commanded to make the waies fit and handſome, for the carriage of proviſion out of Theſſa- G ly, and to chuſe out commondious places for garners: alſo to build certain houſes, wherein they that brought the proviſion, might lie in covert and lodg commodiouſly. Perſeus in the end having taken heart again and gathered his wits together, upon that late fright which had amazed his ſpirits, wiſhed then withall his heart, that his commandements had not been obeied, at what time as in a fearfull fit he gave expreſſe charge to caſt the treaſure into the ſea at Pella, and to ſet on fire, the arſenall at Theſſalonica. Andronicus being ſent for to the ſame purpoſe to Theſſalonica made no haſt to execute his will, but rifled out the time for the nonce, leaving the King ſome reſpite to repent, as it fel out indeed. Nicias was not ſo provident and wel adviſed at Pella, H in throwing away ſome part of the mony which he there found: howbeit he thought his fault ſuch, as might in ſome ſort be remedied and amended, for that, all the ſaid treaſure in manner was recovered by the means of certain dyvers that fiſhed for it under water, and fetcht it up from the bottom of the ſea. But the King himſelf was ſo aſhamed of this fooliſh fear, that in a melan-cholly he commanded thoſe poor dyvers to be ſecretly murdered, yea, and afterwards Andronicus and Nicias alſo; the end that no perſon ſhould remain alive that was privy to that ſottiſh commandment of his.

Amids theſe affairs, C. Martius having looſed to ſea from Heraclea, and with his fleet ſailed to Theſſalonica, landed his armed ſouldiers in divers places of the ſhore, and made waſt in the territory all about: and when they made ſallies out of the City and charged upon him, after ſome for- I tunat skirmiſhes, he chaſed them back and beat them within the wals. So as at length he terrified the town it ſelf: but not only they who ranged up and down here and there, unadviſedly approached the wals, were wounded with ſhot diſcharged out of inſtruments of all ſorts, planted upon the wals; but thoſe alſo who were in the ſhips, were hurt with ſtones, weighed and levelled from engins a far off. Upon which occaſion he commanded his ſouldiers to retire a ſhipboord, and leaving the ſiege of Theſſalonica, they paſſed from thence to Ænia, a City fifteen miles off, ſituate in a fertile ſoil juſt over-againſt Pydna. When they had ſpoiled the territory lying to that City, they coaſted along the ſhore and arrived at Antigonia. Where, being ſet a land, firſt they ſpoiled the countrey in every quarter, and brought good ſtore of prizes to their ſhips: but afterwards, as they ſtragled out of order and diſbanded, the Macedonians, as well footmen as K horſe, ran upon them, and chaſed them as they fled apace to the ſea ſide; in which rout they ſlew about 500 and took as many priſoners. And nothing elſe provoked the courage of the Romans (in regard as well of utter deſpair otherwiſe to ſave themſelves, as of the indignity it ſelf, ſo to hazard their honour) but only the extream neceſsity wherein they ſtood, having no means to recover their ſhips in ſafety. Whereupon they turned head, and renewed the fight upon the very ſea ſtrand. They alſo who were a ſhipboord, ſurccoured and helped them. In which conflict, two hundred Macedonians loſt their lives, and as many were taken priſoners. From Antigonea the fleet weighed anchor, & made head toward the territory of Pallene, where the ſouldiers were ſet on ſhore to ſpoil the countrey. The territory appertained to the confines of the Caſſandreans, the moſt fruitfull tract of thoſe parts which they had coaſted and ſailed by. There, King Eumenes be- L ing departed from Elea with twenty war ſhips met with them, & likewiſe five other covert ſhips were ſent from King Pruſias. The Pretor ſeeing this good encreaſe and addition of his forces, * Caſandrea took a better heart unto him, even to beſiege * Caſſandrea. This City was built by King Caſſander, in the very ſtreight & gullet which joineth the territory of Pallene with the reſt of the Macedonian countrey, encloſed of the one ſide with the Toronian ſea, and on the other with the Macedonian. For there lyeth out a bank or ſhelf like a tongue into the ſea, upon which the City ſtand-eth, and beareth unto the deep, no leſſe in compaſſe and quantity then is the mountain Athos. It butteth full againſt Magneſia, with two promontories of unequall bigneſs; of which the greater is called Poſideum; the leſſe Canaſtrium. This town they began to aſſail in two divers parts. The Roman (Pretor) drew his fortifications to a place called Clita, oppoſing certain ſtrong forked M ſtakes for to debar and ſhut up the way from the Macedonian ſea to the Toronian. On the other ſide there is an Euripe or arm of the ſea, from which quarter Eumenes gave the aſſault. The moſt trouble and toil that the Romans found, was in damming and filling up the trench, which Perſeus had caſt againſt them a little before. And as the Pretor enquired where the earth was beſtowed which was thrown out of the trench aforeſaid, becauſe he could ſee no heaps thereof any where, there were ſhewed unto him certain vaults and arches within, which bewraied a new wall, not built to the thickneſſe of the old, but with perpend work, laid with one courſe of brick and no more. Whereupon he reſolved to pierce through the ſaid wall, and ſo to make way into the City.
The which he thought to execute and perform without being diſcovered, in caſe he ſcaled the wall in another quarter, and by making a ſhout and alarm there, withdrew all the defendants of N the City to the guard of that one place. There lay in garriſon at Caſſandrea (being a ſufficient number of ſerviceable yong men of the City) eight hundred Agrians, and two thouſand Peneſtins of Sclavony, ſent from thence by Pleuratus: and both theſe nations are hardy warriors. Whiles theſe defended the wals manfully, and the Romans endevoured with all their might to mount over, the thin wals of the vaults and arches aforeſaid were wrought and digged through in the turning of an hand, and gave entrance into the City. Now if they who brake in, had been armed (as they were but pioners) the town had been taken at that inſtant. But when as the ſouldiers heard news that the ſaid work was finiſhed, they ſuddainly ſet up a cheerfull ſhout for joy, being ready ſome in one place and ſome in another to ruſh into the City. The enemies at the firſt wondred what the meaning ſhould be of that ſuddain cry: but the captains of the garriſon, Pytho and Philippus Pro- O co being once advertiſed that the town lay open, ſuppoſing that herein conſiſteth the vantage, who could firſt prevent the other and give the charge, ſallied forth with a ſtrong band of Agrians and Illyrians: and whiles the Romans rallied themſelves ſome from this place, and others from that, and were called together for to enter the City with banner diſplaied, they ſet upon them unready as they were, and not ranged in any good order, put them to flight and chaſed them as far as to the trench, where they overthrew them one upon another by heaps: 600 or very were there killed;

A and in maner whom they could reach between the wal & the trench were sore hurt. The Pre. thus overtaken in his own enterprise, was not so hasty to project any new designs; neither sped Eumenes any better, albeit at one time he assaulted the City both by land nd sea. Wherupon they accorded both, so set strong guards, for to impeach the passage of all garrisons out of Macedony thither; and (since open force took no better effect) to assail the wals with fabricks & engins. As they were busie in preparation thereof, there arived ten frigots of the Kings, sent from Macedony with certain select auxiliary Gauls. These when they perceived their enemies ships riding at anchor, sailed in single range one after another, as close as possibly they could to the shore in the dark night, and so entred the City. The bruit that went of this new succour and garrison, forced as well the Romans as the King to give over the siege; so fetching a compasse about the promontory, they
B arrived before Torone. And when they began to lie against it, after they perceived once there was a valiant company there to defend it, they abandoned their enterprire without effect, & sailed to Demetrias. Being approached thither, and seeing the wals full of armed men, they passed by and anchored at Iolcos: intending after they had spoiled the territory, to set upon Demetrias. Mean-while, they Consul also, because he would not sit still doing nothing in the enemie's countrey, sent M. Popilius with five thousand souldiers to give the assault to the City Melibœa. Seated it is at the foot of the mountain Ossa, on that side which looketh to Thessaly, and very fitly
C for the purpose commandeth Demetrias. The first arrivall of the enemies put the inhabitants of the place in great affright; but after they had recovered their spirits danted with so unexpected fear, they ran in arms to the gates, and up to the wals, where they doubted and suspected any place like to give entrance, nd incontinently cut off all hope from the enemies, that it could possibly be forced at the first assault. Whereupon they prepared to lay siege unto it, & began to make fabricks and engins to batter the wals. Perseus having intelligence, that in one instant both Melibœa was beleaguered by the Consul, and also that the fleet anchored before Iolcos, to the intent that from thence he might go in hand to assail Demetrias: sent Euphranor one of his captains,
D with a chosen regiment of two thousand souldiers to Melibœa; with this charge and direction, That if he could raise the siege from Melibœa and force the Romans to depart, he shou'd march secretly to Demetrius, & put himself within the town, before the Romans could remove from Iolcos and advance before the City. The assailants of Melibœa discovering him with his forces all at once upon the higher places, quit their fabricks and engins in fearful hast, and set them all on fire; and thus they departed from before Melibœa. Euphranor having levied the siege from the one City, forthwith led his army to Demetrius. And then the citizens assured themselves, that they should be able not only to defend the City against the siege, but also to save their territories from wast and spoil: and so they made sallies upon the forragers dispersed loosly here and there, not without drawing bloud of their enemies. Howbeit the Pretor and the King rode about the wals, and viewed the situation of the town, if peradventure they could espie any one place which they were
E like to force, either with battery of engins or force of arms. The voice went, that by the means of Cydas the Cretensian, and Antiochus governor of Demetrias there was a treaty of peace and amity between Philip and Eumenes. But howsoever it was, this is certain, both Eumenes and the Pretor departed from Demetrias. As for Eumenes, he sailed to the Consul, and testified unto him the joy that he conceived for his safe and prosperous entrance into Macedony; and from thence returned to Pergamus into his own realm. But Martius Figulus the Pretor, when he had sent part of his fleet into the harbor of Sciathus there to winter, with the rest of his ships went to Oreum in Bœotia: supposing it a commodious City, from whence victuals and all provisions might be sent to the armies that abode either in Macedony or Thessaly. As touching Eumenes, sundry
F authors have written diversly. If a man should go by Valerius Antias and beleeve him, he reporteth, that neither the Pretor had any help from him by his navy, notwithstanding that oftentimes he had sent for him by his letters; nor took his leave of the Consul in good terms with favour, at what time as he was to depart into Asia, as being highly displeased, that he was not permitted to quarter with him in one & the same camp; insomuch as he could not possibly be entreated by him, to leave behind that Cavalry of Gauls which he had brought thither with him. As for Attalus his brother, he remained still with the Consul (as Valerius saith) and continued syncere and faithful unto him without any change and alteration; yea and performed right good service in all that war.

During these wars in Macedony, there came Embassadors from beyond the Alps to Rome sent from a petty K. of the Gauls (Balanos he had to name, but of what linage he was descended it is not recorded) promising aid to the Macedonian war. Thanked they were from the Senat, and presents were sent unto them: to wit, a chain of gold weighing two pound; certain golden cups
G of four pound weight, a brave courser barbed and trapped, and an horsemans armor. After these Gauls were gone out of place, the Embassadors of Pamphylia brought with them into the Senat a golden crown, valewed at 20000 Philip-peeces of gold: their request was, that they might be permitted to set up the said present and oblation in the chappell of Iup. Opt. Max. and likewise to sacrifice within the Capitol. Their petition was ganted: and when these Embassadors were desious to renew the amity between them and the Romans, they received a gracious answer, and had of them a reward sent of two thousand Asses. Then the Embassadors of King Prusias, and anon after, others from the Rhodians had audience; who of one and the same argument discoursed diversly; for both tended to one thing, namely, a treaty for reconcilement of peace between the Rom. & K. Perseus. Prusias seemed to intreat rather then to demand: protesting that he "had ever to that day ſtood with the Romans in that war; and willingly would friend themſelves H

"to the very end thereof: but ſince that there came Embaſſadors unto him from Perſeus, and
"dealt with him to make an end of the war between him and the Romans, and for that he pro-
"miſed them to be a mediator and interceſſor for him to the Romans; therefore his requeſt
"unto them was, (if they could ſo find in theirs hearts) to ſtint their anger, & ſo they ſhould uſe
"him in any ſervice, as one that would acknowledg himſelf beholden unto them for a favor, in "effecting this atonement and reconciliation. In this maner (I ſay) ſpake the K. his Embaſſadors.
"But the Rhodians contrariwiſe, in a proud humour of theirs, reckoned up a beadroll of their "demerits towards the people of Rome, attributing the greater part (beleeve me) of the victory of "K. Antiochus to themſelves: moreover they added and ſaid, that when the Macedonians and "Romans were at peace, they began to enter into league and amity with K. Perſeus: which they I "had interrupted and diſcontinued againſt their will; not upon any deſert or occaſion given of "his part, but only becauſe it pleaſed the Romans to draw them into the aſſociation of the war.
"Three daies now already (ſay they) have we felt the ſmart of this war and lived by the loſſe: by "reaſon that the ſeas are ſhut up from us, and our Iland is decaied and diſtreſſed for need and "want, having loſt our tollage and cuſtoms iſſuing from the ſeas, which we are not able to en"dure any longer, have addreſſed Embaſſadors to Perſeus into Macedony, to intimate unto him, "that the Rhodians will and pleaſure was, that he ſhould grow to a compoſition and be at "peace with the Romans. Our ſelves alſo are ſent to Rome to declare the ſame: and likewiſe to "denounce, that whoſoever ſhall impeach and hinder this courſe tending to pacification, the "Rhodians wil conſider of them accordingly & bethink how they are to proceed againſt them. K
I am verily perſwaded, that there is no man at this day, who can hear or read this, but his ſto-mack will riſe thereat with indignation; gueſſe then thereby how the LL. of the Senat of Rome were affected and touched as then, at the hearing thereof. Claudius mine author ſaith that there was no anſwer at all given unto them. Only an areſt or decree of the Senat was read before them, importing thus much, that by order from the people of Rome, the Carians & Lycians were made free: and preſently were letters diſpatched to both nations to ſignifie ſo much unto them. Which when the principal perſons of the embaſſage once heard, even he, whoſe big and brave words a little before, the whole Senat-houſe was hardly able to contain, fell down flat before them in a ſwoon and extaſie. Other Hiſtorians write, that this anſwer was returned, "That the people of "Rome at the very beginning of this war, knew aſſuredly (by intelligence given from perſons of L "right good credit) how the Rhodians had ſecretly complotted with Perſeus againſt the ſtate of "Rome: and if there had been ſome doubt thereof before, yet the words of the Embaſſadors ere-"while delivered, made all cleer and put it paſt peradventure: and no marvell, ſince that for the "moſt part it falleth out, that ſuch cautelous practiſes, howſoever at the firſt they are covertly & "cleanly caried, yet one time or other are bewraied and diſcovered. Let the Rhodians ſend their "meſſengers over the world and ſpare not; let them make themſelves judges to determine of "war and peace at their pleaſure: as for the Romans they will take arms in hand, and lay them "down again at the will and appointment of the gods in heaven. We are well holpen up now in "deed, if we muſt have the gods no more to be witneſſes of our accords, but the Rhodians for"ſooth. And muſt the Romans (I would not elſe) be ruled by them, and withdraw their forces
"out of Macedony? They will conſider and adviſe themſelves how to proceed againſt us! How M
"ſhall we do then? What the Rhodians will ſee to, well may they perhaps themſelves know:
"but the people of Rome (that is certain) well conſider indeed and reſolve after that Perſeus is "vanquiſhed (which they hope will not be long firſt) to recompence and requite every City and "ſtate according as they have deſerved in the ſervice of this war. As ſharp as this anſwer was, yet they ſent a reward to theſe Embaſſ. to every one of them 2000 aſses; but none would they receive.

After this, were the letters read of Q. Marcius the Conſul, conteining thus much namely,
How he had paſſed over the ſtreights of the forreſt, and was come into Macedony, where he had proviſion of victuals which the Pretor had given order for out of other places to ſerve for winter: and beſides had taken up of the Epirots twenty thouſand Modii of wheat and ten thouſand of barley, for which corn they ſhould make mony ready at Rome to content their Embaſſadors. N Alſo that they muſt ſend from Rome ſouldiers liveries and other apparel; and need he had beſides of 200 horſe or thereabout: eſpecially of Numidia: for in thoſe parts he had no plenty of any thing.
Hereupon an act was granted out of the Senat, That all theſe things ſhould be done according to the tenor of the Conſul his letters. So C. Sulpitius the Pretor bargained for the tranſporting over into Macedony of 600 ſide caſſocks and 3000 ſhort coats or jackets together with horſes; for to be diſpoſed and diſtributed at the diſcretion of the Conſul: and beſides paid the Embaſſadors of the Epirots good mony for their grain. He brought alſo into the Senat Onesimus the ſon of Pytho a noble perſonage of Macedony. This man was evermore of counſel with the K. perſwading him to peace: and admoniſhed him as his father Philip before him obſerved an order even to the time of death to read over twice a day from point to point the inſtrument of the accord & cove- O nants between him and the Romans; ſo he alſo would take up that good uſtome and practiſe the ſame if not ſo continually yet at leaſtwiſe many a time and often. But when he could by no meanes ſcare him nor avert his mind from war, he began at firſt to withdraw and abſent himſelf, alledging for his excuſe one while this occaſion, and otherwhiles that becauſe he would not be preſent at the debating of thoſe matters which he approved not: and in the end perceiving

that

A that he was had in ſome jealouſie, & otherwhiles charged to be a traitor, he changed his allegeance revolted to the Rom. and ſerved the Conſul in right good ſtead This Oneſimus being brought into the Senat houſe, related all theſe premiſſes: whereupon the Senat ordained, that he ſhould be enrolled formally in the number of allies: alſo, that he ſhould be provided of a lodging, and his ordinary expences for the time allowed at the Cities charge. Moreover, 200 acres of land in the territory of Tarentum, which was confiſcat to the people of Rome, ſhould be ſet out for him; and a meſſuage in Tarentum bought for his habitation. To ſee all this performed, C. Decimus the Pretor had in charge.

The Cenſors upon the * thirteenth of December, took a ſurvey of the number of citizens and an eſtimat of their goods, more ſtreightly then aforetime. Many were unknighted and had their B horſes taken from them; and P. Rutilius among the reſt, who when he was Tribune of the Com. had been their accuſer and called them ſo violently to reckoning; degraded he was beſides and diſplaced out of his own tribe, & made no better then a very labourer in the Cities works. Whereas the one moity of the Cities renews and profits for that yeer, was ſet by and allowed unto them by the treaſurers (aceording to an ordinance of the Senat) Tib. Sempronius out of the mony aſsigned unto him, purchaſed the houſe of P. Africanus on the back ſide of the old Curia neer the image of Fortunus: the ſhops alſo wherein they ſold wooll and the other adjoining thereto, all to the uſe of the City. He cauſed likewiſe the ſtately palace to be built, which afterwards was called Sempronia Baſilica.

* Pore Veteres.

Now was the yeer come about and well neer at an end, when by reaſon of the great care prinC cipally about the Macedonian war, men began to talk, whom they were to create for Conſuls againſt the next yeer, to atchieve and end the ſaid war? Whereupon there paſſed a decree of the Senat, that Cn. Servilius with all ſpeed poſsible, ſhould make haſt to Rome for to hold a general aſſembly of election. This decree Sulpitius the Pretor within few daies after read to the Coſ. to the end that he ſhould repair home into the City before the day prefixed. Whereupon both the Coſ. haſtned; & the ſaid election was alſo furniſhed by the day appointed. Coſſ. theſe were created, L. Æmylius Paulus the ſecond time (even 14 yeers after his former Conſulſhip) with C. Licinius Craſſus. The day following were the Pretors alſo choſen, to wit, Cn. Bæbius Tamphilus, L. Anicius Gallus, Cn. Octavius, P. Fonteius Balbus, Mar. Ebutius Helva, and C. Papyrius Carbo. The carefull regard of the Macedonian war cauſed every thing to be done with greater expedition. And thereD fore it was thought meet, that theſe new elect magiſtrats ſhould caſt lots out of hand for their provinces, that it might be known to whether Coſ. Macedony, and to which Pretor the conduct of the navy ſhould fall; that thereupon they might preſently conſider and provide for all things requiſit to the war, & require thead vice of the Senat as need required. Ordained it was when the Conſuls were entred into their office, to ſolemnize the Latine feſtivall holidaies as ſoon as they might conveniently, without offence of the gods and breach of any religious order: that the Conſul whoſe lot fell to go into Macedony, were not deteined behind upon any occaſion. After theſe ordinances, Italy and Macedony, were nominated for the provinces of the two Conſuls; and for the Pretors, the two civill juriſdictions within the City of Rome, the navy, Spain, Sicily, and Sardinia. In fine, Macedony fell to Æmylius the Conſul, and Italy to Licinius. Of Pretors, Cn. Bœbius was lord chief E juſtice of the pleas of citizens, and L. Anicius of aliens. And if the Senat thought good to ſend the navy any whither, Cn. Octavius had the the charge thereof as L. admirall. P. Fonteius was appointed by lot L. Deputy of Spain, M. Ebutius of Sicily, and C. Papyrius of Sardinia.

All men ſoon ſaw, that L. Æmylius intended not to go coldly about the managing of that war; both for that he was not an ordinary man, but ſingular above all other, and alſo becauſe that night and day he muſed and ſtudied upon nothing elſe, but that which was requiſit and pertinent thereunto. The firſt thing of all wherewith he went in hand was this; a requeſt to the Senat for to diſpatch certain delegat commiſsioners into Macedony, to viſit the armies there and the armado; to make true report upon their certain knowledg, what was needfull to be done for the ſupply of the forces as well by land as ſea; alſo to lie in eſpiall & eſtimat as much as poſsibly they could, the F Kings power; moreover, what quarter of the province were taken by our men, and which the the enemies kept; whether the Romans lay encamped ſtill within the forreſt, or if they were paſſed beyond the ſtreights and come into the even ground; who continued truſty allies, who were ſuſpected, who hung in doubtfull terms, as whoſe faith depended upon fortune: who ſeemed to be profeſſed enemies: how great the proviſions were of victuals; from whence they were conveighed by land; from what places tranſported by water; & laſtly, what exploits had been done the ſummer paſt both by land and ſea: ſuppoſing, that for a light given and certain intelligence delivered of theſe things, he might be ſurely directed in the caſting and laying of future plots & deſignments. So the Senat granted out a commiſsion to Cn. Servilius the Coſ. for to ſend the delegats into Macedony, ſuch as L. Æmylius thought good of. Whereupon within two daies after, Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus and A. Licinius Nerva, took their journey as legats and commiſsioners. News G came in the latter end of this yeer, that it rained ſtones twice, namely in the territory of Rome, and likewiſe about Veii: and therefore a novendiall ſacrifice was celebrated. This yeer there died certain prieſts, namely, Pub. Quintilius Varus, a flamin of Mars, and M. Claudius Marcellus a Decemvir, in whoſe room was ſubſtituted Cneus Octavius. And now noted it was, that the magnificence and port of the people of Rome encreated, for that in the plaies called Circenſes exhibited by Publius Cornelius Scipio Naſica, and Publius Lentulus Ædiles Curule, threeſcore and

3 wild beasts out of Africk, with 40 bears, & elephants, were baited to make sport to the people. H

When L. Æmylius Paulus and P. Licinius entred their Consulship upon the fifteenth of March, which was the beginning of the yeer following, the LL. of the Senat were in great expectancy, and especially what the Consul would propose unto them as touching the Macedonian war, which was his proper province. But Paulus said that he had nothing to propound and put to councel, seeing that the Delegats aforesaid were not returned. And at Brundusium (quoth he) they now are, having twice in their voiage upon the sea been driven back by tempest and cast upon Dyrrhachium. But so soon as I am once advertised and have perfect knowledg of those things that first are to be known, I will then consult; and that will be within very few daies. Now to the end that nothing may stay and hinder his journey he told them, that the even before the Ides of April, was appointed for the solemnity of the Latine festival holydaies. And after sacrifice duly performed [upon the Albane hill] the Senat should no sooner ordein, but he and Cn. Octavius would set forth and put themselves on their way. As for C. Licinius his colleague, his charge should be in his absence to provide and send all things requisit and needfull for this war. Mean while (quoth he) the embassies of forrain nations may have audience given. So when he had sacrificed as the maner was, before they took in hand the great affairs of State, the Embassadors of Alexandria, from King Ptolomeus and queen Cleopatra, were called in. Clad they were in poor array, the hair of their head long, their beards side and overgrown: and carrying in their hands branches of the Olive-tree, they entred into the Senat, and fell groveling and prostrat upon the floor. Their habit and apparel was not so simple and mournful; their look and countenance not so heavy and sorrowfull, but their speech was more piteous and lamentable. Antiochus now King of Syria, and who had sometime been hostage at Rome under a colourable pretence of honesty and equity to restore Ptolomæus the elder to his Kingdom, made hot war upon his yonger brother, who then held Alexandria: and after a victory obtained in sea-fight neer Pelusium he made a bridg of hasty work upon the river Nilus, over which he transported his army, & now laid siege to Alexandria: so as by all likelyhood he would shortly by way of conquest be lord of a most rich and wealthy Kingdome. In which regard, these Embassadors made pitifull moan and grievous complaint, "beseeching withall the Senat, of their aid and succour to that realm and those "Kings, who were such friends to their seignory and dominion. For perswaded they were that "the people of Rome had done so much for Antiochus in particular, & were of that account & au- "thority with all other Kings and nations, that if they would but send their Embassadors to inti- "mate thus much, that the Senat was not well pleased with waging war upon confederat Kings, "he would presently raise his siege, depart from before the wals of Alexandria, and withdraw his "army clean away into Syria. But if they protracted the time long and delaied thus to do, then "should Ptolomeus and Cleopatra within a while be driven out of their realm, and forced to come "to Rome, with some shamefull spot of dishonour to the people of Rome, in that they had not set "their helping hand in that extream danger of all their fortunes. The LL. of the Senat moved with compassion at the praiers of these Alexandrians, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenas, C. Decimius, and A. Hostilius as Embassadors to determine and make an end of the war between those two Princes. In commission they had first to go unto Ptolomæus, and then to Antiochus, and to let them both understand, that unlesse they surceased and gave over arms, they would take him neither for friend nor confederate, whom it was long of that the war was not given over. So these three together with the Alexandrian Embassadors, took their leave within three daies & departed. Then the forsaid Delegats returned from out of Macedony, the last day of the feastivall games to Minerva called Quinquatrus, and not before they were welcome; for so looked for they were, had it not been eventide when they came, the Consuls would immediatly have called the Senat together. But the morrow after the Senat sat, and those commissioners had audience given. Report they made first, that with more danger then profit ensuing, the army entred into Macedony over those passes and streights, where was no way nor passage at all. Item, that the King kept the countrey of Pieria, into which the Roman armie was now advanced, and were so neer encamped one to the other, that nothing but the river Enipeus between kept them asunder; that neither the K. made offer of battel, nor the Rom. were of sufficient strength to challenge & force him to fight: moreover, that the winter had overtaken them (a time unseasonable for warlike exploits) that the souldiers were nuzled and nourished in idleness, notwithstanding they had victuals to serve no longer then six daies; also, that by report the Macedonians were thirty thousand strong. Were it so that Ap. Claudius had a good and sufficient power about Lychnidum, he might be able to trouble the K. and put him to his trumps in a battel; but now both Appius and the garrison with him, are themselves in extream jeopardy, unless with speed either a complete army be sent thither, or else they draw from thence where they are, into Macedony. Over and besides they related, how from the camp they went towards the fleet, where they heard say, that some of the sea-faring men and mariners were dead of sickness, others, and namely, those of Sicily above the rest were gone home again to their own houses, insomuch as there were not men enow to serve the ships; & those that remained, had neither their wages paid & mony to put in their purse, nor liveries & apparel to hang on their backs. As for Eumenes & his fleet, they (like ships driven to a coast by force of wind and weather, without any other errand or cause else) were come and gone again; and it seemed the mind of that K. was not well setled and resolved. But as they reported al of Eumenes suspiciously & in doubtful terms, so they assured them of the singular fidelity & constancy of Attilus his

A his brother. When theſe Legats had ſpoke, then ſaid L. Æmylius, Let us debate now in councill what is to be done as concerning the ſaid war. So the Senat ordained, that for eight legions, the Conſuls and the people ſhould elect an equall number of martiall Tribunes or Colonels, the one as many as the other; and that none ſhould be created and advanced to that place for that year, but ſuch as had born ſome honourable dignity: then, out of all thoſe Tribunes thus elected, that L. Æmylius ſhould make choiſe for thoſe two legions which were to go into Macedony, of whom he would himſelf: alſo, that after the ſolemnity of the Latine feaſts performed, L. Æmylius the Conſul, and C. Octavius the Prætor and Admirall of the fleet, ſhould depart into their Province: A third was joyned in commiſſion with them, to wit, L. Anicius the Prætor and L. chief Juſtice for ſtrangers. And ordained it was, that he ſhould paſs into Illyricum about Lychnidum, for to ſucceed
B Ap. Claudius. The charge of taking muſters was put upon C. Licinius the Conſul. He had commandment to enroll ſeven thouſand [foot] Citizens of Rome, and two hundred horſemen and to charge the Latine allies with a levy of ſeven thouſand footmen, and four hundred horſe. Alſo to ſend letters unto Cn. Servilius, who governed the Province of Gaul, to enroll ſix hundred men of arms. This army he had commandment to ſend with all convenient ſpeed to his Collegue into Macedony, ſo as in that Province there ſhould not be above two legions, and the ſame full and compleat, containing ſix thouſand foot, and three hundred horſe apeece. As for the ſurcreaſe, as well of the Cavalry as Infantry, they ſhould be diſpoſed and beſtowed in ſundry garriſons. And all ſuch as were unmeet for ſervice, were to be caſſed and ſent away. Moreover, the allies were put to ſet out and find 10000 foot, and 800 horſe. And thoſe were to ſerve in garriſon under Anici-
C us, over and above the two legions (which he was commanded to lead into Macedony) conſiſting of 5200 foot, and 300 horſemen either of them. Alſo for the navy were enrolled 5000 mariners and rowers. Licinius the Coſ. was appointed to defend and kep in obedience his Province with two legions, and to take beſides of allies ten thouſand foot, and ſix hundred horſe.

After theſe ordinances of the Senat were accompliſhed, L. Æmylius the Coſ. went forth of the Senat houſe into the common place before the aſſembly of the people; where he made a ſpeech unto them in this wiſe following: "Me thinks I perceive and ſee, my good friends and Citizens "of Rome, that ye have ſhewed more apparent tokens of joy and gratulation in my behalf, for that "the Province of Macedony is faln to my lot; than either at the time that I was declared and ſa- "luted Coſ. or that day whereupon I firſt entred into government: & for no other reaſon in the D "world, but upon the opinion which you have conceived, that the Macedonian war, which hath "ſo long continued, may be brought by my means to ſuch an end as beſeemeth the greatneſs and "majeſty of the people of Rome. And for mine own ſelf I have good hope, that as the gods in fa- "vour have directed this ſortilege, ſo they will be preſent and propitious unto me in performing "the ſervice. In theſe matters, I ſay, I am but carried partly with conceit and partly with hope. But "this one thing I am aſſured of; yea and I dare affirm and promiſe on my own head, that I will "endeavour my ſelf and employ all that is in me, that this your good opinion of me may not be "in vain conceived. As for all things neceſſary and requiſite to this war, both the Senat hath or- "dained; & alſo, for that they have thought good I ſhould depart immediatly (for which my ſelf "am well pleaſed and contented, neither in me there ſhall be any delay) my Collegue C. Licinius,
E "a ſingular man, and of great valour, will provide with as great care and diligence, as if himſelf "had the full conduct of this war. For the effecting whereof, ſee that whatſoever I ſhall write ei- "ther to the Senat, or to you, ye beleeve for true: as for running rumours which have no certain "author, give no ear and belief thereto; neither feed them with your fooliſh credulity. For now "adaies verily, (a thing that I have obſerved to fall out ordinarily in this war) there is no man ſet- "teth ſo little by the common bruits that are blazed abroad, but his ſpirit and courage may be "thereby quailed and danted. In all meetings now, yea, and at every boord (I would not elſe) ye "ſhall have them, that in their table talk will lead your armies into Macedony: that know where "they are to lodge and encamp; what commodious places are to be ſeized and kept with garri- "ſons; at what time and through which paſs the entry muſt be made into Macedony; where the
F "garners and ſtorehouſes for corn ſhould be built and ſet; which way by land and ſea both, the "proviſions of victuals ought to be brought; when the time ſerveth to encounter and fight with "the enemy, and when to ſit ſtill and reſt. Neither are they content to ſet down and pronounce, "what is to be done for the better: but if ought hap to be managed otherwiſe than they have "judged expedient, they are ſo bold as to controll the Coſ. yea, and ready to commence proceſs a- "gainſt him judicially. Theſe are ſhrowd hindrances, I may tell you, to warriors & men of action. "For all men have not the gift of reſolution and conſtancy to neglect the ſpeech and talk of men, "as ſometimes Fabius had, who choſe rather to have his authority & command diminiſhed and "impaired by the folly and vanity of lewd people, than with their favourable applauſe and good "opinion to manage his affairs but untowardly. Yet take me not ſo, as if I were a man that would G "have no captains to be admoniſhed and adviſed by others; nay contrariwiſe, of this judgment "I am, That he who worketh all by his ſelf-wit & followeth only his own head is ſelf-willed and "proud, and nothing ſage & wiſe. What is then to be done? Firſt, in mine opinion, Generals and "Commanders of armies, are to be inſtructed by diſcreet and prudent men; by ſuch as are skilful "by profeſſion in feats of arms and military ſcience; by thoſe alſo that by long practiſe are "throughly experienced: nay more than that, they are to be taught and counſelled by them, that "are uſually preſent and converſant in the execution of affairs, who daily ſee the advantage of

* The laſt of February. " in the camp. And this oration ended, and the Latine feſtivals ſolemnized the day before the * ca-
" lends of March, together with the ſacrifices duly celebrated upon the Alban mount: the Coſ.
and the Prætor Cn. Octavius departed incontinently into Macedony. It is recorded in the Chronicles that the Coſ. was honoured with a greater frequency that accompanied him, than uſually had been known: and that men preſaged in manner aſſuredly, the end of the Macedonian war: how the Coſ ſhould have a ſpeedy return, and obtain a brave and glorious triumph.

During theſe occurrents in Italy, Perſeus who (becauſe he was to be at the charges of diſburſing money) never thought of it, to go through with that which before he had begun, namely, to ad-joyn unto him Gentius King of the Illyrians: ſo ſoon as he perceived that the Romans were en-tred the ſtraights, and the war come now to this extremity of hazard: thought good now to make K that ſure and put it off no longer. Whereas therefore he had covenanted & promiſed by his Embaſſador Hippias three hundred talents of ſilver, with condition alſo, that for ſecurity hoſtages ſhould be put in of both parties interchangeably: he ſent Pantaucus one of his moſt truſty friends to diſpatch and make an end of this affair. This Pantaucus met the Illyrian King at Medeon in the Country of Labeatis: where he both took an oath of the King, and alſo received his hoſtages.
Gentius likewiſe ſent his embaſſador, named Olympio, to demand the ſemblable oath of Perſeus, and require hoſtages accordingly: with him were certain perſons ſent of purpoſe to receive the money, who alſo by the advice of the ſaid Pantaucus were to go in embaſſie with the Macedonians to Rhodes: and the men hereto appointed were Parmenio and Morcus. But they had in charge and commiſſion after the oath taken, after hoſtages & money received, to go to Rhodes, & not before. L Good hope they conceived that the Rhodians might be ſollicited and induced to take arms a-gainſt the Romans, by uſing the name of theſe two KK. at once: and this account they made, that if this State which carried the renown and honour above all others for ſea-ſervice, would once combine and band with them, they ſhould leave the Romans no hope at all, either on land or ſea.
When theſe Illyrians arrived, Perſeus departed with all his Cavalry from before the river Enipeus where he was encamped, and encountred them near Dium. There were all the complements performed according to the covenants, in the ſight and midſt of the Cavalry, whom the K. of purpoſe would needs have to be preſent at this accord of aſſociation made between him and K. Gentius, ſuppoſing that it would comfort & encourage them the more. So the hoſtages were given and taken in the preſence of them all. They alſo who were to receive the money were ſent to Pella M where the K. his treaſure lay: and thoſe that ſhould go to Rhodes with the Illyrian embaſſadors had cõmandment to embark at Theſſalonica. Now was Metrodorus there, lately come from Rhodes: who aſſured them by the means of Dyon & Polyaratus, two principall perſonages of that City, that the Rhodians were preſt and ready to war. Whereupon the ſaid Metrodorus was appointed the chief in this embaſſage of Macedonians and Illyrians together. At the ſame time likewiſe was addreſſed and imparted both unto Eumenes & alſo unto Antiochus, ſuch advice and counſel in common, as the preſent condition wherin their affairs ſtood, might miniſter & afford argument: namely, " That a free City and a K. were two; by nature, enemies that poſſibly could not ſort together:
" That the people of Rome went in hand with them ſeverally one after another: & (that which was
" a greater indignity & unſupportable) uſed the force of KK to overthrow the ſtate of KK. For ſo, N
" by the aid of Attalus they had brought his father Philip to ruin: by the help likewiſe of Eumenes, " & partly alſo of his father Philip, Antiochus was defeated; & even now againſt himſelf both Eu-
" menes and Pruſias were put in arms. If the kingdom of Macedony were once ſubverted have at
" Aſia next; which the Romans have in ſome part ſeized already for their own under a colour
" of enfranchizing Cities, & ſetting them free: & then they will not leave untill they have Syria " too. For now is Pruſias preferred in honour before Eumenes; & Antiochus for all his conqueſt is
" chaſed & debarred out of Ægypt, which ought to have been the recompence of the war by him " enterprized & atchieved. In theſe regards Perſeus advertiſed e[illegible] them to conſider & provide therefore either to force the Romans to make peace with him[illegible] hold them for the common enemies of all KK. in caſe they perſiſted ſtill in ſo unjuſt a[illegible]miſſion that the em- O baſſadors had to Antiochus was apert & open: but unto Eumenes [illegible]baſſador was ſent under a pretence of ranſoming certain captives: but practiſed there were under hand more ſecret complots; which cauſed Eumenes even then to be ſuſpected & odious unto the Romans, yea, & charged afterward with more grievous matters, although untruly. For he was reputed little better than a traitor & a profeſſed enemy to their ſtate, whereas indeed both he & Perſeus ſtrove who could compaſs, ſurprize, & overtake one another better in fraud & avarice. Now there was one Cydas a Cretenſian,

A an inward & moſt ſecret friend to Eumenes: this man had communed firſt at Amphipolis with one Chimarus a countriman of his, who ſerved under Perſeus in the wars; and afterwards at Demetrias conferred with another named Menecrates; alſo with a certain third perſon, called Antiochus, all captains to K. Perſeus, even under the very wals of the foreſaid City. Over and beſides, Eropon who at this time was ſent, had beforetime been employed in two ſeverall embaſſies to the ſame Eumenes. Theſe ſecret communications and embaſſages were badly ſpoken of; but no man knew what was concluded between the two KK. Howbeit, thus the caſe ſtood: Eumenes as he had no mind nor intention to war upon Perſeus, ſo he was not deſirous in his heart that he ſhould have the victory of the Romans; not ſo much for the old enmity which had been between both their fathers, as for the hateful quarrels kindled among themſelves. For this concurrence & emu-
B lation there was between theſe two Princes, that Eumenes could never abide to ſee Perſeus for to purchaſe ſo great wealth, & ſo much honour, as he muſt needs acquire by the conqueſt of the Romans: he ſaw moreover, that Perſeus from the firſt beginning of this war ſought by all means poſſible for peace, & the nearer he was to danger & damage, aimed thereat every day more than other; employing his whole ſtudy & care about nothing elſe. He perceived alſo that among the Romans, becauſe the war grew to be longer than they hoped and looked for, as well their captains as the Senat were well enough content and very deſirous to ſee an end once of ſo troubleſome, hurtfull, and difficult a war. Knowing thus as he did, the mind and will of both parties, he enclined & framed to that which of it ſelf as he thought might fall out, where the ſtronger was weary and the weaker in fear: and therein deſired he to ſhew his double diligence, thereby to win a thank & pur-
C chaſe favour of both parts. For he entred into bargain with Perſeus for a ſum of money, one while not to aid the Romans either by land or ſea; another whiles to be a means for peace and to treat with the Romans thereabout, and not to meddle at all in the war, but to ſit ſtill: he capitulated (I ſay) for 1500 talents; making ſemblance and ſhew, that for the aſſurance both of the one and the other, ready he was not only to ſwear, but alſo to put in good and ſufficient hoſtages. Perſeus was the willingeſt man in the world to ſet in hand with this, as being driven thereto by the exigent of fear: and preſently without delay dealt with him as touching the hoſtages which were to be received: and in fine concluded it was, that they ſhould upon their delivery and receit be ſent into Creet. But when they came once to talk of the money aforeſaid, he hafted and ſtuck at that: and to ſay a truth, either of theſe two ſums (between Princes of ſo great name and honour) was but a
D baſe and diſhoneſt conſideration; a thing much unfitting (I wis) the giver, and more the receiver. Perſeus verily for his part, in hope to purchaſe peace with the Romans, was willing enough to be at the expence of ſo much money: mary, he ſaid that he would make paiment thereof when the thing was done and accompliſhed: & in the mean time lay it up ſafe for that purpoſe within the temple of Samothracia. Eumenes again, conſidering that the ſaid Iſland was an appurtenance to the dominion of Perſeus, could not ſee but that it was all one for it to lie there and in Pella: and therefore was earneſt to have part thereof in hand. Thus between them there was nothing but lying in the wind for the vantage, who could over-reach the other: & what was gained in the end but infamy and diſcredit? As for Perſeus, he not only let fall this deſign and loſt this opportunity, (and that by his nigardice only) when by the means of Eumenes he might have had either his mony
E ſure enough, or peace for it, (which indeed he ſhould have bought, if it had coſt him the one half of his kingdom,) and being once received into grace & favour [of the people of Rome] he might have defamed and brought into obloquy and danger his concurrent, by charging him to have received a piece of money for a bribe, and ſo juſtly have ſet the Romans upon his top: but alſo the aſſociation with King Gentius which now was at the point of a contract, was neglected; yea, and a mighty army of Gauls ſpread at that time all over Illyricum and preſented unto him, was even then refuſed and diſcharged by this pinching and ſaving of his money. For there came and offered their ſervice ten thouſand horſemen, and as many foot, and thoſe ſo well practiſed and ſo good of footmanſhip, that they were able to hold out & keep pace with horſes, yea, and run by their ſides; ſuch (I ſay) as when the riders were unhorſed and faln, could vault & mount on the empty horſe backs
F ready to fight in their turns. Theſe had bargained to have for pay every horſeman ten * Philip pieces [of gold] paid down aforehand, and a footman five, and their Captain a thouſand. Perſeus departed from his leaguer lying near the river Enipeus, and with the one half of his own forces met theſe coming upon the way, and cauſed proclamation to be made in all towns and villages near the high waies, To made ready and bring abroad their proviſion of victuals, and ſee that there were plenty of corn, of wine, and cattel. Himſelf brought with him horſes and trappings, and fine ſouldiers caſſocks, to beſtow as preſents upon the chief of them, with ſome little ſprinkling of gold to deal among a few of them; ſuppoſing that all the reſt beſides of common ſouldiers, might be drawn on and retained with bare hope. Thus he came to the City of Alamana, and encamped upon the bank of the river Axius. But the army of theſe Galatians were lodged about G Deſudaba in the country of Medica, and reſted there expecting the paiment of the money aforeſaid, according to covenant. But Perſeus ſent unto them Antigonus one of his gallants and courtiers, to will and command the multitude of the army to diſlodge and remove to Bylazora, a place ſo called in Paronia, and a good ſort of their chief to repair unto him. Now were they threeſcore and fifteen miles from the river Axius and the Kings camp. And when Antigonus had delivered unto them this mandat as he had in charge, and added beſides, with what care and diligence the King had laid his proviſions by the way of all things in great plenty for the army, and

* Philippeus nummus, was ſomewhat leſſe than our ſoveraign of 20 s. or 3 ducats.

with what gifts of apparell, ſilver, and horſes, he purpoſed to receive and entertain their Captains H at their firſt coming unto him: as for that (ſay they) we ſhall take knowledge thereof when we are in preſence perſonally: but now for this time, we demand, Whether ye have brought with you in ready coin according to bargain, that gold which is to be paid to the ſouldiers, as well horſe as foot? And when he could make no anſwer thereto, but was ſet nonplus; then the ſaid Clondicus their Prince, Go your waies then (qd. he) and tell your King and Maſter, that the Gauls unleſs they may receive the gold, and hoſtages beſides for their ſecurity, will not ſtir one foot forward. Relation being made hereof unto the K. he called his Councel: and when it was ſoon ſeen what they all would adviſe him to do; himſelf, who could skill better to keep his money together, than hold the royall eſtate of his kingdom, began to enter into a diſcourſe of a diſloyalty and ſavage nature of theſe Gauls; making remonſtrance, how he had experience by the calamities and I loſſes of many before him, that dangerous it was to receive ſo great a multitude of them within Macedony, for fear the Gauls would be found worſe neighbors than the Romans were enemies.
Five thouſand horſemen are ſufficient (qd. he) and ſo many well we may have good uſe of in wars, and need not be afraid of them for their number. But every man ſaw well enough, that it was the waging of ſuch a number that he feared and nothing elſe: but when no man durſt give him counſell albeit he ſeemed to ask their advice, Antigonus was ſent again with a meſſage unto the Gauls, That the King ſtood in need of five thouſand horſemen and no more, as for all the reſt, he weighed them not. When theſe Barbarians heard that, all the reſt began to mutter and grumble, yea, and to take great ſcorn and indignation, that they were levied and departed out of their native country for nothing: but Clondicus redemanded, Whether he would make preſent pay to thoſe five K thouſand, according to covenant, yea, or nay? but ſeeing that he was to ſeek, and made ſhifts to avoid a direct anſwer, he let this deceitfull meſſenger go his waies, and did no harm unto his per-ſon (a thing that Antigonus himſelf would ſcarcely have thought could poſſibly have been:) And ſo after they had given the waſte unto thoſe parts of Thracia which lay near to their way, they returned back again to the river Iſter. Which power of men, if it had paſſed the ſtraights of Perrhe-bia into Theſſaly againſt the Romans (although Perſeus had not ſtirred at all, but ſitten ſtill at E-nipeus) might not only have ſpoiled and laid bare the territory all about, and empeached the Romans for expecting any victuals there, but alſo deſtroyed the towns utterly, whiles Perſeus held the Romans play at Enipeus that they could not relieve and ſuccour the Cities of their allies and confederats. Nay, the very Romans ſhould have enough to do to look unto themſelves, conſide- L ring, that there was no tarrying for them, after that Theſſaly was loſt, which nouriſhed and maintained their army: and paſs forward they could not poſſibly, having the Macedonian camp to affront them. But Perſeus by that deed, as he confirmed the hearts of the Romans, ſo he quailed not a little the courages of the Macedonians, who depended upon the hope and expectancy of their aid. By the ſame miſerable pinching of his, he eſtranged alſo the heart of K. Gentius from him. For when as at Pella he had paid 300 talents unto thoſe that were ſent of purpoſe from Gentius to receive the ſame, well content he was that they ſhould ſeal up that money. Afterwards he ſent unto Pantaucus ten talents, and commanded him to deliver the ſame to the K. in perſon: as for the reſt ſigned up with the ſeal of the Illyrians, he commanded his own men who had the convoy thereof, in going with it to take ſmall journies, and when they were come to the utmoſt frontiers of Ma- M
cedony, there to reſt and attend the meſſengers from him. Gentius, after he had received as earneſt that ſmall portion of the whole ſum aforeſaid, being called upon continually by Pantaucus and ſet on to provoke the Romans by ſome hoſtility or other, made no more ado, but committed to priſon M. Perpenna and L. Petilius, who chanced at that time to come unto him in embaſſage. Which when Perſeus once heard, he had enough, and thought verily that Gentius had done that, whereby of neceſſity he muſt be forced to wage war with the Romans; and thereupon ſent out preſently to call thoſe back who had the carriage of the foreſaid talents; as if he had ſtudied and ſought for nothing more, than to reſerve as great a booty as poſſibly he could, for the Romans to enjoy, after that they had vanquiſhed and ſubdued him, Eropon returned likewiſe from Eumenes, and wiſt not what had been contrived ſecretly between them. That their treaty was about certain captives, N they themſelves had given forth abroad, and likewiſe Eumenes adverti ſed the Conſul ſo much, for avoiding of all ſuſpition.

Perſeus after the return of Eropon from Eumenes, was much diſmaied and caſt down. Whereupon, he ſent Antenor & Callippus (admirals of his navy) to Tenedos with forty pinnaces, unto which number five Gallions were adjoyned; who from that coaſt diſperſing themſelves all about the Iſlands Cyclades, might waft and guard the lighters and hoies charged with corn, as they ſailed to Macedony. Theſe ſhips were put to ſea at Caſſandrea, and firſt they fell with the havens that lie under the foot of the mountain Athos, and from thence paſſed to Tenedos with pleaſure in calm ſea:
where finding certain Rhodian open ſhips riding in the harbour, they ſpake courteouſly to Euda-mus their Admiral, and let them alone without any hurt at all done unto them. But afterwards up- O on knowledge, that fifty hulks of theirs on another ſide were ſhut up and pent in by the war-ſhips of K. Eumenes, (which rid in the mouth of the haven, and were commanded by Damius) he turned about in all haſte & diſperſed the enemies ſhips with a ſudden terrour that he put them in, & ſent the ſaid hulks & veſſels of burden into Macedony, with a convoy of ten brigantines to waft them over, with this charge, That after they had conducted them paſt all danger into place of ſafety, they ſhould return again to Tenedos. After nine daies they retired toward the fleet anchoring then in

A in the rode of Signum. From whence they crossed over to Subota, an Island lying between Elea and Athos. It fortuned that the morrow after the fleet was arrived at Subota, five and thirty ships which they call Hippagogæ [serving for the transporting of horses] which came from Elea, having aboord certain horsemen of Gaul and their horses, made head toward Phanæ, a cape or promontory of the Chians, from whence they might cut over into Macedony. And these were sent from Eumenes to Attalus. Antenor being advertised by a signall given him from a watch-tower, that those ships were discovered under sail in the open sea, loosed from Subota; and between the cape of Erythræa and Chios, where the sea is most narrow, he encountred them. The admirals of K. Eumenes thought nothing less, than that any fleet of Macedonians were abroad in those seas; but imagined one while they were Romans, otherwhiles, that it was Attalus or some sent back from Attalus,
B who from out of the Roman camp were sailing toward Pergamus. But as they approached nearer, they took knowledge by the form and fashion of their pinnaces who they were, by their hasty rowing also and making head full against them, they were out of all doubt that their enemies were at hand. Then were they mightily afraid as having no hope to resist and withstand them, considering the ships were unweildy and unhandsome, and the Gauls besides could hardly brook the very sea without any other trouble. Some of them therefore, who were nearer to the firm land saved themselves by swimming to Erythræa; others set up their sails, and being cast upon the Island Chios, forsook their horses, and ran as fast as they could for refuge to the City. But the barks discharged their armed souldiers nearer to the City in a more commodious place for landing, where the Macedonians overtook the Gauls and slew them; some in the way as they fled, others before
C the very gate of the City, being kept out and excluded from thence: for the Chians not knowing either who fled or who pursued, had shut their gates upon them. Nine hundred * Gallogreeks, or very near, lost their lives and were hewn in peeces, and 200 taken alive. As for the horses, part perished in the sea after the ships were split and broken, and the Macedonians haught and cut the strings of their gambrels of as many of them as they found upon the shore. Twenty of the best and fairest horses, together with the prisoners, Antenor commanded that those ten barks which he had sent before, should transport to Thessalonica, and return again with all speed to the fleet for that he would expect their coming at Phanæ. The fleet staid about three daies under the City side, but afterwards went forward to Phanæ; and when the ten pinnaces aforesaid were returned sooner than they looked for, they set up sail in the Ægean sea for Delos.

* Note that Gauls, Galatians, and Gallo-greeks be all one, in this book; although Livy term them only Gallos.

D In this while the Roman Embassadors, C. Popilius, C. Decimius, and C. Hostilius, departed from Chalcis, and arrived with three Quinquereme galleaces at Delos, where they found forty Macedonian pinnaces, and five royall Quinquereme galleaces of K. Eumenes. The holiness of the Temple and Island wherein it stood afforded security to them all, so as there was no hurt done nor violence offered from one to another. And therefore, as well Romans as Macedonians, and besides, the sailers and mariners of K. Eumenes conversed together, intermingled one with another in the Temple, and the religious devotion of the place yielded them truce and surcease of hostility.

Antenor the admirall of K. Perseus, when he was advertised from the watch and sentinell, that certain ships of burden were seen a far off in the sea, set sail & made after them himself with part
E of his pinnaces, and part of them he bestowed in wait among the Cyclades, and saving those that directed their course toward Macedony, he either drowned or spoiled them all. Popilius did the best he could, and Eumenes with his ships likewise, to save some; but the Macedonians, who sailed by night with two or three pinnaces at the most, deceived them and were not discovered.

Much about this time the Macedonian and Illyrian Embassadors came together to Rhodes, who carried the greater authority and credit with the Rhodians, by reason not only of the coming of their brigantins, which sailed to and fro ranging over the Ægean sea, and among the Cyclades, but also by the conjunction and association of the two KK. Perseus and Gentius, together with a rumor
F that ran of the Gauls, who were coming with a great number, as well of horse as foot. And now both Dion and Polyaratus, who took part with Perseus, took more courage and heart unto them: by whose means there was not only a gracious answer returned to the Kings, but also pronounced openly it was, that by their authority they would make an end of the war: in regard whereof, the Kings also for their parts were to be disposed and well willing to accept of peace.

Now was it the prime of the spring, when as the new generals were arrived into their Provinces: Æmylius the Cos. into Macedony; Octavius to the navy at Oreum; and Anicius into Illyricum, whose commission was to levy war against Gentius. This Gentius was the son of Pleuratus K. of the Illyrians, and Euridica was his mother: two brethren he had, to wit, Plator of the whole
G blood by father and mother both, and Caravantius only by the mothers side. This half brother he less suspected, by reason of his base parentage from the father; but as for Plator he murdered, together with two especiall friends of his Ettrius and Epicadus (brave men of action) to the end that he might raign in more safety and security. The voice goeth that he carried an envious eye to that brother of his, for that he had espoused Etuta the daughter of Honunus the Prince of the Dardanians; as if by this marriage he meant to make himself strong and combine with the Dardanian nation: and the more likelihood this carried with it after he married the damosell indeed. When he had made away Plator, and rid himself of the fear that he might have of his brother, he began to molest and oppress his own naturall subjects: and as he was by nature given to violence, so that indisposition of his he set on fire with untemperat drinking of wine. But as we said before, being moved and incited to war against the Romans, he assembled all his forces together unto Liſſus, to the number of 15000 armed men, and ſent his brother from thence with 1000 H foot and 50 horſe againſt the Cavians, for to ſubdue that nation either by force or fear, whiles himſelf led his army five miles againſt the City Baſſania from Liſſus. Now were the Baſſanians confederat allies of the Romans: and therefore when they were firſt ſollicited by meſſengers to yield they reſolved rather to endure a ſiege than do ſo. As for Caravantius he was peaceably and friendly received at his firſt coming into Durium, a town of the Cavians: but Caravantie another City, made the gates faſt againſt him: and as he gave the waſte to the territory about it, certain of his ſouldiers ſtragling here and there, were by the peaſants and villagers killed, who came forth and made head againſt them.

And now by this time Appius Claudius having taken with him, over and above his own army, the auxiliaries of the Bullians, Apolloniats, and Dyrrhachians, diſlodged out of the place where I he had wintered, and encamped near the river Genuſſus. For hearing of the alliance made between Perſeus and Gentius, and incenſed beſides with the outrage committed upon the Roman embaſſadors, whom Gentius put in priſon, he reſolved certainly to war upon him. Anicius the Prætor being at that time at Apollonia, and advertiſed in what terms the affairs ſtood in Illyricum, diſ-patched letters beforehand to Appius, willing him to attend at Genuſſus for his coming: and ſo within three daies after came himſelf to the camp there; and to thoſe aids which he had of his own he took with him two thouſand foot, and two hundred horſe, drawn out of the youth and flower of the Partins. Of the Infantry Epicadus had the conduct, and Agathus commanded the Cavalry. With this power he prepared to go into Illyricum, principally for to levy the ſiege before
Baſſania: but this deſign projected by him, was empeached by a bruit that was blown of certain K pinnaces which waſted and ſpoiled the ſea-coaſts. A fleet they were together of eighty ſail, ſent from Gentius by the inſtigation of Pantaucus, to forrage the territories of Apollonia and Dyrrhachium. Then the fleet * * * * Which being ſurrendred, they ſubmitted alſo and yielded themſelves. And ſo conſequently other Cities of that country one after another did the ſemblable: and the inclination & diſpoſition of mens minds that way, was much ſet forward by the clemency and juſtice of the Roman Prætor which he uſed toward all. Then they marched to Scodra, the capital place and ſeat-town of the war: not only for that Gentius had ſeized upon it for his own ſelf, as the chief ſtrength and fortreſs of all his realm but alſo becauſe it was the ſtrongeſt peece of all the Labeats nation, and very difficult for acceſs. Encloſed it is with two rivers: to wit, Clanſula which runneth along the Eaſt ſide of the City, and Barbana on the L Weſt, ariſing out of the marſh Labeatis. Theſe two rivers joyn in one, and are diſcharged together into the great river Oriundes: which ſpringing from the mountain Scodrus, and encreaſed ſtill with the confluence of many other waters and rivulets, falleth at length into the Adriatick ſea.
This Scodrus is the higheſt hill by odds of all other in thoſe quarters: on the eaſt it hath Dardania under it, on the South Macedony, and Illyricum on the Weſt. Albeit, this town was ſtrongly ſituat, by the naturall ſite of the place, and defended by the whole nation of the Illyrians and the King himſelf in perſon: yet the Roman Prætor (encouraged with the good ſucceſs he had at the firſt, and ſuppoſing the fortune of the totall war would be anſwerable to ſo happy beginnings, and that a ſudden terrour alſo would ſerve him in much ſtead and prevaile) approached the wals of the town with his army ready embattelled, and diſplaied his banners againſt it. Now if they had M ſhut their gates, and defended their wals and turrets over the gates, with armed guards beſtowed accordingly ſurely they had repulſed the Romans from the walls, and defeated them of their enterpriſe clean: but they iſſued forth of the gate, and in the plain and even ground gave battell with more animoſity and courage than they maintained it with perſiſtance. For being diſcomfited and driven back, and in the chaſe hudled by heaps together as they fled, after 200 & above were ſlain in the very ſtraight entrance of the gate, they put the reſt within in ſuch a fright, that Gentius incontinently ſent unto the Prætor as Orators, Teuticus and Bellus the principall perſons of that nation to treat and intreat for a ſurceaſe of arms, that in the mean while he might debate in counſell and be adviſed as touching the main eſtate of his affairs. And when for this purpoſe he had obtained a grant for three daies, and the Romans lay encamped from the City half a mile; Gen- N
tius took a barge, and ſailing along the river Bartana, paſſed into the lake or mear of the Labeats, as if he had ſought ſome ſecret by-place to conſult in. But as it appeared afterwards, he was moved upon a certain vain hope of his brother Caravantius his coming, who was ſaid to be near at hand accompanied with many thouſands of fighting men, whom he had levied and brought out of that quarter into which he was ſent But when this rumour was over-blown & vaniſhed to nothing, down the river he went again with the ſtream the third day after in the ſame veſſel to Scodra, and ſent courriers before him to the Prætor, requiring leave to parley & commune with him; which being granted, he entred into the camp. Firſt, he began his ſpeech with accuſing and condemning his own folly: in the end his laſt refuge was to pour out prayers and ſhed tears: and ſo humbling himſelf at the Prætor his feet, he ſubmitted to his devotion. The Prætor at the firſt bad him take O a good heart unto him and be of good chear, and invited him to ſupper: and ſo he returned to his own people into the City, where he was honorably feaſted that day by the Prætor. But afterwards he was delivered to the guard and keeping of C. Caſſius, a martiall Colonell: and thus received he of K. Perſeus only ten talents (a mean reward and hardly ſufficient to content a ſimple ſwordplaier) to engage himſelf into a world of danger; and being a K. as he was, to fall into this extream calamity and miſery. Anicius having entred upon Scodra, firſt before all other things, took order

that

A that the two Embaſſadors aforeſaid, Petilius and Perpenna ſhould be ſought out and brought unto him: whom after he had reſtored to their priſtine eſtate and reputation, he ſent Perpenna preſently to apprehend the friends and kinſfolk of the King: who took his way directly to Medeo, a City of the Labeats, and brought with him into the camp at Scodra Elleva the Kings wife, with her two ſons Scerdiletus and Pleuratus, together with Caravantius the K. his brother. Thus Anicius having ended the Illyrian war within the compaſs of thirty daies, ſent Perpenna to Rome with tidings of this victory; and within few daies Gentius himſelf after him together with his mother, his wife and children, his brother, and other LL. of the Illyrians. This was the only war atchieved and brought to an end, before they heard at Rome that it was begun.

During the management of theſe affairs, Perſeus alſo was in great fear and affright, by reaſon
B of the comming of L. Æmylius a new Conſul (who as the voice went, marched againſt him with great menaces) together with Octavius the Prætor. Neither was he leſs terrified with the Roman navy and the danger of the ſea coaſts. Enmenes and Athenagoras had the keeping and command of Theſſalonica with a ſmall garriſon of two thouſand targettiers. Thither he ſent Captain Androcles alſo, with commandment to encamp cloſe to the very harbor where the ſhips lay in rode. Unto Ænia he ſent one thouſand horſemen under the leading of Antigonus, to guard the ſea-coaſt, to the end that in what part ſoever they heard the enemies ſhips were arrived, they might incontinently advance to the ſuccour of the peaſants and country people. Five thouſand Macedonians were likewiſe ſent to lie in garriſon at Pythoum and Petra, under the conduct of Hiſtiaius, Theagenes and Midon. After theſe were departed, he went in hand to fortifie the bank of the river Eni-
C peus: becauſe it was paſſable over the very channell on dry foot. And to the end that all the multitude ſhould be employed hereabout, the very women were compelled out of the towns adjoyning, to bring victuals into the camp. The ſouldiers were commanded from out of the woods near by * * * * Finally, the water-bearers in leather bits or bottels, were commanded to follow him to the ſea, which was a quarter of a mile off: and thereupon they ſtood to dig pits, ſome in one place, and ſome in another, a pretty diſtance aſunder. The exceeding high hils all about put * him in good hope (& the rather becauſe they ſent out from them no rivers to be ſeen in open view) that they contained within them ſome hidden ſprings, the veins whereof draining into the ſea, were intermingled with the ſea-water. They had ſcarcely ſunk through the uppermoſt courſe of ſand above, when they might ſee ſmall ſources to boil up, at the firſt troubled, but after-
D ward they began to yield ſhier and clear water in great abundance; by a ſpecial gift (as it were) of the gods above. And even this occurrent alſo encreaſed the name and reputation of the Captain with his ſouldiers. Then after he had commanded his men to make ready their armour, himſelf with the martiall Tribunes and the principall formoſt ranks, marched to recogniſe and view the paſſages; and to ſee where the armed men might deſcend with eaſe, and where they might with leaſt trouble mount up the bank on the farther ſide. When he had taken a ſufficient ſurvey hereof, he forecaſt & gave direction aforehand, for all things to be done in the army in good order without trouble and tumultuous noiſe, even at the very beck and commandment of their leaders. For when a thing to be effected is pronounced to all at once, it falleth out that every man is not within the hearing; and ſo receiving an uncertain ſignall and commandment, ſome put more of their
E own head to that which was commanded, and others do leſs again for it: and ſo there ariſe from all parts diſſonant cries, and by this means the enemies know ſooner whereabout they go, than many of themſelves. Therefore to avoid this confuſion, he ordained that every martiall Colonell ſhould give a ſecret watch-word to the principall Centurion of the legion, and round him in his ear what he would have done: then he and ſo forth every one ſhould deliver unto each Centurion as he is next in rank and place, what was to be executed; whether it were that the commandment was to be carried from the front of the army to the tail, or from the rereguard behind to the vanguard before. He brought up a new order and cuſtome forbidding the watchmen to carry with them any targets to their ſentinels: for that the watchman went not out to fight, whereby he
F he needed any armour, but to keep watch; that when he deſcried the enemies coming he might retire himſelf, and raiſe others to take arms. Item, he ordained that the helmettiers or morioners ſhould ſtand upon their feet, having their ſhields upright before them: and when they were weary, to lean and bear upon their javelins, and reſting their head upon the edge of their ſhields ſo to take a nap and ſleep; to the end that their glittering armour might be diſcovered afar off by the enemy, whereas himſelf could not ſee far before him. The manner alſo of warding in the day time, and of the corps de guard he altered clean. For whereas they were wont to ſtand all the day long armed, and the horſemen holding their horſes bridled; it fell out ſo that in ſummer daies when ordinarily the ſun is extream and ſcorching hot, both horſe and man became weary and languiſhed again with abiding ſo many hours in the heat, and oftentimes the enemies being freſh, although they were but few in number ſet upon them and put them to trouble and hazard enough. Here-
G upon he commanded that the morning guard ſhould break up at noon, and others ſucceed in their places for to ward in the afternoon. By this means the enemy freſh and in heart could never take them weary and ſo charge upon them. When he had pronounced in a publike aſſembly gathered together that his will was, that theſe orders ſhould be obſerved accordingly he delivered unto them a ſpeech, much reſembling the former Oration which he uſed before to the people within the City of Rome. Namely, "That the Generall of an army ought only to foreſee and provide for "all that is meet to be done, ſometime by himſelf, otherwhiles with thoſe whom he hath joyned

* He ſpeaketh of L. Paul. Emylius.

"aſſiſtants

"assistants unto him: as for such as are not called to be of his counsell, they ought neither in pub- H
"like nor in privat to shoot their bolts and give their advice. Three things indeed the souldier
"was to care and provide for: namely, to have a body most strong and nimble withall; his armor
"and weapons decent and fit; and thirdly, a spirit prompt and ready at all assaies to execute any "commandment on a sudden. For all things else he ought to know, that the gods immortall and "his Generall will take care: forasmuch, as in that army wherein the souldiers, the Consul, and
"chief commander, suffer themselves to be carried away with rumours and bruits of the common "sort, it is not possible for any thing to go well forward & come to good effect. For his own part
"(according to the duty and devoir of a captain General) he would endeavour and provide to "give them the occasion and opportunity of brave exploits: as for them, they were not to enquire
"after any future thing; but so soon as the signall is given, then every man to perform the service I
"of a doubty souldier and valiant warrior. After these good precepts and instructions, he dimissed the assembly: and the old souldiers themselves confessed commonly in plain terms, that they had taken forth a lesson that day as young and raw novices, yea, and learned in military profession that, which they never knew before: neither shewed they only by these and such like words, with what consent and general liking they heard the Cos. his speech, but also testified the same by present deed and visible effect. For immediatly, you should not have seen over all the camp, one man idle and doing nothing: some fell to whet and sharpen their swords; others furbished their head-pieces, buffs, and beavers: some scoured their shields and bucklers; others their cuirasses and corslets; some fitted and buckled their harnes to their bodies, and tried how they could bestir their limbs and rule their joynts under it: some shook their pikes and couched their javelins; others K brandished their swords and lookt that they were sharp at point: So as a man might easily perceive by them, that upon the first occasion presented of encounter with the enemy, they would enter into conflict, either to atchieve a brave victory, or to die an honourable death.

Perseus also on the other side, perceiving that upon the arrivall of the Consul and the begining of the spring together, the Roman camp resounded and rung again with their stirring and rustling of armour, as if there had been some new war towards: that they were dislodged from Phylla and encamped upon the bank just over against him: and that now their leader and commander rode up and down to view and behold his fortifications and works, to spie (no doubt) some way
* Namely, the news that K. Gentius was vanquished, and that he and his kingdom was at the devotion of the Romans.
or other for passage * * * * * * * This * encouraged the Romans hearts, and danted not a little the Macedonians and their King. At the first, Perseus endea- L voured to suppress secretly and stop the bruit and fame thereof, by tending out certain of purpose to Pantaucus (as he came from thence) to forbid him in any wise to approach the camp. But by this time were certain children seen brought by their own parents among the Illyrian hostages:
and look how much more carefull order was taken to conceal all, so much the sooner was every thing set abroad and blurted out by the prattle and babble of the Kings servitors attending about his person.

About the same time the Rhodian Embassadors came into the Rhodian camp, with the very same charge and commission as touching peace, which at Rome had set the LL. of the Senat in exceeding heat & choler; but far worse audience had they in the councill of the camp, & with greater discontentment. And therefore when some advised, that they should be thrust out by head and M shoulders without any answer at all; the Cos. pronounced, That he would shape them an answer after fifteen daies, and not before. Mean while (that it might appear what a gooly reckoning was made of these Rhodian peace-makers who came about a pacification) he began instead thereof to debate in Councill as concerning the means and manner of making war. Some were of opinion (and principally the elders and ancients) to give the assault, and force the munitions and defences planted upon the bank of the river Enipeus; for that the Macedonians were never able to resist, if they came upon them lustily and charged them by thick troops: for why? no longer ago (say they) than the year before, disseized they had been of so many holds both higher and better fortified and the same holden with strong garrisons. Others were of mind, that Octavius the Admiral should with the fleet sail to Thessalonica & by laying waste the maritime coasts, to cut off & wea- N ken the kings forces; to the end, that upon another war shewed from behind at their backs the K.
might be withdrawn & trained about to defend the heart of his realm, and thereby forced in some sort to open & lay naked the passage over the river Enipeus. And Octavius himself was of this judgment, that the bank as well by the naturall site thereof, as for the sconces made upon it by mans hand, was insuperable and not to be gained: & besides the engins planted every where thereupon, he heard say, that the enemies had the slight and skill to discharge all kind of shot far better and shoot more dead sure: but the intention of the General Æmylius was wholly bent another way:
and after he had dissolved the assembly of his Councill, he called unto him the Merchants of the Perrhæbians namely, Schænus and Menophilus (men of approved fidelity and wisdom) and of them in great secret enquired, What kind of passages there were over into Perrhæbia? when they an- O swered, That the waies were nothing difficult and dangerous, but only that they were kept and beset by the Kings guards: he conceived some hope, that if he assailed them by night with a valiant company, and took them suddenly at unawares before they looked for him, he might chase those garrisons from their holds: for darts, arrows, and all other shot, served to little or no purpose in the dark, when a man cannot see his mark afar off before him: but close sword-fight, hand to hand pell mell, was it that must do the deed: wherein the Roman souldier had no fellow. Minding therefore

A therefore to uſe thoſe two as guides, he ſent for Octavius the Prætor: and when he had declared unto him the effect of his deſignment, he commanded him to ſail with his fleet to Heraclea, and to have with him victuals baked and dreſſed to ſerve a thouſand ſouldiers ten daies. Himſelf ſent out P. Scipio Naſica and Q. Fabius Maximus his own ſon, with five thouſand ſelect ſouldiers to Heraclea (as if they were to be embarked) for to waſte the maritime coaſt of Macedony, lying far within the country, according as it had been before debated in Councill; & ſecretly under-hand they were given to wit, that there were viands and victuals in the fleet prepared for them, to the end that nothing ſhould ſtay their expedition. Then the guides, who were to conduct them in their way, had commandment, ſo to caſt their gifts and journeys, that by three of the clock in the morning the third day, they might aſſail Pythoum. Himſelf in his own perſon the next morrow,
B with intent to amuſe the K. and keep him from all regard of other enterpriſes, early by the break of day began to skirmiſh with the enemies guards in the very midſt of the chanell and place of the current. The light armour and forlorn hopes as well of the one ſide as the other, maintained the fight: for it was not poſſible for ſouldiers heavily armed at all peeces, to skirmiſh in the chanell, ſo uneven as it was. The deſcent from the banks on either hand to the foreſaid chanell, contained ſomewhat leſs than three hundred paces, or little better than a quarter of a mile: the middle ſpace of the ſtream between (hollowed and eaten with the current, in ſome place more, in others leſs) took up little above a mile. In this middle plot was the skirmiſh maintained within the view and eye of the K. of one ſide, who looked upon them from the rampier of the camp; and of the Con-
C ſul of the other, who beheld them ſtanding with his legions. The Kings auxiliaries lightly armed, fought better afar off by the means of their darts and other ſhot. The Romans were more firm and ſteady, yea, and better defended with their round bucklers or Ligurian ſhields. About noon-tide the Conſul commanded to ſound the the retreat unto his men; and ſo for that day the fray war parted, not without much bloudſhed on both ſides. The next morrow by ſun-riſing they fell to it again, and fought more eagerly by reaſon that their bloud was up, and their ſtomacks ſharpned the day before: but the Romans received hurt not only by them with whom they entred into fight, but much more alſo from a number of thoſe who ſtood in turrets and petty ſconces erected here and there; who diſcharged at them all kind of darts and ſhot, but hurled ſtones eſpecially. And when they approached once near to the bank where the enemies were, their bullets levelled out of engins, commanded and retched even them that were outmoſt and fartheſt off.
D The Conſul having loſt that day more men by many than before, cauſed them to retire ſomewhat later than the former day. The third day he forbare to fight, but turned aſide toward the nether quarter of the camp, as if he minded to aſſay paſſage by an arm of the river that bended to the ſea. Perſeus having before his eyes * * * * * * * * *

Now was it the ſeaſon of the year paſt * ſun-ſtead in ſummer, & near unto the hour of noon-ſtead in the day, ſo as they journeyed in a way full of duſt, when the ſun was exceeding hot; and even now they began to feel thirſt and wearineſs already: but it ſeemed evidently, that when high noon was come indeed, they would be more troubled with the one and the other. Whereupon Æmylius reſolved, not to preſent his men thus tormented and affiicted, unto the enemies all freſh and in
E heart: howbeit, ſo ſharp ſet they were on both ſides, and ſo eager upon fight, that the Conſul had as much need by ſome cunning caſt or other to deceive and beguile his own men, as to delude his enemies. Before they were all embattelled and ſet in array, he was earneſt with the martiall Tribunes, and called upon them to make haſte and put them in order: himſelf rode about from rank to rank, and by his comfortable words encouraged and incenſed the hearts of his ſouldiers to fight. At the firſt they were all very luſty and called for the ſignal of battell; but afterwards, as the heat of the weather encreaſed, ſo their viſages ſeemed leſs vigorous, and their voices more hea-
F vy and dull; nay, ſome of them ſtood leaning on their targets, and reſted themſelves bearing upon their javelins. Then he made open ſhew of his meaning, and in plain terms commanded the formoſt companies, in the vanguard, to meaſure out the forefront of the camp, and to lay down their baggage: which when the ſouldiers perceived, ſome of them there were who rejoyced openly, for that he had not forced them to fight, ſo weary as they were with travelling and during that moſt ſcorching and burning heat. About the General ſtood his lieutenants with the captains of ſtrangers, and Attalus himſelf among the reſt. All of them allowed and thought well of the matter, all the while they thought no other but that the Conſul would verily fight: for he had not ſo much as made them acquainted with this delay and lingring of his. But then ſeeing the caſe
G altered and the purpoſe changed, all the reſt held their peace: only Naſica of them all was ſo hardy and bold as to tell the Conſull his mind and admoniſh him to take heed, that he ſuffered not the enemy by avoiding fight, to ſlip and eſcape out of their hands, like as he had mocked and beguiled other Generals before him: for he feared much, leſt he would diſlodge, and depart in the night, and ſo they ſhould be driven to purſue him with exceeding great travell and danger into the inland middle parts of Macedony: ſo as the army ſhould be put to wander up and down all about through the blind lanes and over the narrow ſtraights of the Macedonian mountains; like as it hapned to other Captains before him. And therefore he counſelled him in good ſadneſs, while he had the enemy within the open plain field, to charge upon him and not to loſe the opportunity of a goodly victory now preſented. The Conſul, nothing at all offended with this frank advertiſement of ſo noble a young gentleman, ſaid no more but thus unto him: "The "day hath been (Naſica) when I carried that ſpirit with me which you do at this preſent: and the * Solſtitium. Howſoever Aſtronomers obſerve two Solſtitia, (i.e. Sun-ſteads) in the year, the one in ſummer, and the other in winter: Grammarians (after the beſt and moſt approved writers) take Solſtitium for the hotteſt ſeaſon of the ſummer only. Thus Plautus in Pſeudolo ſaith Solſtitialis herba, for an one daies-herb, withering away with heat of the ſun: and in Trinummo, Solſtitialium morbus, for Sirioſis, i.e. cum carbunculantur arbores nimiis ardoribus ſolis ſub Sirio, as Pliny ſaith, i.e. the fault of blaſting with heat in the dog daies. Livy alſo in the ſpeech of Quintius to the Embaſſador of K. Antiochus, by Solſtitialu dies, meaneth the hotteſt time of ſummer, as by Brumalis dies elſewhere the mid-winter. Finally, Plutarch expreſſeth this place thus: Θέρους γὰρ τῶν ὥρα φθίνοντος τότε.

"time

" time will come when you will be of that mind, of which I am now. Taught I am by experience H
" of many adventures and casualties in war, to know, when it is good time to fight, and when it is " better to forbear and sit still. For this present needless it is and bootless (standing as we do now
" arranged in order of battel) to tell you what motives they be, that induce me to think it better
" to be quiet and not to stir this day: another time demand the reasons thereof: and rest conten"ted I advise you, with the authority and credit of an old warrior and experienced Captain. The young man was blank and said not a word: perswaded he was doubtless, that the Cos. saw some impediments to stay the battel, which to himself appeared not. Paulus, when he perceived that the camp was set and quartered out, & the carriages bestowed accordingly, drew first out of the rereguard the Triarii; then afterwards the Principes, whiles the Hastati or pikes kept their standing still in the vanguard (if haply the enemies should offer battel;) at the last he withdrew them al- I so, beginning first at the right point, taking by little and little the souldiers from every enlign one after another. By this means were the footmen had away without any trouble and tumult, and the horsemen together with the light armour opposed against the enemy in the front and head of the main battell before the enemies: neither was the Cavalry called back from these stations wherein they were placed, untill the forefront of the rampier and trench was fully finished. The K. likewise, who without any refusall of battel had stood ready that day to fight, contenting himself with this, that he knew the stay thereof was occasioned by the enemy, led his companies back into his camp. After the Romans were encamped and well fortified, C. Sulpitius Gallus, a martiall Colonel of the second legion, who had been Prætor the year before by permission of the Consul called the souldiers to a generall audience, and before them all declared and pronounced, that the next night K following there would be seen an eclipse of the moon, from the second hour of the night untill the fourth: and this he did, because no man should wonder thereat, as if it were a prodigious token. Also he made demonstration unto them, that it might be well fore-known and fore-told, because it is a thing coming at certain times by the ordinary course of nature. For like as they nothing marvelled at the rising and going down both of sun and moon at set hours, nor to see the moon sometimes shine bright out at the full, otherwhiles in the wain, giving light only with the small tips of her horns: even so they ought not to make a wonder and miraculous matter of it, that she should be dark, when as her body is hidden by the shadow of the earth. Thus the moon
* Septemb. 4. was eclipsed at the hour before prognosticated, overnight before the *eaven of the Nones of *Sep*tember*: by occasion whereof, the Roman souldiers held Gallus for a deeply learned sage, and a di- L vine Philosopher: but contrariwise, the Macedonians were troubled with the sight thereof, as an heavy prodigy, portending and presaging the ruin of that realm and the utter destruction of the whole nation. And surely the houling and yelling which they made in their camp all the while, untill the moon recovered her full light again, was a very prognostication and prediction of no less. The morrow after both the armies were so hot set and greedy of fight, that both K. and Cos.
were blamed by some of their own souldiers, for that they went out of the field the day before, and struck not battell. As for the K. he had his excuse and defence ready not only because the enemy refused the fight first, in open view of all men, and so retired his forces into his camp, but also in that he had pitcht and ranged his ensigns in such a place, unto which the Macedonian battell, called Phalanx, could not advance, considering that with the smallest disadvantage of the ground, M there is no use at all thereof. The Cos. for his part, as the day before he seemed to have pretermitted and lost the opportunity of a combat, yea, and to have given the enemy advantage to depart in the night-season (if he had so list) so now also he trifled out the time, making semblance of sacrifice, whereas the signall of battell at the point of day was put forth for the souldiers to enter into the field. Well, at the last, when the sacrifice was duly performed, about the third hour of the day, he assembled his Councill about him; where, some there were that thought he prolonged the time on set purpose, with his discourses and unseasonable consultations, and spent that opportunity so, which should be employed better in fight and execution of some worthy exploit. Howbeit,
The Oration of L. Æmylius unto his army. after some speeches passed, the Cos. made an Oration unto his souldiers in this wise. " Pub. Nasica
" (qd. he) a right valiant young gentleman, of all those that advised to give battell yesterday, was N
" the only man that uttered his mind, and acquainted me with his counsell; yet afterwards, even
" he held his peace and kept silence, in such sort, as he seemed to change his opinion, and to be of " my mind in the end. Some others there be that have taken a severall course by themselves, and " thought it better to carp at their General behind his back than to admonish him to his face. As " for me I will not think much nor make it dainty, to render a reason both to you, O P. Nasica,
" & to them also who have thought the same that you did (although they carried it more secret" ly) why I made such stay and deferred battel. For, so far off am I of repenting for our yesterdaies
" repose, that I am of this belief rather, how by that means and policy alone I saved the whole ar" my. And because none of you may think that I have taken such a pitch, and hold that opinion " of mine without just cause, let him consider & discourse together with me (if he think so good) O
" what advantages the enemies had, & how many things made against us. First and formost, how " far they surpass us in number, assured I am that none of you either was ignorant before, or " could chuse but observe and mark yesterday, seeing their army how it was thrust and thronged " together. And of that small number which we are, the fourth part of our fighting men was left " behind to guard the carriage; & wel ye wot, that we set not the most cowards to the keeping of " our baggage. But suppose we had been all there together. How then? think we, I pray you, that " we

A "we have not enough of it, even out of this very camp wherein we have reſted one whole night,
"to go either this day or to morrow at the fartheſt, with the leave and power of the gods into
"the field, if you ſhall ſo think good? Skilleth it not indeed, and is it all one, to bid a ſouldier "take arms, whom neither the travel of this daies journey, nor toil of laborious work hath "tainted and wearied, but is at quiet, yea, and freſh within his tent & ſo to bring him forth into "the field for a battel luſty and ſtrong, full of bodily vigour of heart? or to offer and expoſe unto
"the enemy who is hearty and freſh, who hath taken his reſt and eaſe, & hath brought with him "to a fight, his ſtrength entire and whole, not foiled or ſpent upon any occaſion; to preſent, I ſay,
"unto ſuch an enemy, a ſouldier tired out with long journey upon the way, wearied with carry"ing his burden, all molten to ſweat and dropping therewith, his throat ſcorched for thirſt, his B "face and eyes full of duſt, and all his body roaſted againſt the noon-ſun? now tell me, by the
"ye ow to the gods, what is he that being in this ſo good a plight, were he the verieſt beaſt and "coward otherwiſe in a country) could not foil and beat out of the field the hardieſt & moſt vali"ant man that is? Moreover, what ſhould I ſay how materiall & important this alſo was that our "enemies had marſhalled their battaillons with great leiſure after long time of reſt; that they had "repaired and refreſhed their own ſtrength, & ſtood ranged every man orderly in his own rank;
"whereas we were at one inſtant both haſtily to embattel and ſet our men in array, yea, and alſo
"to fall to skirmiſh pell mell without all order? But may ſome men ſay, True it is, our battel in"deed we ſhould have had much out of ſquare and ſhuſled in great confuſion: yet our camp was "well fortified; we had forecaſt and provided for good watering, the paſſage thereto was good C "& ſafe by reaſon of ſtrong guards placed every way; & all coaſts were cleared about us by our "eſpials. Nay, I wis, but contrariwiſe, nothing (to ſay truly) was ours, but the bare & naked plain "field where we were to fight. Your anceſtors in times paſt, eſteemed a camp fortified with ram-
"piers and trenches, as good a port and harbor of ſure refuge, for an army againſt all chances
"and misfortunes whatſoever: from thence to iſſue forth, & thither to retire for ſafety, after they "had been toſſed and beaten with the tempeſt of a battel. And therefore when it was empaled
"round about with good defences, they had a care alſo to re-enforce & ſtrengthen it with ſtrong
"guards; foraſmuch as he that hath loſt his camp & is turned out of it, is ever holden for vanqui-
"ſhed, notwithſtanding he won the day & had the better in the field. The hold of a camp ſerveth "for a place of retreat to the conqueror; & of refuge to the conquered. How many armies could D "I reckon, which having ſped but badly in the battel, were driven to take their leaguer; yet after"wards ſeeing their time, and ſpying their vantage, otherwhiles ſallied forth & in the turning of "an hand repulſed and diſcomfited the enemy, for all his former victory? This ſeat and retreat of "ſouldiers in time of war, reſembleth as a man would ſay, another native country of theirs; the "rampier ſerveth inſtead of walls, the tent and pavilion is to every ſouldier his houſe and home.
"And ſhould we have fought indeed like vagabonds without any place of manſion wherunto we "might betake our ſelves after victory? But againſt theſe difficulties and empeachments of giving
"battel, this one thing is objected: How and if the enemy (ſay ſome) had gone his waies laſt night
"between; what a foul deal of trouble & ſorrow ſhould we have endured again in purſuing him
"as far as to the heart, nay, to the fartheſt frontiers of Macedony? But I for my part verily hold this E "for certain, that if he had ever meant to have ſtarted from hence, he would never have ſtaid thus
"here as he hath done, nor brought his forces out into the field. For how much more eaſie was it
"for him to depart & be gone when we were farther off, than now when we are ready to tread "upon his heels, and go over his back? Surely he could not poſſibly have given us the ſlip, but we "ſhould have been aware of his diſlodging, either by day or night. But, ſay he had gone his waies,
"what could we have wiſhed more at the gods hands, than to ſet upon the back part of the ene"mies in the open plain ground, departing in diſarray disbanded one from another, as they aban"doning their fort and ſtrong hold, and whoſe camp ſituat moſt ſure upon an exceeding high and "ſteep bank of a river, fortified alſo with a rampier, and many a ſconce and turret beſide, we gave "the venture to aſſault? Lo, what the cauſes were, why the battel was put off from yeſterday to F "this preſent. For I muſt tell you, I am as willing my ſelf to try the fortune of a field as any other:
"and to that end (becauſe the advenues to the enemy over the river Enipeus were ſtopped up a-"gainſt us) I have found a new way through another paſs and ſtraight, by diſſeizing the guards of
"the enemies there left; and never will I give over untill I have defeated him quite, and brought "this war to an end. After this oration all kept ſilence, partly, for that many of them were won to his opinion: and partly, becauſe they feared to find fault to no purpoſe & ſo to give offence, when a thing how ſoever once paſt, cannot be recalled and amended. But that day neither, was there battell fought, for any great deſire that the Conſul or King had thereto. The King wiſhed it not; becauſe he was now to charge his enemies, not weary of their way as the day before, nor troubled about their embattelling in ſuch ſort & hardly at the laſt brought into order. The Conſul a-G gain had no great ſtomack thereto, for that his camp newly pitched, was provided neither of fewell nor forrage brought in and laid up already: and for the purveyance thereof, out of the villages and fields near at hand, many of the ſouldiers were gone abroad forth of the camp. And thus when neither of the Generals were willing thereto, mere chance and fortune (which is more powerfull than all the counſel and policy of man) made means and gave occaſion of a battell. There was a river not very great, near to the enemies camp, whereat both Romans and Macedonians watered: and on either bank ſide certain guards kept their ſt tions, for the ſafety and ſecurity as well of the one part as the other. Two Cohorts there were for the Romans of Marrucines and H Pelignians, footmen; two troops or cornets beſides of Samnit horſemen; all commanded by M. Sergius Sylus a lieutenant. Over and beſides, another ſtanding corps de guard quartered before the camp, containing three cohorts, namely, of Firmian, Veſtine, and Cremonian footmen, together with two troops of Placentine and Eſſernian horſemen, all conducted by lieutenant Cluvius. Now when all was well and quiet about the river, and no ſide provoked or challenged other; it fortuned that a ſumpter horſe [of the Romans] about the fourth hour of the day brake from the hands of thoſe that had the tending and keeping of ſuch, took the river and made toward the bank of the farther ſide: & when three ſouldiers followed after croſs the water almoſt knee-deep to catch him, the Thracians began to train the jade from the midſt of the river to their bank ſide: but after one of them was ſlain, the Romans recovered the beaſt again & retired to their own guard. Now I there was a ſtrong corps de guard of 800 Thracians upon the bank which the enemies kept, from whence ſome few at firſt, taking it to the heart that a countriman of theirs ſhould thus be killed before their face, traverſed over the river in purſuit of thoſe that had ſlain him; afterwards more and more, and in the end all followed after, and together with that guard * * * * * * * leadeth to the battel. Men were moved with a reverence of the majeſty of his place, as he was L.

General; alſo with reſpect of the honour and glory of the man otherwiſe; and above all, with the regard of his age: for that being about threeſcore years old he did undergo the offices and parts of young men in the adventures of greateſt travell and danger. That void ſpace which was between the light targettiers, called Cetrati, and the thick battaillons named Phalanges, the legion took up clean, and broke within the battell of the enemies. Behind the Cetrati was this legion, and had afK front them the Pavoiſers called Aglaſpides, with reſplendent or ſhining ſhields. L. Attilius, who had been Conſul beforetime, was commanded to lead againſt the battaillon of other Pavoiſers called Leucaſpides with white ſhields. And that was the main battell of the enemies. Againſt the right flank from which quarter the skirmiſh firſt began about the river, the Elephants were conducted together with a wing of confederat horſemen, and from thence began the Macedonians to fly. For like as many new devices and inventions of men, carry ſome ſhew in apparance of words when they are firſt ſpoken of; but come to practiſe and try them once, and not to argue and diſpute how they ſhould be put in execution, they vaniſh away without effect and prove juſt nothing: even ſo at that time, the Elephants bare a name only in the battell, without any uſe and ſervice at all. That violence of the Elephants (ſuch as it was) the Latine allies ſeconded immediatL ly, and forced the left flank to retire. Then the ſecond legion was put forth, and in the midſt entred upon the Phalanx and put it to flight; neither was there any cauſe of victory more evident than this, namely, that many skirmiſhes there were in divers places, which at the firſt troubled the Phalanx, and afterwards diſcomfited it. True it is, that to abide the force thereof it is unpoſſible, ſo long as it keepeth cloſe united together, & putteth forth their ſharp pointed pikes bent thick couched together breſt-high: but if a man by charging the ſame here and there, force them once to turn about thoſe pikes, which for their length and heavy weight are unwieldy and hard to guide, they ſoon are intangled and catch one within another untowardly: but in caſe it fall out ſo, that there be any tumult made either aflank or behind, then there enſueth a generall trouble and confuſion of all, as if they all at once came tumbling down: like as it hapned then, when as againſt the RoM mans, who aſſailed them by troops in ſundry parts, they were driven to break their battaillon into many pieces, as it were, and ſo to make head & affront the enemy. But the Romans eſpied where there was a breach made and lane left between, and there they would inſinuat and wind in with their ranks and files: who, if they had run upon the front of the Phalanx cloſe ranged altogether with their whole battaillon, they had enwrapped and entangled themſelves within their pikes: (which in the beginning of the conflict hapned to the Peligni, as they unadviſedly dealt with the targettiers, called Cetrati) and had never been able to ſuſtain that battaillon united thick and couched together. But as there was a cruell ſlaughter committed upon the companies of the infantry in every place, ſave only thoſe that flung away their weapons and fled; ſo the ſouldiers of the Cavalry departed in manner ſafe and ſound out of the conflict. The K. himſelf was the firſt man that N fled: and now by this time was eſcaped beyond Pydna, and with his cornets of horſemen which they call, Sacred made haſte to Pella. Anon after followed Coſtacus, and the Cavalry of the Odryſians: conſequently, other troops and companies of Macedonian horſemen departed and kept their arraies unbroken: for that the Phalanx or battaillon of the footmen between which kept the conquerours occupied in execution, put them quite out of remembrance to purſue the men of arms. A long time continued the maſſacre of this Phalanx afront, aflank & behind. In the end, they who eſcaped the hands of the enemies, & fled without weapons to the ſea; ſome took the water, and ſtretching forth their hands to them that were aboord in the ſhips, moſt humbly beſought them for to ſave their lives: and when they ſaw the ſmall pinnaces and cockboats making apace on all hands toward them from the ſhips, they imagining that their coming was to catch them for their O priſoners rather than to kill them outright, waded farther into the water, yea, and ſome ſwimmed forward: but when they ſaw they were by them of the boats ſlain in all hoſtile manner like enemies, as many as could, ſwam back again to land: where they met with a fouler miſchief, and were worſe plagued than before: for the Elephants (driven by their governours to the ſhore) trode them under foot and cruſhed their guts out. All men generally agreed in this point, That never at any one field, were ſo many Macedonians defeated and killed by the Romans: for 20000 men were

A were there ſlain, and to the number of 6000 (who fled to Pydna out of the battail) came alive into the enemies hands; 5000 beſides were taken priſoners, as they fled ſcattering and disbanded here and there. Of the victors, there died not above an hundred, and the more part by far of Pelignians; but a greater number ſomewhat, were hurt and wounded. And if the battail had begun ſooner, that the winners might have had day enough to follow the chaſe upon their enemies, all their forces had been utterly defeated and deavoured by the ſword: but now the night coming upon them, as it covered and ſhadowed the enemies that fled, ſo it cauſed the Romans not to be ſo haſty and forward in purſuit; conſidering they were not acquainted with the coaſts of the countrey. Perſeus fled to the forreſt Pieria by the port rode way, with a great number of horſemen and his royal train about him. So ſoon as he was entred the foreſt where the way divided into
B ſundry and divers parts, ſeeing that the night approached, he turned out of the high beaten way with very few of his moſt loyal and faithful friends. The horſemen being thus abandoned and left deſtitute of their leader, ſlipt ſome one way and ſome another home into their own Cities: certain of them (but very few) recovered Pella before Perſeus himſelf, becauſe they rode a direct and ready way. The K. was much troubled and vexed until midnight almoſt, what with fear and what with difficulty to find out the way. When he was come to Pella, Euctus the Governour thereof, and the Kings pages, were ready attendant at the court to wait upon him and do him ſervice: but contrary-wiſe, of all thoſe friends who eſcaped ſafe out of the battail and chanced by variable adventures to come into Pella, there would not one come at him, notwithſtanding they were oftentimes ſent for. Three only bare him company in that flight of his, to wit, Evander of Crete, Neon
C a Bœotian, and Archidamus the Ætolian. Fearing therefore leſt they who refuſed to come unto him, would ſoon after enterpriſe ſome greater matter againſt him; with thoſe three he fled ſtill forward, about the fourth watch of the night. After him there followed upon 500 Cretenſians. Toward Amphipolis he went; but he departed in the night from Pella, making all the haſt he could to paſs over the river Axius before day-light, ſuppoſing that the Romans would give over the chaſe there, by reaſon of the difficult and dangerous foord.

The Conſul being returned into the camp with victory, (becauſe he ſhould not have the fruition of ſincere and perfect joy) was greatly diſquieted and troubled about his yonger ſon, and that was P. Scipio, ſurnamed alſo afterwards Africanus, becauſe he raſed the City of Carthage: the natural ſon he was of the Conſul Paulus, and the adopted nephew or grand-child of Africanus: he
D was at that time 17 years of age, and (which augmented the ſorrow of the father) whiles he followed in chaſe the enemies upon the ſpur, was carried by the preſs a contrary way, in ſuch ſort, as it was late ere he returned: and then the Conſul having recovered him again ſafe and ſound, felt the joy of ſo great a victory, and not before.

When the bruit and news of this battail was arrived at Amphipolis, and that the dames and wives of the City ran flocking into the Temple of Diana, whom they call Tauropolos, to beſeech and call for her aid, Diodorus the chief Governor of the City, fearing the Thracians (who were 2000 in garriſon) leſt in that tumult and garboil they would ſpoil and rifle the City; craftily ſuborned a fellow on ſet purpoſe in guiſe and ſhew of a letter-carrier, and received from him letters in the mids of the market place: wherein it was written, That the Roman fleet was arrived in Ema-
E thia, and that the territories all about were pitifully waſted by them; and therfore the rulers and captains of Emathia requeſted him to ſend a gariſon to ſuccour them againſt theſe foragers. When he had read theſe counterfeit letters, he exhorted the Thracians to undertake this expedition and to go into Emathia for to guard the coaſts thereof: giving them to underſtand, that conſidering the Romans were looſly ſtragling and ſcattered about the fields and villages, they might make a ſoul havock and ſlaughter of them, and beſides raiſe and bring away with them a great booty: withall, he forgat not to elevate aſmuch as he could, the fame of the forſaid unhappy field fought, ſaying, That if all had been true, there would have been meſſengers coming thick one after another upon their flight, to bring freſh tidings ſtill therof. Under this pretence he ſent away the Thraci-ans; and ſo ſoon as he ſaw they were paſſed over the river Strymon, incontinently he ſhut the F gates. The third day after the battail fought, came Perſeus to Amphipolis, and from thence he ſent Orators to Paulus with an herald of peace. Mean-while Hippias, Midon, and Pantaucus the Kings principal friends, went themſelves to the Conſul, and ſurrendred unto the Romans Berrhæa whither they had retired and fled immediatly out of the field. Other Cities alſo ſtrucken with fear one after another, prepared to do the like.

The Conſul, after he had ſent to Rome with tidings and letters of this victory, Q. Fabius his own ſon together with L. Lentulus and Q. Metellus, gave the ſpoil of the enemies army thus lying defeated, unto his footmen: but the horſemen he allowed the booty of all the territory round about, with condition, that they ſhould not be abſent from the camp more than two nights. Then, he removed neerer unto the ſea, and lodged about Pydna. Firſt, Berrhæa (as is beforeſaid) yeelded, then G Theſſalonica and Pella; and conſequently, all Macedony wel-neer within two daies was ſurrendred. But the Pydneans who were next unto him, as yet were behind with ſending their Embaſſadors: the reaſon was, for that the confuſed confluence thither of many nations, and the diſordered multitude of thoſe that fled out of the field and were all met there together, hindred the counſel and conſent of the whole City: ſo as the gates were not only ſhut but alſo mured up. Now were Midon and Pantaucus ſent to parl under the walls with Solon, who lay there with a garriſon: by whoſe means the whole troop and multitude of armed men was ſent away, the City rendred up and the pillage given to the ſouldiers.

Perſeus, whoſe only hope was in the aid of the Biſaltes whom he had aſſaied and ſollicited, and H for which purpoſe he had ſent his Embaſſadors (although in vain) held a publick aſſembly, and bringing his ſon Philip with him, came forth before the people; to the end that he might by ſome exhortation confirm and ſtrengthen the hearts, as well of the Amphipolitans as the companies of foot and horſe, who either at all times continually had followed him, or were retired thither by flight for refuge. But ever as he was about to make a ſpeech unto the audience (which he oft began to do) he could not proceed for tears. Now for that himſelf was not able to ſpeak, he came down from the pulpit, and imparted unto Evander the Cretenſian thoſe points, which his will was to be delivered and propoſed unto the congregation there aſſembled. The multitude, as they lamented and wept again to ſee the King ſo piteouſly ſhed tears: ſo they regarded not the ſpeech of Evander: nay, ſome of them were ſo bold as to cry out aloud from the midſt of the aſſembly, A- I way, away, and get ye gone from hence that the ſmal remnant of us here periſh not for your ſakes.
The ſtout reſolution of theſe men ſtopped Evander his mouth, that he could not ſay a word and reply again. The King by this time was gotten to his lodging, and having conveighed into certain bottoms upon the river Strymon all his money, gold, and ſilver, went alſo in perſon down to the water ſide. The Thracians durſt not go aboord and commit to ſea, but ſlunk every man away to his own home; and ſo did all the ſort of ſouldiers beſides. The Cretenſians only (for greedy hope of gain) accompanied the King, who becauſe in ſharing & dealing money among them, he ſhould incur more offence than win thanks laid out fifty talents among them upon the river ſide to ſcam-ble for. When they had made quick riddance and a clean hand with it, they went aboord in a great hurry ſo as one barge overcharged with a multitude of paſſengers was caſt away and ſunk in the K mouth of the river. That very day they arrived at Galipſus, and the morrow after at Samothrace, the very place that they intended; and thither (by report) were conveighed 2000 talents. Paulus after he had ſent preſidents to govern every City ſurrendred, to the end that no injury ſhould be offered in this new peace to the conquered, and detaining with him ſtill the Kings heralds and Orators, not knowing any thing of the Kings flight and departure, ſent P. Naſica to Amphipolis with a mean regiment of foot and horſe, to ruinat and deſtroy at once Sintica, and alſo to empeach all the deſignments and enterpriſes of the Romans.

In this time Melibœa was forced and ranſacked by Cn. Octavius: but at Æginium (to the ſiege whereof Cn. Anicius the Lieutenant was ſent) 200 men were loſt by a ſally made out of the town, for that the Æginians heard not the news of the late deſeat. L

The Conſul departed from Pydna with his whole army, and the morrow after came before Pella.
Where having encamped within a mile of the City, he made abode there for certain daies to view on all ſides the ſituation of the City, which he perceived and marked full well, to have been choſen not without good cauſe, for the imperial ſeat of the Macedonian Kings. Situat it is upon an hill that lieth to the Southweſt encloſed found with meers ſo deep as they cannot poſſibly be waded and paſſed though: and theſe mariſhes are bred and fed both winter and ſummer by waters overflowing out of certain lakes. Within the very mariſh next unto the City ſide, there ſtandeth a ſtrong Tower by it ſelf, bearing up above the reſt, as it were an Iſland raiſed upon a terrace made with exceeding labor of mans hand, which terrace both ſuſtaineth a wall, and is not hurt with the moiſture of the mariſh round about it; and a far off ſeemeth cloſe joined to the City wall. How- M beit, divided it is by a river between it and the wall, and yet united to the City by a bridg over it:
ſo as, whoſoever aſſaileth the ſame without, can have no acceſs any way to it neither, if the King be diſpoſed to ſhut and encloſe any man within, can he poſſibly make an eſcape and get forth but over the ſaid bridg; which a few men may keep and guard with eaſe. In this place the Kings trea-ſure uſed to lie, but at that time there was no more found but the 300 talents which were ſent to King Gentius firſt, and afterward ſtaid and detained. During the time that the Conſul remained about Pella in his ſtanding camp many embaſſages had audience given them, who repaired thither out of Theſſaly eſpecially to congratulate with him, teſtifying their own joy and wiſhing his. But the Conſul after that he had intelligence that Perſeus had croſſed over to Samothracia, departed from Pella, and at the fourth gift and journey that he made, came to Amphipolis. The whole mul- N titude went forth of the City in great numbers to meet him, which gave teſtimony to every man, that neither a good nor juſt King * * * * * *

A when he made answer to his their message delivered, that he would consider better what he had to do. Popilius one of the said Embassadors, with his rod that he had in his hand drew a circle about the King, and charged him to give him another answer before he went out of that circle: by which rude, rough, and blunt behavior, he forced Antiochus to lay away arms and surcease war. Divers Embassies of States and Kings came with congratulation, and were admitted into the Senat. As for that of the Rhodians, because in the late war they stood out and took part against the Romans, it was excluded. The morrow after, when it was debated in counsel, about making war upon the Rhodians, the Embassadors pleaded the cause of their countrey in the Senat: So they neither had a friendly dispatch and farewel, as allied associats, nor yet were sent away as professed enemies. Macedony was now reduced into the form of a Province. Æmylius Paulus triumphed, notwithstanding the contradiction of his own souldiers, discontented for that they B were pinched & cut short in the pillage, & although Ser. Sulpitius Galba interposed himself & gainsaid it. He led before his chariot Perseus with his three sons. And that the joy of this triumph of his should not be entire and accomplished, it remained foully it was with the death of his two sons: the one died before, the other after the triumph of the father. The Censors took a review of the City, in which were assessed and enrolled in their subsidy books 312805 citizens. Prusias King of Bithynia repaired to Rome, to rejoyce with the Senat in their behalf for the victory and conquest of Macedony, where her commended unto the Senat his son Nicomedes. This base minded King, made all of flattery, named himself the enfranchised vassal of the people of Rome.

The five and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

Quintius Fabius, L. Lentulus, and Q. Metellus, the messengers of the late victory, albeit they made all the hast that possibly they could, and came speedily to Rome, yet found the joy therof to have prevented them: for the fourth day after the battail fought with the King, even as the playes and games were exhibited in the shew-place, there was heard suddainly at first, a confused humming noise, which spred over all the companies of the spectators, That a field was fought in Macedony and Perseus vanquished: afterwards arose a more cleer and evident voice, which grew at length to an open shout and clapping of hands, as if certain news had been brought of the said victory. The magistrats wondred hereat, and made search after the author of D this so suddain gladness, but none would be found: and then verily it passed away as the momentany joy of some vain and uncertain occurrence: howbeit a joyful presage of some good luck setled in mens hearts and remained behind. But after that this was confirmed by the true report and relation of Fabius, Lentulus, and Metellus, which they made at their coming, all men rejoyced as well at the fore-giving of their minds, as for the victory it self. This joyous conceit of this assembly in the shew-place, is reported otherwise, and carrieth with it no less probability and likelihood of truth, in this manner; Upon the * 22 of September (which was the second day of the solemnity of Romans games) as the Consul was going up to the lists for to set out the running of the chariots, a post, by report, (who said he was come out of Macedony) presented letters unto him decked with lawrel. The Consul then, so soon as he had set on foot the race, presently mounted up E into his own chariot: and as he rode through the shew-place toward the common scaffolds, he shewed unto the people the said laureat letters: which being once seen, the people presently (forgetting all their sports and sights) ran out into the mids of the cirque & thither the Cos. assembled the Senat; unto whom when he had read the letters, by the advice and allowance of the LL. even before the publick stages and scaffolds, he published the contents therof to all the people in this manner, That L. Æmylius his colleague had fought a set field with K. Perseus, That the army of the Macedonians was discomfited and put to flight, That the King himself was fled with some few of his train, and that all the Cities of Macedony were subdued and brought under the subjection of the people of Rome. These tidings were no sooner heard, but there arose a shout with exceeding great applause, in so much as many men there, left the sight of these disports, and carried these joyF ful news home to their wives and children. This was the thirteenth day after the battail given in Macedony. The morrow after the Senat assembled in Curia (Hostilia) and ordained it was that publick processions should be solemnized: an Act also passed, that the Consul Æmylius should dismiss all those that had taken the military oath, excepting only the sea-souldiers and mariners: and as for the discharging of those souldiers, agreed it was, that it should be moved in the Councel-chamber, when the Lieutenants were arrived and come from L. Æmylius the Consul, for they had dispatched a courrier with letters before them. Now these messengers aforesaid entred the City the * 25th of September about the second hour of the day, and drew after them a mighty train of those who encountring them upon the way whersoever they went, accompanied them to Rome and so directly went to the market-place and tribunal seat. In fortuned that the Senators sat then in the ordinary G Curia or Councel-house, and thither the Consul brought the Embassadors. Where they were received and held so long only as they might declare these points, How great the Kings forces were, as well in foot as horse; how many thousand were slain, how many taken prisoners; what small loss of Roman souldiers that great defeat of enemies cost; how few they were in number that the King fled with; that it was supposed he would pass into Samothracia; that the fleet was in readines to make way after them in chase; and that it was not possible for him to escape either by Land or Sea. And then anon they were brought forth before the general assembly of the people, where

* ad Sext. Calend. Octobris.

they made relation of the ſame. And then the joy was renewed upon proclamation made by the H Conſul, That all the ſacred temples and churches ſhould be ſet open: and that every man ſhould depart out of the aſſembly to render thanks unto the Gods: in ſuch ſort, that all the temples of the Gods throughout the whole City were repleniſhed with mighty multitudes and congregations not of men only, but alſo of women. Then the Senat met again in the ordinary Curia: and ordained that publick proceſſions and thanks ſhould be made for five daies together in all Churches and Chappels and at every Altar for the happy and fortunat ſucceſs of L. Æmylius, and that greater head of beaſts ſhould be killed for ſacrifice. Alſo that the ſhips which rid ready rigged and well appointed in the river Tyberis for to be ſent into Macedony, (in caſe it had ſo faln out that the King had been able to have reſiſted) ſhould be retired and drawn to land, and ſo laid up drie in their docks and arſenals: alſo that the mariners ſhould be caſſed, after the receit of a whole years pay, I and together with all thoſe who had ſworn to ſerve the Conſul, ſhould have their conge and paſport to be gone. Item, that all the ſouldiers in Corcyra, Brundusium, about the Adriatick ſea, or in the territory of the Latinats (for in all theſe there was an army ſet in readineſs, wherwith C. Licinius if need required ſhould have ſuccoured his colleague) ſhould have their diſcharge. Alſo proceſſions were publiſhed in the full aſſembly of the people, to begin * from the tenth day of October, and ſo to hold on five daies after.

* ex a.d. quint. Idus Octob.

Out of Illyricum alſo two Lieutenants or meſſengers, to wit, L. Licinius Nerva and P. Decius, brought word that the army of the Illyrians was defeated: that King Gentius was taken priſoner, & that all Illyricum was reduced under the obeiſance of the people of Rome. For which exploits atchieved by the leading and conduct of L. Anicius the Prætor, the Senat decreed a ſolemn proceſſion K to be holden for three daies, like as alſo the Latine feaſt & holy-daies were proclamed by the Conſul, for to be holden the * ninth, tenth, and eleventh daies of November. Some have recorded that the Rhodian Embaſſadors had not yet their diſpatch, nor were ſent away, but after the news of this victory, were called into the Senat in mockery and ſcorn of that ſottiſh inſolence and pride of their own. And then Agepolis the principal perſon of them ſpake in this manner, "That the Rho-
"dians had ſent them in deed as Embaſſadors to treat about an accord & to make peace between "the Romans and King Perſeus, for that this war as it was grievous and prejudicial to all Greece,
"ſo it could not chuſe but be chargeable and hurtful to the Romans themſelves. But ſaln out it is "paſſing well through the goodneſs of fortune, that the war is ended otherwiſe: and hath given "them ſo good an occaſion and opportunity, to rejoyce and teſtify their joy in the behalf of the L
"Romans, for the atchievance of ſo brave and notable a victory. Thus much ſpake the Rhodian. And then the Senat made anſwer again, "That the Rhodians had ſent that embaſſy not regarding "the good and profit of Greece, nor yet for any care they had of the expenſes defraied by the Ro"mans, but only in love and favor of King Perſeus. For if they had been reſpective unto them (as "they would make ſemblance and have the world to think) they ſhould have addreſſed their Em-
"baſſadors when as Perſeus invaded Theſsaly with an army, & for two years ſpace perſecuted and "plagued the cities of Greece, beſieging ſome, & frighting others with menaces of war: yet all that "while, not a word with the Rhodians as touching peace. But after that they heard once that the "Romans were mounted over the ſtreights and paſſed through into Macedony: that King Perſeus
"was ſhut up and enclofed ſure enough for ſtarting any way, then and not before, they could ſend M an embaſſage for no other reaſon in the world but to rid and deliver Perſeus out of that imminent "danger which threatned him ſo neer hand. With which anſwer the Embaſſ. were ſent away.

* in a quart. ter. & prid. Idus Novembr.

About the very ſame time M. Marcellus being departed out of his government in the province of Spain, after he had forced and won Marcolica a renowned and famous City in thoſe parts, brought home with him and beſtowed in the publick treaſury ten pound weight of gold, and * about a million of Seſterces in ſilver coin.

Paulus Æmylius the Conſul lying encamped (as is aforeſaid) neer Syra in the Odomantidian territory, when he ſaw the letters from King Perſeus brought unto him by three Embaſſadors of baſe condition, wept (by report) himſelf, to conſider the frailty of this world, and the fickle ſtate of mans life; to ſee (I ſay) that he who erewhile could not reſt content with the roialty of Macedony, N but would needs war upon the Dardanians and Illyrians, and levy the aid of the Baſtarnians, was now after the loſs of his army, as one exiled out of his own Kingdom, driven into a ſmall Iland, where, like a poor ſuppliant he remained in ſurety, not by means of his own forces, but through the religious protection of a ſanctuary & privileged place. But when he read the ſuperſcription of the letter with this ſtile. King Perſeus to the Conſul Paulus, greeting, he could no more pity him, for thinking of his blockiſh folly, in that he had no ſence and feeling of the calamity and miſery wherin he ſtood. And therfore albeit the contents of the letter otherwiſe were praiers ſo demiſs and abject as little ſavoured of a princely mind, yet was that embaſſage diſmiſſed without anſwer and without letters. Perſeus ſoon perceived what title it was that he muſt lay down and forget now that he was vanquiſhed: wherupon he addreſſed other letters in quality of a privat perſon with- O out any other addition at all: and by thoſe as he craved, ſo obtained he likewiſe, that certain agents ſhould be ſent unto him, with whom he might parley and commune as touching the ſtate and condition of his preſent fortune. So three delegat Embaſſadors were ſent unto him, namely, P. Lentulus, A. Poſthumius Albinus and A. Antonius. But nothing was effected in this agency or Embaſſage; whiles Perſeus ſtuck hard and laboured all he could to hold ſtill and keep the roial name of King, and Paulus endeavoured contrary-wiſe, that he ſhould ſubmit himſelf and all that he had

A to the protection and clemency of the people of Rome. During these debates and affaires between them, the fleet of Cn. Octavius was arrived at Samothrace, who also presenting before their eyes fearfull objects of terror, went about to force him as well by threats and menaces, as to win him by hope of fair intreaty and good usage to yeeld and submit; and herein he found some help by means of an occurrent, either hapning by chance and meer adventure, or contrived by mans device of set purpose. L. Attilius a noble yong Gentleman, perceiving that the people of the Samothracians were met in a general assembly, requested of the Magistrats that he might be permitted to make a short speech unto the people. Good leave he had, and then he began in this wise; "My "masters and friends of Samothracia, I would gladly know, whether it be a false fable or a true tale "which we have heard, That this is a sacred Iland, and the soil therof holy and altogether inviol-
B "able? When they all accorded in one consent, that the Iland was as holy and sacred as it was re- "ported: How is it then (qd. he) that a murtherer hath violated and polluted it with the blood "of King Eumenes? And considering that in all preambles and prefaces of sacred and divine service "premised, they are commanded precisely to avant from the ministery thereof who have not pure "and innocent hands; will you suffer in deed your most secret sanctuaries and devout tabernacles "to be stained with the bloody body of a thief and fellon? Now was it a rife report and common bruit in every City of Greece, That K. Eumenes had like to have been murdred at Delphos by Evander. The Samothracians, besides that they saw their whole Iland and the said Temple to be in the power and puissance of the Romans, took these reproofs and reproaches to touch them neer, and not without just cause: whereupon they sent Theondas, the soveraign magistrate (whom they call
C their K.) unto King Perseus, giving him to understand, "That Evander the Cretensian was charged "with murder: also that by custom and tradition from their ancestors, they had full power and "authority to proceed by order of law, against all those that were presented and endited for en- "tring within the liberties and sacred precincts of the Temple, with unclean and unpure hands. "Now if Evander stand upon his innocency, and knoweth himself cleer and unguilty of the capital "crime laid to his charge, let him come to his answer and plead his cause for his own defence, and "he shall be heard: but if he dare not hazard the judicial tryal of the issue, retire he and depart, "that he pollute not the temple; let him shift for himself and escape away. Perseus called forth Evander unto him, willing him in no case to try the process of justice; for neither would his cause justify him nor any favour bear him out. He much feared withal, lest being cast and condemned,
D he would bewray Perseus himself and appeach him for the setter and author of that so horrible a fact: and no way then but one, even with patience and resolution to take his death. Evander gainsaid nought in outward appearance, but pretending in words, that he had rather dye by a cup of poison than upon the swords point, sought secret means to flie and be gone. The King upon advertisement hereof, fearing lest the Samothracians would discharge their anger upon him, as if he had wrought his evasion to avoid due punishment, commanded Evander to be made away and killed. After which murder committed thus rashly without al advisement, he be thought himself, & considered, that he should be touched deeply with the same spot of guilt that Evander was noted with: namely, that as Eumenes was by Evander wounded at Delphos, so Evander by him was murdered in Samothracia; and so the two most holy and religious temples in the world were stained E and polluted with mans blood; and who but he the cause and contriver thereof? But the blame of this foul fact of his, was by the corruption of Theondas quite averted another way; and he for a sum of money bare the people in hand, that Evander was his own hangman. But Perseus by this lewd and detestable act, committed upon the person of the only friend whom he had alive, (so well approved and tried by him in so many adventures, and now betraied for his labour by him, unto whom he refused to be a traitor) estranged clean the hearts and affections of all men from him: so as now every man ranged with the Romans. Thus abandoned as he was and left to himself, they forced him to cast about and devise how to escape and be gone. Whereupon he called unto him Oroandes the Cretensian, a man that knew well the coasts of Thrace (because he had negotiated and traded in those parts;) and with him he dealt to embark him in some small foist, and F so to conduct him into Coty. Now there was a certain bay under a promontory of Thrace, wherein a pinnace stood in readiness: thither, after sun-setting were all things brought for necessary use; and money withal, asmuch as closely cold be conveighed. The King himself at midnight accompanied with three persons (for no more were privy to this his flight) went out at a postern or back dore of the house, into a garden neer his bed-chamber, and so with much ado having clambred over a mud wall, passed to the water side. Now was Oroandes already loosed from the foresaid creek, for so soon as the money was once brought thither into the vessel, he lanched into the deep and set his course for Candy. Perseus, after that the bark was not to be found in the bay, walked and wandred a good while along the strand: and fearing at last the day-light approaching (yet not so hardy as to adventure back again to his lodging) lurked behind in one side of the temple close
G unto a blind corner and nook thereof. Among the Macedonians they called those the Kings pages who were the Princes and noble mens sons, chosen to serve and wait upon the person of the King. That company yet followed after the K. in his flight, and as hard as the world went, departed not from him until such time as by the commandment of Cn. Octavius, the publick cryer pronounced with a loud voice, That the Kings pages and all other Macedonians besides in Samothracia, if they would turn to the Romans, should enjoy with safety of life their estate entire, their liberty free, and all that ever they either had about them, or was left in Macedony. At which proclamation once publiſhed, they all immediatly revolted to the Romans, and entred their names with C. Poſthumius, a martial colonel. Likewiſe Ion of Theſſalonica, delivered into the hands of Octavius the yong infants of the King, and not one of them all was left with Perſeus, but Philip his eldeſt ſon: and then he yeelded both himſelf and that ſon into the hands of Octavius, crying out upon fortune, and blaming the Gods in whoſe Temple they were, for that he received no aid and ſuccour from them, notwithſtanding he humbly craved and beſought the ſame. Then commandment was given, that he ſhould be embarked in the admirals ſhip: and thither alſo was brought aboord all the money that remained, and then forthwith the fleet retired to Amphipolis: from whence Octavius ſent the King to the camp unto the conſul, but firſt he had diſpatched his letters to give him knowledge, that he was ſure enough under his hand, and that he was at the point to be brought unto him. Paulus, reputing this for a ſecond victory, (as it was no leſs indeed to be eſteemed) preſently upon the receit of the meſſage, killed beaſts for ſacrifice: and when he had called his councel about him, and read the letters of the Pretor before them, he ſent Q. Ælius Tubero to meet the K. upon the way, and commanded the reſt in good frequency to remain in his capital pavillion, and give attendance upon him. Never was there ſeen before, ſo great a multitude to run out for to ſee any ſolemn ſight or pageant. In their fathers daies King Syphax was taken priſoner and brought into the Roman camp; who beſides that there was no compariſon between him and Perſeus, either in regard of his own name or the renown of his nation, was then alſo but an acceſſary as it were to the Punick war, like as Gentius now to the Macedonian. Perſeus was the very head of this war, neither was it the fame of his father and grandſire only (whom he neerly touched in birth and blood) that made him renowned, but the reſplendent glory of Philip and Alexander the Great, who brought the ſoveraign empire and monarchy of the whole world to the Macedonian nation. Well, Perſeus entred the camp arrayed in a black cloak, without any one of his own train to accompany him, who partaking his miſery, might cauſe more compaſſion to be had of him. The affluence of the people was ſo great who went out to ſee him, that for the very preſe he could not march forward, untill ſuch time as the conſul ſent his ſergeants and huiſhers to void the thronging of the multitude, and make way for him to go to the conſul his pavillion. The conſul aroſe, and (giving commandment to the reſt for to ſit ſtill) advanced forward a little, and raught out his hand to the King as he entred into the pavillion; and when he bowed and debaſed himſelf to his very feet, he took him up again and would not ſuffer him once to touch his knees, but led him into the tent and cauſed him to ſit down right over-againſt thoſe whom he called thither to councel. The firſt queſtion that he demanded of him was this; "What wrong he had "ſuſtained at the hands of the people of Rome, that he ſhould be conſtrained to enterpriſe and be- "gin the war againſt them with ſo maliciousa mind as he did, and ſo to hazard himſelf, his whole "ſtate and Kingdom, in ſuch extremity of danger? And when every man attended what anſwer he would make, he ſtaied a good while without utterance of one word caſting his eyes wiſtly upon the ground, and ſhedding tears withal. "Then ſpake the conſul again: If you had been but "yong (qd. he) when you came to the crown, I would verily for my part marvail the leſs, that you "ſhould be ſo ignorant as not to know how important it was, to have the people of Rome either "for a friend or an enemy: but now, ſince you both had your hand in that war which your father "waged againſt us and alſo could not chuſe but remember the peace afterwards made with him, "and which we obſerved moſt faithfully, What policy was it for you to entertain war rather "than peace, with them, whoſe force you had tried in war and whoſe fidelity you had found in peace? Whenas he would yet make no anſwer at all either to queſtion or accuſation, the conſul went on and ſaid: "Well, howſoever theſe things are thus faln out and come to paſs, be it through "the error and frailty of man by adventure of fortune and hard hap, or fatal neceſſity of the deſti- "nies, be of good chear yet, and take a mans heart unto you: the gracious clemency and mercy of "the people of Rome, well known and proved in the misfortunes of many Princes and States, af- "foord unto you not only hope, but certain aſſurance of ſafety. Thus much ſpake he to Perſeus in the Greek tongue: then, turning to his own aſſiſtants and company about him, he directed his ſpeech to them in Latine as followeth. "A notable example and rare mirrour you ſee (qd. he) of "the changeable variety of this world: to you I ſpeak eſpecially, my maſters here that are freſh "and youthful gallants in the heat of your yong blood. And therefore let no man in time of his "proſperity, carry himſelf proud and violent againſt another, nor yet confidently to truſt upon "the preſent ſtate wherein he is, for who knoweth what may hap once yet before midnight? But "him alone will I hold for a man of valour indeed, whoſe heart neither the gentle gale of this "fawning and flattering world is able to liſt aloft, nor yet the bluſtering blaſts of frowning fortune "caſt down or daſh upon the rocks. After the conſul was riſen and departed, he committed the charge and cuſtody of keeping the King to Quintus Ælius. But for that day Perſeus was not only invited courteouſly to ſup with the conſul, but reſpected alſo in all kind of honor, as poſſibly might be done unto him in that ſtate and condition of his.

After this the army was divided here and there into garriſons for the winter time. The greateſt part thereof was received into Amphipolis, and the other cities neer adjoining entertained the reſt. This was the end of the war between Perſeus and the Romans, which had endured four years one after another continually: and here an end withal of the moſt flouriſhing Kingdom of the greateſt part of Europe and of all Aſia. Perſeus was counted the twentieth King after Caranus, who was the firſt that raigned there. This Perſeus began his raign that year wherein Q. Fulvius and

A and L. Manlius were Conſuls. In the time of M. Junius and A. Manlius Conſuls of Rome, the Senat entituled and honoured him with the name of King, and eleven years his raign continued. The name of theſe Macedonians was very obſcure and baſe, untill the daies of Philip the ſon of Amyntas. From that time and by his means it began to grow and wax great: howbeit, contained it was within the compaſs and precincts of Europe, comprehending all Greece, and part of Thrace and Illyricum. Afterwards it ſpread into Aſia, and in thirteen years ſpace, during the raign of Alexander, it ſubdued and brought under ſubjection, firſt all thoſe parts whereunto the empire of the Perſians extended, which was an infinit dominion in circuit: afterwards it reached to Arabia and India, even to the end of the earth, bounding and confining all about upon the red ſea. At that
B time was the monarchy and name of the Macedonians the greateſt in the whole world, but upon the death of Alexander, diſtracted it was and divided into many and ſundry Kingdoms. And whiles each one endeavoured & ſtrove by force to draw unto him more and more puiſſance, they diſmembred and rent the whole: & ſo from the higheſt top & pitch of proſperity, brought it down to a moſt baſe and low condition, after it had continued in good eſtate a hundred and fifty years.

When the bruit of the Romans victory was blazed and blown as far as to Aſia, Antenor who with a fleet of barks and pinnaces rid in the harbour of Phanæ, ſailed from thence to Caſſandrea. C. Popilius, who was in Delos to guard and waſt thoſe ſhips which were bound for Macedony, after he heard ſay that the war in Macedony was brought to an end, and the enemies veſſels removed out of their rode, diſmiſſed alſo for his part the Athenian ſhips, intending to go forward in his voiage
C for Ægypt, to accompliſh that embaſſage which he had taken in hand: to the end that he might encounter Antiochus, before he approached the walls of Alexandria. As theſe Embaſſadors coaſted along the river of Aſia, and were arrived at Loryma (a port ſomewhat more than twenty miles diſtant from Rhodes, and ſituat juſt over againſt the city) the principal States of Rhodes, met him in the way (for now by this time was the fame of this victory flown ſo far) requeſting him to ſet ſail thither and there to land: for that it concerned their city much in fame and reputation, yea, and was expedient for their good and ſafety, that they ſhould be made acquainted with all that either had been done or was now in hand at Rhodes, and ſo to make report thereof at Rome upon their own knowledge, and not as things were voiced by the common bruit. They refuſed a long time; but in the end they were ſo importuned, that content they were to ſail a little farther, and ſpend
D ſome ſmall time for to gratify and benefit a city aſſociat unto them. When they were come to Rhodes, the ſame principal citizens aforeſaid urged them inſtantly with much prayer and entreaty to come into their general aſſembly of the people. The arrival of thoſe Embaſſadors rather augmented than empaired the fear of the city. For Popilius made rehearſal there in open audience, of all which had been done or ſpoken (ſounding any way to hoſtility) either in particular or in general by them, during the late war. And being as he was, a grim ſir, tough and fierce by nature, he aggravated all that he ſpake, with his ſour viſage and ſharp language, like an accuſer at the bar: inſomuch as they might well conjecture and gueſſe, how the whole body of the Senate ſtood affected unto them, by the bitterneſs of one only Senator, who otherwiſe for himſelf had no occaſion of particular ill will and malice againſt the city. But the ſpeech of Decimius was more temperat, who ſaid, E that the blame of thoſe imputations for the moſt part which were objected by Popilius, was not to be laid upon the people, but upon a few perſons, who had ſollicited and ſtirred the multitude: for thoſe having their tongue at hire, and uſing to ſpeak for gain, had made decrees full of flattery to pleaſe the King, and ſent ſuch embaſſages, as the Rhodians at all times were no leſs aſhamed than repented of. All which practiſes of theirs no doubt would fall upon their heads who were faulty, in caſe the people had the government and rule in their own hands. Audience he had with great aſſent and applauſe; not more for elevating the fault and treſpaſs of the common people, than for laying the weight upon thoſe that were the authors culpable. And therefore when the chief men among them made anſwer to the Romans, their words, who went about to excuſe and ſalve in ſome ſort as well as they could the articles objected by Popilius, were not ſo well taken, as their
F ſpeech who accorded to Decimius, in delivering the guilty perſons and offenders to be puniſhed according to their demerits. Wherupon there paſſed preſently a decree, That all thoſe who might be convicted of any deed done or word ſpoken in favour of Perſeus againſt the Romans, ſhould be condemned and have ſentence to loſe their heads. Some of theſe perſons were departed out of the city upon the coming of the Romans, others laid violent hands upon themſelves. Theſe Embaſſadors or delegats having ſojourned no longer than five daies at Rhodes, departed and made ſail for Alexandria. And notwithſtanding their abſence, the execution of judicial proceeding was no leſs hotly followed at Rhodes, according to the decree made in their preſence. For the moderation and gentle cariage of Decimius was the very cauſe that they perſiſted reſolute, and gave not over untill they had gone through with it, and diſpatched all.

G Whiles theſe affairs were thus managed, Antiochus after he had aſſaied in vain to force the walls of Alexandria, was departed from before the city, & having poſſeſſed himſelf of all Ægypt beſides, and left the elder Ptolomæus at Memphis, (for whoſe behoof he pretended by his own forces to reconquer the Kingdom, to the end that ſoon after the conqueſt obtained he might ſet upon him likewiſe) withdrew his army away into Syria. Ptolomæus for his part was nothing ignorant of his deſignment and intention, making full account, that whiles he kept his yonger brother affrighted with the fear of ſiege, by the help of his ſiſter he might be received into Alexandria: conſidering withal, that his brothers friends were not oppoſed againſt him, firſt he ſent unto his ſiſter, afterwards to his brother and his friends, and never gave over to write and ſend, before he had concluded and eſtabliſhed a peace with them. The thing that made him to ſuſpect Antiochus was this, for that when he had made over all the reſt of * Ægypt unto him, he left yet a ſtrong gariſon behind at Peluſium: and well he knew, that he held ſtill the frontier Towns as the very keies of Ægypt, to the end that he might with an army enter and invade again, whenſoever he would. And thus he conceived of it, that this would be the iſſue of the civil and domeſtical war between brethren, That the victor wearied with war, ſhould not be able to make head againſt Antiochus. Theſe things wiſely forecaſt and ſeen by the elder brother, were received with aſſent of the yonger and thoſe that were aſſiſtant about him: and the ſiſter between ſtood in very good ſtead, not by her good advice and counſel only, but alſo by her effectual praiers. And therefore by a general accord of all, a peace was concluded, and the elder Ptolomæus received into Alexandria, without any gainſaying or reſiſtance at all ſo much as of the very multitude; notwithſtanding that during the war they were much decaied and weakned (not only by the ſiege, but alſo after it was raiſed and the army gone from Alexandria) for want of all things, by reaſon that no proviſions were brought thither from out of Ægypt. Now, where as Antiochus ſhould have taken great contentment and rejoyced much for this, in caſe he had brought his forces into Ægypt for to reſtore Ptolomeus into his own eſtate (which was the goodly pretence and colourable ſhew that he made to all the States of Aſia and Greece, when he received their embaſſages, or ſent forth his letters into all parts) ſo it fell out, that he was ſo highly offended and diſpleaſed hereat, that he went in hand and prepared to make war now againſt them both much more eagerly and with greater malice than before againſt one alone. Preſently he rigged and ſent out his navy at ſea to Cyprus; himſelf in perſon at the beginning of the ſpring minding to invade Ægypt, marched forward with his army as far as into Cœlo-Syria. The Embaſſadors of Ptolomæus encountred him in his journey about * Rhinocolura, and gave him thanks in behalf of their K. and maſter, for that by his means he had recovered the inheritance of his fathers Kingdom: requeſting withal to maintain that benefit and good deed of his, to declare rather by word of mouth what he would have done, than deal by ſword in hand and force of arms, and not of a friend and ally to become a mortal enemy. His anſwer was, that he would neither call back his fleet nor withdraw his army upon any condition, unleſs he quit unto his uſe as well the whole Iſle of Cyprus, as the City * Peluſium, together with the territory about the mouth of Nilus, called * Peluſiacum Oſtium. And therewith he ſet him down a day, before which he expected to receive his anſwer as touching the accompliſhment of the ſaid conditions. After the day prefixed for the truce was paſt, as they ſailed in the mouth of Nilus neer Peluſium, the ſtates along the deſerts of Arabia yeelded. Then, being received of them that inhabite about Memphis, and the reſt of the Ægyptians, partly with favor and good will and partly for fear and conſtraint; by ſmall journies he deſcended toward Alexandria. When he was paſſed over the river at Leuſine (a place about 4 miles diſtant from Alexandria) the Roman Embaſſadors met him upon the way. After greetings and ſalutations at their firſt coming, he put forth his right hand to Popilius; but he delivered unto him a ſcroll written, and willed him before he did any thing elſe to read that ſcript. After he had read the writing through he anſwered that he would deviſe with his friends and conſider what was beſt to be done. But Popilius according to his ordinary blunt manner of ſpeech which he had by nature made a circle about the King with the rod that he had in his hand, and withal, "Make me an anſwer (qd. he) I adviſe you ſuch as I may report to the Senate, before you paſs the compaſs of this circle. The King aſtonied at this ſo rude and violent a commandment, after he had ſtaied and pauſed a while: I will be content (qd. he) to do whatſoever the Senat ſhall ordain. Then and not before, Popilius gave the King his hand as to a friend and ally. Afterwards when Antiochus was departed out of Ægypt by the day prefixed, the ſaid Embaſſ. or delegats having by their authority eſtabliſhed concord alſo between the two brethren (who as yet were not throughly agreed) ſome of them ſailed to Cyprus, and from thence they ſent away the fleet of Antiochus, which already had given an overthrow in battail to the Ægyptian ſhips. This was a noble embaſſage and much renowned among thoſe nations, for that thereby Ægypt was undoubtedly taken from Antiochus, who was as good as poſſeſſed thereof already, and the inheritance of the Kingdom reſtored again to the race of Ptolomeus.

Of the two Conſuls that year, like as the one was famous in his place by this notable victory, ſo the other was little or nothing ſpoken of, by reaſon he had not matter of any great exploit to be emploied in. And firſt of all when he was aſſigned a certain day for the legions to meet, he entred into the temple without the lucky approbation of the auſpices. And when the Augurs were moved and their advice required therin, they declared, that there was an error committed in the appointment of the ſaid day. In his voiage for France he kept his ſtanding leaguer for the ſummer time about the mountains Sicimina and Papinus neer the plains called * Macri. And afterwards he wintred about the ſame places with the allies of the Latine nation. For the Roman legions becauſe the day was not rightly appointed for the aſſembly of the forces at the Rendes-vous, remained behind at Rome. Alſo the Pretors, ſave only C. Papyr. Carbo, unto whoſe lot Sardinia was faln, went forth into their Provinces: and him the LL. of the Senate had ordained to attend upon his civill juriſdiction at Rome between citizens and forrainers. Popilius likewiſe, that embaſſage which was ſent to Antiochus returned to Rome: where he made relation that the controverſies between the two Kings were decided & the army of Antiochus retired out of Ægypt into Syria. After this, came the Embaſſ. alſo of the Kings themſelves. Thoſe of Antiochus made report that the King their maſter

A master esteemed more of the peace approved by the Senat, than of any victory whatsoever: and obeied the orders set down by the Roman Embassadors, no less than the very messengers coming with commandments directly from the Gods: and finally they testified their own contentment, and wished them great joy of their victory obtained, saying that the King himself would have been with all his power at the atchieving thereof, in case he had been enjoined to perform any service. The Embassadors of Ptolomeus in the name jointly of their King and of Cleopatra, rendred thanks unto them, acknowledging themselves more bound & beholden to the Senat and people of Rome, than to their own parents, yea, & more than to the immortal Gods; for by their good means they were first delivered from the most lamentable miseries of a siege, and had recovered their fathers Kingdom, which they were at the point to have lost for ever. The Senat returned this answer a-
B gain, That whereas Antiochus had been ruled by the Embassadors, therin he did well and as it beseemed him, and in so doing he highly contented and pleased the Senat and people of Rome. Again, if Ptolomæus and Cleopatra the King and Queen of Ægypt, had found any goodness and commodity by them, the Senat was very glad therfore and rejoyced thereat and would endevour and work it so, that they might be perswaded that the greatest assurance and safeguard of their realm rested at all times most in the faithful protection of the people of Rome. This said, the Pretor C. Papyrius had in charge to see that presents and gifts were sent to these Embassadors according to the ancient custome. Then were letters brought out of Macedony to redouble the joy of the victory, importing that Perseus was sure enough in the hands of the Consul.

When those Embassadors were dismissed and gone, much debate and argument there was be-
C tween the Embassadors of the Pisans and Lunenses. They of Pisa complained that they were disseized & driven out of their territory by the Roman colonors: contrary wise those of Luna plainly averred, that the Land in controversy had been set out and assigned for them by the Triumvirs. The Senat hereupon sent five men as commissioners to make inquisition into the limits of the said territory and to determine accordingly, and those were Q. Fabius Buteo, P. Cornelius Blasio, T. Sempronius Musca, L. Nævius Balbus, and C. Apuleius Saturninus. There came likewise a solemn embassage sent in common from Eumenes, Attalus, and Athenæus all three brethren to notify the joy and contentment which they took for the Romans victory. Moreover, L. Manlius the treasurer was ready at Puteoli to receive and welcome Masgaba the son of K. Masanissa, as he should disbark
D and set on land: for sent he was of purpose with money to meet him upon the way, to conduct him also and bring him to Rome at the cities charges. He was no sooner come, but immediatly audience was given him in the Senat. "This yong Prince spake in such sort, as the things which of "themselves were acceptable enough indeed, he graced and made more worthy of acceptance by "his good words. He rehearsed what forces of foot and horse both, how many Elephants, what "quantity of corn for that four years space (during the war) his father had sent over into Mace- "dony. But two things there were for which he was dismaied and could not chuse but blush: the "one, that the Senat by their Embass. had made request unto him, and not commanded father to "furnish them with necessaries for the war: the other, that they had sent them mony to pay for "their corn. For Masanissa was not forgetful, but bare well in mind, that he held his Kingdom as E "first conquered for him, afterwards augmented and amplified many waies unto him by the peo-"ple of Rome: and for his own part, he could content himself with the use and occupation therof, "as a tenant in fee-farm; acknowledging the propriety and possession thereof to be in them, who "as Lords of the fee feoffed him therein. Good reason therefore and meet it was that they also "should be bold with their own, to take and not to ask, to have and not to crave, much less then "to buy the commodities & fruits issuing out of the lands by them demised, given & granted. As "for Masanissa, sufficed he was, and evermore would rest contented with that overplus which the "people of Rome might leave and spare for him. Thus much (qd. he) I had in charge and commis-"sion from my fathers own mouth, when I departed and took my leave of him: but afterwards "certain horsmen riding post overtook me, to let me understand that Macedony was subdued; and "to charge me, that after I had signified our joy in your behalf I should shew unto the Senat, that F "my father took such contentment therin, that he would gladly come to Rome, to offer sacrifice "and render thanks to Iup. opt. Max. in the Capitol: which to do he requested leave of the Senat, "so it might stand with their good liking, and be no trouble unto them. The Prince received this "answer from the Senat That his father Masanissa did as beseemed a good man and thankful per-"son so to do, in giving such a grace and honor over & above, to benefit of duty required. More-"over, that the people of Rome acknowledged how they had received great help at his hands in the "Punick war by his valiant and loial service, as well as he obtained his Kingdom through the fa-"vour of the people of Rome, yea, and afterwards according to equity and justice had born himself "right worthily in all sorts of devoirs and duties during the wars of three Kings one after ano-"ther. Neither was it any marvel at all that he rejoiced at the victory of the people of Rome, be-G "ing a King who had engaged, hazarded and entangled all his own fortunes and the whole estate "of his Kingdom with the Roman affairs. As for rendring thanks to the Gods for the victory of "the people of Rome, let him do that himself in his own house at home; for it should suffice, that "his son for him performed that duty at Rome. That he and his father both had sufficiently for "their parts testified their joy. As for Masanissa in proper person to leave his realm and depart out "of Africk, over and besides that it was in no wise profitable to himself, the Senate deemed it "not expedient for the weal-publick of the people of Rome. Masgaba further-more requested, that Hanno the ſon of Amilcar ſhould be ſent hoſtage in place of another Carthaginian (whoſe name is not known;) but the Senat anſwered, That they thought it not meet to demand hoſtages at the pleaſure of Maſaniſſa. The treaſurer was commanded by order from the Senat, to buy certain preſents for to beſtow upon this yong Prince, namely, as much plate as might ariſe out of an 100 pound weight of ſilver: alſo to accompany him as far as Puteoli; to defray all his charges during his abode within Italy; and to hire two ſhips for to tranſport and conduct him & his princely train into Africk. To all his retinue as well bond as free there was allowance made of apparel.

Not long after, were letters brought as concerning Miſſagenes the ſecond ſon of Maſaniſſa, who after that Paulus had vanquiſhed Perſeus, was ſent home by the ſaid Paulus into Africk with his Cavalry: but as he ſailed, was driven (ſick as he was) upon Brundiſium with three ſhips only, for that the reſt of the fleet was diſperſed in the Adriatick Sea. Sterbinius the treaſurer was ſent to him at Brundiſium, with the like gifts as were beſtowed upon his brother at Rome, and a charge to ſee to his lodging.

By vertue of an act granted out of the Senat, the Libertins [i. the ſons of freed men] were enrolled into the four tribes of the City, all ſave thoſe who had a ſon above five years old; with expreſs commandment, That when they were to be enrolled at the review next enſuing, their goods alſo ſhould be valued, and they accordingly entred into the ſubſidy books; namely, That as many of them as poſſeſſed any manor or manors in the countrey, eſteemed better worth than 30000 Seſterces, ſhould be enrolled and aſſeſſed. This ordinance being thus obſerved, Claudius denied flatly, that the Cenſor had authority to * take from any particular perſon, and much leſs from a whole ſtate and degree of men, the right and liberty of ſuffrages, without the warrant and ordinance of the people: for ſay, that he have power to caſs a man out of his tribe, (which is nothing elſe but to command him to change his tribe) it followeth not then, that he may diſpoſſeſs and diſplace him out of all the 35 tribes, which is as much as to ſtrike him out of the number of citizens, and deprive him quite of his freedom and burgeoſſie: and is not (I ſay) to limit and ſet down in what rank he ſhall be enrolled, but to exclude him full and wholly out of all enrolment. This diſpute and debate paſſed between them; untill at laſt they grew to this point, that of the four City tribes, they ſhould caſt lots openly in the Hall and Cloiſter of Libertus for one tribe, in which all they ſhould be regiſtred and comprifed, who had been villains ſometimes and were enfranchiſed. Now this lot fell to the tribe Exquilina. Then Tib. Gracchus pronounced, That ordained it was to enroll in it all the Libertins. Great honour and reputation with the Senat gained the Cenſors by this act: Sempronius likewiſe wan much thanks therefore, becauſe he had perſiſted conſtantly in that good enterpriſe ſo well commenſed: and Claudius went not without his due thank, for that he was no hindrance to this proceeding. In this review and ſurvey taken by the Cenſors, more Senators were removed and put out of the counſel, yea, and more Gentlemen commanded to ſell their horſes of ſervice, than by other Cenſors in former time. And all thoſe by both of them joynely were not only diſplaced out of their tribes, and made no better than Ærarii (i. to loſe their voice) but alſo to pay all taxes whatſoever to the utmoſt. And look who was noted and diſgraced by the one, had no relief nor hope to recover his credit and place by the other. Now when theſe Cenſors demanded, That according to a cuſtome and order, they might be allowed a years ſpace and two months, to look into the reparations of the publick edifices, that they were maintained wind-tight and water-tight; as alſo to ſee whether they who had undertaken to finiſh certain works at a price, had performed their bargain accordingly: Cn. Tremellius a Tribune interpoſed himſelf and denied this demand, for anger that he was not choſen and taken into the Senat. The ſame year C. Cicereius dedicated a chappel in the Albane mount, which he had vowed five years before. Alſo that year was L. Poſthumius Albinus enſtalled a Flamine of Mars. The Conſuls Q. Ælius and M. Junius propounded in the Senate, as touching the government of their Provinces: and the LL. ordained, That Spain ſhould be divided again into two Provinces, which had been united in one during the Macedonian war: alſo that the ſame L. Paulus and L. Anicius ſhould defend and keep in obedience as before, Macedony and Illyricum, until ſuch time as they by the advice of certain deputed commiſſioners, had both compoſed all matters and affairs diſordered and troubled by the wars; and alſo reformed the eſtate of that realm, by inducing it into a new form. The Provinces aſſigned unto the Conſuls were Piſæ and Gaul, and they had the command of two legions of footmen, and four hundred horſemen apeece. The Pretors had their lots for government as followeth: The civil juriſdiction over citizens fell to Q. Caſſius, and over ſtrangers to M. Juvencius Talva: Tib. Claudius Nero was L. deputy of Sicily, Cn. Fulvius of the hither Spain, and C. Licinius Nerva of the farther: laſt of all, A. Manlius Torquatus was appointed to the government of Sardinia; but into his province he could not go, by occaſion that he was detained at home by vertue of an act of the Senat, to make inquiſition into certain felonious and capital crimes. After this, conſultation there was in the Senat as touching the prodigies which were reported. The chappel of the Penates (protectors of the City) in Velia was ſmitten with thunder and lightning. Alſo in the Town Minervium two gates and a good part of the wall felt the like harm. At Anagnia it had rained earth, and in Lanuvium there appeared in the skie a burning flame. Moreover, M. Valerius a citizen of Rome gave knowledge, that in Calatia within the publick territory of that City, for the ſpace of three dayes and two nights together, blood guſhed out in his chimney hearth where he kept fire: and for this ſtrange ſight above all the reſt, the Decemvirs were commanded to have recourſe unto the books of Sibylla: who pro-

* This hath reſpect to ſome other act, which is not extant.

A proclaimed a publick ſupplication of the people for one day, and ſacrificed fifty goats in the common market place of the City. Alſo in regard of the other prodigies, a ſupplication was holden another day, and men did their devotions at every altar of the Gods; greater beaſts were killed for ſacrifices, and the City was ſolemnly cleanſed and purged. This done, as touching the honor of the immortal Gods, the Senat ordained, that foraſmuch as the two Kings Perſeus & Gentius their enemies were overcome, and now at the devotion of the people of Rome, together with Macedony and Illyricum, Q. Caſſius and M. Juventius the Pretors ſhould give order for as great oblations to be offred unto the Gods at every ſhrine and altar, as had been heretofore (when App. Claudius and M. Sempronius were Conſuls) for the defeat of King Antiochus. Then they ordained cer-
B tain delegats, by whoſe advice L. Paulus and L. Anicius the two Generals, might ſet all affairs in order, namely, ten into Macedony, and five into Illyricum. For Macedony were nominated A. Poſthumius Luſcus and C. Claudius, (who both had been Cenſors) C. Licinius Craſſus late companion to Paulus in the Conſulſhip, and who at that preſent had the government of Gaul continued him. To theſe delegats above-named, men of Conſular dignity all by their calling, were adjoined in commiſſion Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus, Ser. Cornelius Sylla, L. Junius, C. Antiſtius Labeo, T. Numiſius Tarquinienſis, and Aulus Terentius Varro. For Illyricum were theſe named, P. Ælius Ligur, one that had been Conſul, C. Cicereius and Cn. Babius Tamphilus (this Babius had been Pretor
C but the former year, and Cicereius many years paſt) P. Terentius Tuſcivicanus, and P. Manilius. Then the Conſuls being advertiſed by the LL. of the Senat, that (foraſmuch as one of them muſt ſucceed C. Licinius in Gaul, who was nominated one of the delegats) they ſhould part their Provinces between them either by accord and agreement, or by lot make choice of the fortune of lottery. So Piſa fell to M. Junius (but before he went into his province, he had in charge to bring into the Senat, thoſe embaſſies which from all parts were come to Rome for to declare their joy in the behalf of the people of Rome) and Gaul to Q. Ælius.

Albeit ſuch perſonages were ſent, as by whoſe ſage counſel good hope there was, that the chief commanders of the Roman armies would paſs no decree unbeſeeming either the clemency or Majeſty of the people of Rome, yet debated it was in the Senat about the ſum and principal points of all their counſels and deſigns; to the end that the ſaid Legats might cary unto the Generals all things plotted already and begun to their hands at home in the City. In the firſt place ordained it was, That the Macedonians and Illyrians remain free and enjoy their liberties, that all nations of D the earth might ſee, that the driſt of the Roman armies and forces was not to bring free ſtates into ſervitude, but contrarywiſe to reduce thoſe that were in bondage to liberty, to the end that thoſe nations which now enjoied freedom, might be ſecured under their ſafeguard and protection both of ſurety and of perpetuity, and ſuch as lived in ſubjection under the Kings, might both for the preſent time find their government more mild and righteous for that reſpect which the Kings have of the people of Rome; and alſo, if it fortuned hereafter, that there ſhould be war between the people of Rome and their Kings, they might be aſſured that the iſſue of thoſe wars would bring victory to the Romans, and procure liberty to themſelves. Alſo agreed it was that there ſhould be E no more farming out of the metal mines in Macedony, albeit they yeelded a great revenue; nor yet of publick lands and poſſeſſions in the countrey: for poſſible it was not that theſe matters ſhould be practiſed and followed without publicans; and where thoſe intermeddle & have ought to do, then it muſt needs follow, that either the publick right and prerogative of the State be annulled, or the liberty of allies come to nothing. Neither were the Macedonians themſelves able to exerciſe the ſame: for look where the miniſters and managers of any thing ſee a booty preſented before their eyes, there, occaſions of ſedition and contention will never be wanting. Moreover, concluded it was, that there ſhould be no common and general counſel of the whole nation, for F fear leſt at any time the lewd vulgar people having by the Senat liberty granted unto them tending unto a good and wholſome moderation and equality of the State ſhould abuſe the ſame and draw it to a miſchievous and peſtilent licentiouſneſs. But they thought it good policy to divide Macedony into four quarters and counties, that each one might have their ſeveral counſel? likewiſe it was ſuppoſed to ſtand with good reaſon and equity, that they ſhould pay the one moity of that tribute which they were wont to yeeld unto their KK. Semblable commiſſion and like directions they had for Illyricum. As for all other matters, referred they were to the diſcretion of the Generals and the Delegat commiſſioners, who might be better able to determine more certainly of particulars, according to the occurrents preſented unto them in the managing of their affairs.

Among many and ſundry Embaſſadors of Kings, nations, and ſtates, Attalus the brother of K. Eumenes moſt of all others amuſed mens minds, and drew their eyes upon him: for by them who had born arms together with him in that war, welcomed he was much more heartily, and receiG ved with greater courteſy than if Eumenes the K. himſelf had come. Two occaſions there were outwardly pretended, and thoſe carrying a good ſhew of honeſty and credit, which brought him to Rome: the one, a gratulation or teſtimony of joy (as meet it was) for that victory wherin himſelf lent his helping hand; the orher, a complaint of French tumultuous wars and the bloody hoſtility of Adverta their King, by which means his brothers Kingdom was in great jeopardy. But there lay another thing hidden underneath, namely, an inward and ſecret hope that he conceived of honors and rewards from the Senat, which hardly he could ſeem to aim & reach unto, without ſome unkindneſs and violence offered to brotherly duty and affection. For ſome there were even of the Romans alſo, who did him no good, but gave him bad counſel, drew on his appetite with fair hopes,

hopes, and ſet him a longing, feeding him with theſe and ſuch like conceits, That in Rome this H was the opinion entertained of Attalus and Eumenes, as if the one of them were a friend faſt and ſure to the Romans; the other an ally, ſound and faithful neither to the Romans nor yet to Per- ſeus: and therefore hard it were to ſet down and ſay, Whether of the twain would be more eaſily obtained at the Senats hands, namely, a ſuit made in his own name for his preferment, or a demand of ſome hard courſe againſt his brother: ſo bent were all men in general to grant any thing to At- talus, and to deny every thing to Eumenes. Attalus (as the ſequel and proof ſhewed) was pliant to thoſe perſons whoſe deſires reach at all that hope promiſeth, had not the ſage admonition of one friend come between to bridle his affections, raviſhed and tranſported ſo as they were with the amiable aſpect and fawning flattery of his own good fortune. He had about him at that time one Stratius a Phyſician, ſent by Eumenes (who reſted not ſecure of his brothers loyalty) to Rome, I of purpoſe for to lie in eſpial and obſerve all that Attalus did: and to adviſe him faithfully, if he ſaw him tread awry and practiſe ought againſt his duty and allegeance. When he came unto him, he found his ears already poſſeſſed, and his ſpirit tempted and ſollicited beforehand: howbeit taking his times and waiting opportunities, he went roundly to work and ſtuck to it cloſe until he had ſet all up again which was at the point to run on end and fall to the ground. He alledged and laid theſe remonſtrances before his eyes, ſaying, "That Kingdoms have grown mighty, ſome by one
"means, ſome by others: but as for theirs, being but newly erected, & grounded upon no ſtrength
"of ancient foundations, it ſtood upright only by the mutual concord of him and his brethren, in "that one of them beareth the name and title of King, wearing the diadem and crown alone upon "his head, but in effect all three brethren be KK. As for you Attalus (qd. he) who are the eldeſt K
"brother ſave one, who is it that reputeth you for leſs than a King, not only for that he ſeeth you
"ſo mighty at this preſent, but alſo the next heir apparant, and without all doubt like ſhortly to "reign indeed? conſidering the feeble body and craſy age of Eumenes, who hath beſides no iſſue of "children to ſucceed him in the roial throne? (for as yet he took no knowledg of him that reign"ed afterwards.) What need then is there to uſe violence, and to force that which of its one ac"cord will ſhortly be devolved upon you & fall into your hands? Moreover, a new tempeſt and
"ſtorm is riſen of French wars, threarning peril unto the realm, which it will be hard for you
"Princes to withſtand, agree as well as you can in all brotherly love, unity and concord. But if to "forrain war abroad, there ſhould ariſe a domeſtical and civil diſſention between you at home,
"what remedy then but utter ruin and deſtruction? Neither ſhall you (Attalus) purchaſe any good L
"but this, firſt to prevent that your brother be not King, and then to diſable and diſappoint your "ſelf of that neer and aſſured hope you have to be K. But ſay, that to preſerve a Kingdom for a "brother, and to wreſt a Kingdom from a brother, were honorable and glorious deeds both the "one and the other; yet ſurely, of the twain, to have ſaved a Kingdom deſerveth greater commen"dation and praiſe, in that it ſorteth ſo well with piety and kindneſs. And certainly, ſeeing the o"ther is a curſed and deteſtable part even next neighbor to parricide; what ſcruple and doubt re"maineth now which needeth any farther deliberation? For tell me, I beſeech you, is it one parcel "of the Kingdom that you reach at, or ſhoot you at the whole? If you aim at a part only, then "upon the diſmembring and diſtraction of your puiſſance, you ſhall be both twain much weak-
"ned and expoſed to the danger of all injuries: if you would have all, what ſhall become of your M "brother? Would you wiſh him being your elder, to live a privat perſon? or ſo far ſtept in years as "he is, a baniſhed man; and namely, with thoſe infirmities of body which he carrieth about him?
"or would you command to take his life away and rid him out of this world at once? Now truly "to ſay nothing of the unhappy and miſerable iſſue of ſuch graceleſs and wicked brethren delive"red unto us in fained fables, you ſee what a goodly fair end Perſeus is come unto, who being in "the Temple of Samothracia was conſtrained lying proſtrat upon the ground to proſtrate himſelf
"at the feet of the enemy his conqueror, the crown and diadem which he came unjuſtly by, even "with the unnatural murder of his own brother: as if the Gods in heaven had been there preſent,
"to require due puniſhment for his horrible fact. To conclude, they alſo themſelves, who in no "friendly love and affection to you, but in rancor and hatred to your brother Eumenes, have put N
"theſe deſigns into your head, and prick you on to execute the ſame; even they. I ſay, will praiſe
"your kindneſs, your piety and conſtancy, in caſe you perſever true and truſty to your brother, to "the very end. Theſe and ſuch like important perſwaſions prevailed with Attalus and ſetled deeply in his mind. Therefore being admitted into the Senat, after he had wiſhed joy unto them, and proteſted his own for the late victory, he laid abroad and declared his own demerits and good ſervice in that war, the favors alſo (ſuch as they were) done by his brother, and laſt of all, the revolt of the Gauls lately broken out with great troubles and commotions. His petition to the Senate was, for to ſend their Embaſſadors unto them, by whoſe countenance and authority they might be reclaimed, and ſo lay arms aſide. Having declared this meſſage which concerned the profit in general of the realm; he made a ſpecial ſuit for himſelf, and demanded to have Ænus and O
Maronea given unto him. And thus, when he had put them beſides their hope, who thought verily, that after he had accuſed his brother, he would have required the kingdom to be divided peecemeal & diſmembred, he departed out of the Councel houſe. Seldom had been known at any time before any man whatſoever, King or ſubject, to have had the like audience with ſo great favour and applauſe of all men, as he: received and entertained he was right honourably with gifts & pre-ſents of all ſorts whiles he was at Rome, and with the like they accompanied him at his departure.

Among

A Among many Embaſſies of Aſia and Greece, the Rhodian Embaſſadors were moſt marked and looked upon throughout all the City: for whereas at firſt they were all trim and goodly to be ſeen in their white and bright apparel, as decent it was for them that would ſeem to congratulate for the victory (for if they had worn black or been poorly arraied, it might have been conſtrued, that they mourned for the misfortune and calamity of Perſeus) after that M. Junius the Conſul brake with the LL. of the Senat (and all that while the ſaid Embaſſadors ſtood without in the common place Comitium) to conſider and adviſe, whether they would allow lodging, preſents, and give audience in the Senat unto them: they reſolved and were of opinion to obſerve no rights nor cuſtomes of hoſpitality with them. Then went the Conſul out of the Senat: unto whom when the Rhodians ſaid that they were come to rejoyce in their behalf for the late victory, and withal to B anſwer in the name of their City to certain crimes wherewith they were charged, requeſting that they might ſpeak before the Senat and be heard with indifference: the Conſul pronounced aloud unto them, That the cuſtome indeed of the Romans was, to entreat their allies and friends graciouſly, and among other matters of courteſy and hoſpitality which they afforded unto them, to grant them alſo a day of hearing in the Senat; but the Rhodians had not demeaned themſelves during the war, in ſuch ſort, as to be reckoned in the number of lovers and aſſociats. At the hearing of theſe words they caſt themſelves all proſtrat on the ground, beſeeching the Conſul and all thoſe that were preſent not to ſuffer that falſe imputations of late ſurmiſed ſhould againſt all reaſon prejudice the Rhodians more, than their good deſerts of old (whereof themſelves were ſufficient
C witneſſes) ſtand them in ſtead. And preſently after they had put on ſimple apparel and mourning weeds, they went about from houſe to houſe viſiting the principal perſons of the City, humbly beſeeching them with tears, to hear their cauſe before they were condemned. M. Juventius Talva the Pretor or L. chief juſtice for the pleas between citizens and ſtrangers, was the only agent that provoked and incited the people againſt the Rhodians: nay, he had promulged and publiſhed a bill to this effect, That war might be denounced againſt the Rhodians; alſo, that out of the Magiſtrats for that year they would make choice of ſome one to be ſent as Admiral with a fleet for the managing of that war: hoping that himſelf ſhould be the man. But this action and proceeding of his was croſſed by M. Antonius and M. Pomponius, two Tribuns of the commons. Over and beſides, the Pretor, to ſay a truth, had broached this matter after a new and ſtrange faſhion,
D and to the evil example of future times, in that he preferred a bill unto the people of his own head alone, without asking the advice of the Senat, or making the Conſuls acquainted therewith: and that in this manner and form, Pleaſeth it you, and is it your will, that war be proclaimed againſt the Rhodians? whereas alwaies before-time, in queſtion of war, the Senats advice was firſt taken, and then the thing was propoſed unto the people. Likewiſe the Tribuns o the commons for their part, did more than they might, and a thing not warrantable by any precedent. For it was a cuſtom and tradition obſerved ever of old, that no perſon ſhould interpoſe his negative to croſs any bill, before that privat men in particular had their courſe and turn granted, both to perſwade or diſſwade the ſame: by which means many a time it fell out, that even they who never proteſted nor meant to oppoſe themſelves, being moved and induced by the reaſons of thoſe that ſtood up to diſſwade, and perceiving alſo by them the inconveniences of ſuch a bill, would ſtep between and E daſh all: yea, and contrarywiſe ſuch as came of purpoſe to croſs and nip the ſame being convinced by the authority and born down by the important arguments alledged by thoſe that enforced the ſaid bill, would deſiſt and ſurceaſe. Thus the Pretors and Tribuns ſtrove much who ſhould do every thing more unſeaſonably than others. The Tribuns impeached and ſtaid the haſtines of the Pretor, interpoſing their negative before the time, and deferring the matter untill the coming of the L. General. * * * * * * "Whether we have "tranſgreſſed and offended yea, or no, that yet remaineth doubtful: but ſure we are of this, that "we ſuffer all puniſhments and ſhameful ignominies already that can be deviſed. Heretofore, "when the Carthaginians were vanquiſhed, when Philip when Antiochus was overthrown we "came to Rome: from our publick lodging provided for us at the charges of the City we pre-F "ted our ſelves (my LL.) into your Councel houſe, to teſtify our great contentment for your con-
"queſts: from the Councel-houſe we went directly to the capitol, carrying with us preſents and "oblations to the honor of your gods. But now we the ſame Rhodians are come unto your Senat "clothed in this poor habit and array as you ſee, from out of a baſe hoſtelry and common inne,
"where hardly we could have lodging for our money; being commanded in manner of enemies
"to make our abode without the City walls: we Rhodians (I ſay) whom but lately ye feoffed
"with the grant of two Provinces Lycia and Caria, and whom ye graced with all kind of honors,
"and enriched with all manner of gifts and rewards. You ordain as we hear ſay, that the Macedo-
"nians and Illyrians ſhould live free, notwithſtanding they were in ſervitude before they levied
"war againſt you. Neither ſpeak we this in envy & repine for any mans welfare and good eſtate; G "nay we acknowledg therein the rare clemency of the people of Rome:) and will ye then make
"the Rhodians of friends, enemies, who during this war did no more but ſit and meddle with nei"ther part? Now ſurely ye Romans are the men that pretend and give out ordinarily, that your "wars have good ſucceſs and ſpeed well, becauſe they be juſt and righteous: neither do you glory
"ſo much in the event and iſſue thereof, whereby ye are revengers and conquerors, as for the be"ginning and firſt enterpriſes, in that ye undertake them not without good cauſe. The beſieging
"of Meſſana in Sicily by the Carthaginians, was the cauſe that the people of Rome reputed them

"enemies. The aſſailing of Athens by Philip, his intent and purpoſe to bring Greece into ſervitude, H
"his relieving of Annibal with men and money, cauſed him likewiſe to be holden for their ene"my. Thus Antiochus brought upon his own head the Roman war, for that he being ſollicited
"by the Ætolians your enemies came willingly out of Aſia, and with a fleet ſailed over to Greece:
"and when he had ſeized upon Demetrias, Chalcis, and the ſtreights of Thermopyla, went about
"to diſpoſſeſs you of the empire. And laſt of all, Perſeus by levying arms againſt your allies, by "killing ſome of their petty kings and princes, by murdering other chief perſons of ſundry nati"ons and cities, gave you juſt occaſion to make war upon him. But what colourable cauſe can
"there be pretended of our calamity, if needs we muſt miſcarry and periſh? All this while I "make no difference between our cities caſe and that of Polyaratus and Dion our citizens, even "thoſe perſons whom we have brought to deliver into your hand. For ſuppoſe that the cauſe I "were all one, and that we Rhodians were all faulty and culpable alike, what might that crime be "for which we are touched in this war? We favoured Perſeus and that ſide (you will ſay) and "like as in the war of Antiochus and Philip, we ſtood with you againſt thoſe kings, ſo now we "took part with the K. againſt you. Was that all? well, In what ſort we are wont to aid our aſſo-
"ciats, and how luſtily to enterpriſe wars, do but ask of C. Livius and L. Æmylius Regillus, the "Admirals of your fleets in Aſia. Your ſhips never fought at ſea without us; yet we with our Ar-
"mado alone fought a battail once before Samos, and a ſecond time in Pamphylia againſt General
"Annibal: which victory there atchieved was unto us by ſo much more honorable and glorious,
"for that after we had in an unfortunat fight neer Samos loſt many of our ſhips & the very choiſe
"and flour of our youth, we nothing terrified and diſmaied with ſo great an overthrow, durſt turn K
"again to make head, yea, and were ſo hardy as to encounter the Kings roial navy coming out of "Syria. And all this have I related not by way of boaſt & to glorify our ſelves (for we are not now "in caſe to ſtand upon thoſe terms) but to give you a taſt by the way and put you in mind, in what
"maner the Rhodians have uſed evermore to ſuccour their confederats. And for the better proof
"therof, after the defeat, of Philip and Antiochus we received at your hands right great rewards
"& recompence for our ſervice. In caſe the fortune of Perſeus had been ſo happy as yours is at this
"preſent (praiſed be the Gods for their grace and goodnes & thanked be your own valour withal)
"and we had come into Macedony to the King upon his victory to require & demand rewards,
"what could we alledge therfore? Might we ſay that he had bin maintained by our mony, or relie"ved with our corn? with land forces, or ſtrength at ſea? Was there any place by us kept and held L
"with a garriſon for his uſe? were we able to tell where we fought, either under the conduct of his
"Captains or upon our own leading and direction? If haply he ſhould demand in what quarters
"our ſouldiers kept? in what coaſt our ſhips lay in guard for his defence, what could we anſwer?
"Peradventure we might plead our cauſe & excuſe our ſelves in the preſence of him, ſuppoſed con"queror, like as we now do before you here in place. For by ſending our Embaſſadors to and fro
"unto you as well as to him about a treaty of peace, this is all the good we have got, that in ſtead
"of winning the love & favor of both parts, we incur the heavy diſpleaſure of the one; being thus "charged with crimes and wrapped in dangers. And yet my good LL. and honorable Senators of "Rome, Perſeus might truly object that to us, which you in no wiſe can, namely, that we in the be"ginning of the war ſent Embaſſadours to you making promiſe in our name of whatſoever was M
"needful thereunto: alſo that we would be ready at all aſſaies to furniſh you with ſhips ſtrongly
"rigged and with our youth well appointed, like as in the wars afortime. That we performed not
"theſe promiſes of ours, you only were the let and hindrance, who (whatſoever the cauſe was) "refuſed our offred ſervice & rejected al our ſuccours. Wel then, neither have we attempted ought "as enemenies, nor failed in the duty of good friends and allies: but impeached have we been by "you for effecting that which we intended. How now? may ſome man ſay: Hath there been no"thing done or ſaid in your City (O ye Rhodians) that you wiſh unſaid or undone, & whereat
"the people of Rome may juſtly take exceptions and be offended with you for it? Undertake to
"juſtify and make good whatſoever hath been done, I will not, neither have I ſo little wit I trow;
"but ſever I will the publick cauſe of the whole ſtate, from the privat offences committed by par- N
"ticular perſons: for no City is there under the ſun, but may otherwhiles have lewd and naughty "citizens ſome or other, and evermore a rude and ſottiſh multitude. I have heard ſay, that even
"amongſt you here at Rome, ſome have ſought to advance and ſet themſelves aloft by currying fa"vor and flattering the common people; and that the time was, when the commons roſe and de"parted from among you, ſo as the rule of the common-weal and people of Rome was out of your "hands, as in a very Anarchy. If ſuch a thing as this might chance in this your City (ſo well quali"fied & ordered as it is) how can any man make a wonder, that among us there have been ſome,
"who (affecting and ſeeking for the amity and friendſhip of the K.) might haply corrupt and ſe-
"duce our commons with their naughty counſel? And yet when all is ſaid, they prevailed no more "than thus, that we ſat ſtill and failed in doing our devoir to you: for I will not over-paſs in this O
"place the greateſt and moſt grievous crime of all other wherewith our City is charged during "this war, and that is this. At one and the ſame time we ſent Embaſſ. both to you and Perſeus a"bout a peace. This deſignment ſo untoward and unlucky as it was, a furious and brainſick orator "and agent of ours (as afterwards we underſtood) handled as fooliſhly: who (as it is for certain "known) framed his language in that maner, as if he had been C. Popilius the Roman Embaſſador, "whom ye ſent to the two KK. Antiochus and Ptolomæus, to warn them both to lay down arms &

"surceaſe

A " ſurceaſe war. But that behaviour of his, (cal it what you wil, either pride or folly) was no worſe
" before you than it was to K. Perſeus. Every City hath their conditions and qualities by them-
" ſelves, like as particular and ſeveral perſons: and ſemblably it is in whole nations; ſome are teſty
" and cholerick, bold and audacious; others again be fearful and timerous: ſome are given to wine
" and drunkenneſs, others to women and wantonneſs. The people of Athens (by report) are too
" haſty, hot, and forward to enterpriſe any thing even beyond their power. The Lacedæmonians
" again, be as ſlow and backward, caſting many doubts & difficulties to enter upon the very things " which they are aſſured of. I cannot deny, but that all the country of Aſia in general breedeth
" many a mad brain and vain ſpirit: and I will not ſay, but that our people are jolly fellows of their " tongue and can ſpeak big, for that we ſeem (among other cities and ſtates bordering upon us)
B " to excel and ſurpaſs; and that no ſo much in the confidence we have of our own forces, as for the " honorable regard ye have had of us, and the great teſtimonies and judgments ye have given out
" of us. But that fooliſh embaſſage of ours even then at the very time had puniſhment ſufficient,
" being ſent away (as it was) with ſo heavy an anſwer of yours: and if we were not then diſgraced
" and ſhamed enough, now ſurely this preſent embaſſage ſo humble and pitiful were able to make " full ſatisfaction for a more inſolent embaſſy than it was. All pride (and arrogancy of words eſpe-" cially) cholerick perſons indeed hate, wiſe men deride, and namely, from an inferior to his bet" ter; but no man ever judged it a mortal ſin and worthy of death: mary, here was all the danger,
" leſt haply the Rhodians might ſeem therby to deſpiſe the Romans. How then? be there not ſome
" alſo that cannot rule their tongue, but will be raiſing & uttering blaſphemous words againſt the C " Gods; yet we never heard of any that have been therefore ſmitten dead with a thunderbolt.
" What remaineth then for us wherein we ſhould purge and cleer our ſelves, if we neither can be " charged in fact with hoſtility; and if our Embaſſ. hath uſed ſome proud and preſumptuous words
" more than became him, which deſerve not the total ruin of our City, but ſome ſharp checks and " hard rebukes on both ſides of our ears? But I hear (my good LL.) that in your ordinary talk a" mong your ſelves when ye are together, we are cenſured for our inward affection only & ſecret
" thoughts, and condemned no leſs than for ſome deed, namely, That in heart we favoured the K.
" and wiſhed him rather than you to obtain the victory; and therfore they deem us worthy to be " perſecuted with fire and ſword. Some there be again of you, who think verily that thus indeed
" we ſtood affected, howbeit they would not have us for it to be warred upon as enemies; for that D " it ſtandeth not with the cuſtom or law of any City in the world, That if a man wiſh a miſchief " to his enemy, he ſhould be ſtraightwaies condemned therfore to die, ſo long as he hath not en-
" tred into any action tending thereto. And verily theſe men we have to thank, who free & quit " us yet from puniſhment, although they cleer us not of guilt: howbeit this ſentence we paſs a-" gainſt our own ſelves, That if it can be proved, that we were all of us ſo minded and diſpoſed in " affection as we are burdened, (for content we are that all go under one, heart and hand will and " deed, without diſtinction) then let us all be puniſhed for it and feel the ſmart. But if of the great " men and chief among us, ſome affected you & others the King; we require not, that for the love
" of us who ſided with you, the Kings ſuppoſts ſhould fare the better and eſcape cleer: but we re-" queſt and beſeech rather, that for their ſakes we periſh not and be quit undone. And certainly, E " your own ſelves are not worſe affected and more ſet againſt them than our very City is: which " they knowing well enough, moſt of them either fled away, or elſe killed themſelves: others of " them (ſuch as we have condemned and paſſed judgement againſt) ſhall be at your pleaſure (my " LL.) to do with them what you will. All the reſt of us Rhodians, as thanks we have merited none " in this war, ſo we have deſerved as little puniſhment. Lay the over-deal and ſurpluſage of our " former good deeds and demerits to this want of duty now, and let the heap of the one make up
" the ſcant meaſure of the other. With three Kings of late years ye have maintained war; let not " our ſlackneſs and ſitting ſtill in this one, endammage and hurt us more, than our devoir and em" ploiment in the other twain may ſeem to ſatisfy and countervail. Set Philip, Antiochus and Per-
" ſeus, for three verdicts and ſentences as it were paſſed upon us: two of them acquit us cleer; the F " third is doubtful whether it wil go againſt us or no. Indeed if they themſelves were to ſit upon " us, we ſhould no doubt be caſt and condemned: but you (my good LL.) that are our competent
" judges, determin now at once, Whether there ſhall be a City of Rhodes remaining upon the face " of the earth, or be raſed utterly & deſtroyed from the very foundation for ever: for you are not " to debate in councel about making war upon us: which wel you may begin and go in hand with
" at your pleaſure; but follow and manage you never ſhal, becauſe there is not a Rhodian that wil " take armis and come into the field againſt you. Will you not be pacified but perſiſt ſtil in your
" choler and anger? then will we crave at your hands ſome reſpit of time, whiles we may go home " and report there how we have ſped in this lamentable embaſſage of ours. And then, all of us in
" Rhodes frank-born and of free condition every one, I ſay, man and woman with all our wealth G " and ſubſtance will embark our ſelves: forſake we will our privat houſes and publick edifices: and
" to Rome ſtraight will we all come: and when we have laid on heaps here in your common hall,
" and at the porch and enteir of your councel-houſe, whatſoever gold and ſilver we have either
" in privat purſe or common chiſt: commit we will to your devotion and mercy our own perſons,
" together with the bodies of our wives and children; and never wil we go further but even here
" in this place will we ſuffer and abide that which we have to undergo and endure. Let our City
" then be ſacked, rifled and burned, ſo it be far enough out of our eye that we ſee it not. The Ro"mans may (if it please them) judge the Rhodians enemies; yet you will give us leave to pass in H

"some sort a doom of our own, That we in our consciences never condemned our selves for such,
"nor ever will enter in any hostile action against you, come what will, even the utmost extremity
"that can be suffered. After their oration in this manner uttered, they fell down again all prostrat, and as humble suppliant estsoons put forth and shook their branches of the olive, until at length they were raised up on their feet, and so departed out of the Senat. Then began the LL. within, to give their opinions and pass their sentences of them. The heaviest enemies and most maliciously bent against the Rhodians, were those, who had conducted the war of Macedony, as Consuls, Pretors, or Lieutenants: but M. Porcius Cato was their only patron that stood to them and supported their cause right earnestly; a man otherwise by nature sowre and severe, but as then he shewed himself a mild and gracious Senator. I will not insert here the lively portraiture and resemblance of I that copious and eloquent person, by relating the flowing speech which he then delivered: his very oration is extant in writing, and contained in the fifth book of his Origenes. In fine, the Rhodians received such an answer, as they neither were concluded enemies, not yet remained in the nature and quality of friends. The principal persons of this their embassage, were Philocrates and Asty-medes. Ordered it was & agreed between them, That Philocrates (with some of his fellows) should report this answer at Rhodes; and that Astymedes (with the rest) should stay behind at Rome, to to know what was practised and done there, and give intelligence thereof accordingly to their citizens at home. For that present the LL. of the Senat gave them in charge, to remove their Captains and Governours by a certain day out of Lycia and Caria. These news related at Rhodes, importing matter (in it self considered) of grief & heaviness, turned into joy, in regard that they were K eased from the fear of a greater mischief, for they doubted sore that they should have had hot war.
And therfore presently they ordained for the Romans a crown amounting to the value of 20000 pieces of gold, and with this present they sent Theodotus the Admiral of their navy in embassage.
A will and desire they had to make suit unto the Romans for association: but so, as no act and ordinance of the people should be entred therof, nor any instrument engrossed as touching it. And this they did, to avoid the greater shame and ignominy of repulse, if haply they missed of their purpose, and could not obtain. The Admiral alone had this priviledg, and was permitted to treat of that matter, without any bill at all either published or enacted by the people. For in so many years before they had continued in amity with the Romans in such sort, as they never linked and tied themselves unto them by any formal deed and covenant upon record, and that for no other reason in the world, but because they would neither cut the wings off from all hope of their aid, L if haply any of them might stand in such need, nor disable themselves of the possibility they had to reap some fruit & receive good of their bounty and prosperity. But surely at this time (me thinks) they ought to have sought sadly and in good earnest for their society, not so much for safety and security against others (for none they feared at all but only the Romans) as to be rid of the suspi-tion and jealousy which the Romans had of them. About the same time the Caunians also revolted from them, and they of Mylassa took certain Towns of the Euromestians. Now were the hearts of these Rhodians within the City not so much broken or abated, but they saw well enough that if the Romans took from them Lycia and Caria all the rest would either by way of revolt put themselves in liberty and shake off the yoke of their subjection, or else be surprised and seized by the neighbour nations bordering upon them: and that then they should be pent up and M shut within the compass of a small Isle and the strands of a barren soil, not able to nourish and maintain the inhabitants of so great and populous a City. Therefore with all speed they dispatched and sent forth their youth, and not only forced the Caunians (notwithstanding they had joined unto them the aid of the Cybirats) to their obeisance, but also in battel neer Orthosia overcome, the Mylasteans and Alabandians; who having dissieized the Euronensians of their province, advanced jointly with their united armies against them.

Whiles these affairs thus passed there, whiles some occurrents fell out in Macedony, and others likewise at Rome, L. Anicius having subdued King Gentius (as is before said) and brought him under his own hand, placed a garrison in Scodra the Kings roial seat, and appointed Gabinius the Cap- N tain thereof: but in Rhizon and Olcinia two commodious cities of good importance he ordained
C. Licinius the Governor. Having thus made over the rule of Illyricum unto these twain, himself with the rest of the army went into Epirus. Where the Town Phanota was the first that yeelded unto him and the whole multitude of the people came forth to meet him with their intules in token of submission. After he had put a garrison in this place also, he passed over into the countrey of Molossis, where he received the surrender of all the Towns thereof, excepting Passaron Tegmon, Phylacum, and Horreum. And then he led his army first against Passaron. The principal men and rulers of that City were Antinous and Theodotus, men of mark and name, as well for the favor they bare to Perseus, as the hatred they caried to the Romans: the only persons who had counselled and perswaded the whole nation to revolt from the Romans. These two having guilty consciences within them for their privat trespass, and being past all hope of finding any grace and pardon, shut O the gates of the City, to the end that they might perish with the overthrow of all, and be overwhelmed with the total ruin of their own country: and therewith they exhorted the multitude to prefer present death before servitude and slavery. No man durst once open his mouth to contradict these so great and mighty persons. At length a certain noble yong Gentleman, named also Theodotus, with whom the greater dread from the Romans abroad prevailed more, and overcame

A the leſs fear of the rulers at home. "What ail ye my maſters (qd. he) and fellow citizens, what rage "and madneſs haunteth you, to enwrap and intereſs the whole City in the fault and folly of theſe "two perſons? Certainly, I have often heard of men that for their countrey have willingly loſt "their lives, but to think it meet, that their countrey ſhould periſh for them, theſe are the firſt "that ever were known. Why rather open we not our gates and ſubmit our ſelves to that empire, "into which the whole world beſides is ſubject. As he ſpake theſe words, the multitude followed him toward the gates: which when Antinous & Theodotus ſaw, they made no more ado, but brake upon the firſt corps de guard of the enemies which they came unto, and expoſing their bodies to the ſwords point, were ſoon killed, and the Town was yeelded into the hands of the Romans. Tegmon alſo, upon the like wilfull obſtinacy of Prince Cephalo, had ſhut their gates, but after that he was
B ſlain, the Town was taken by ſurrender. And neither Phylace nor Horreum would abide the aſſault. Having thus quieted Epirus, and beſtowed his forces by garriſons in diverſe commodious Towns for the winter time, he returned into Illyricum: where he held a general aſſembly at Scodra, to which he had ſummoned the principal States of the whole nation, and whither alſo there were arrived five delegates from Rome. And there in this frequent and ſolemn ſeſſion he pronounced from the Tribunal ſeat, by the advice of the counſel aſſiſtant unto him, That the Senate and people of Rome ordained the Illyrians to live free and enjoy liberty, and that himſelf would withdraw the garriſons out of their Towns, Fortreſſes and Caſtles. As for the Iſſeans, Taulantians, Tiruſtians in the Daſſaretians countrey, Rhizonits and Olcianats (for that whiles Gentius his fortune ſtood up-
C right, they had ranged with the Romans) he declared them not only free, but alſo exempt and privileged from all tributs. The Doarſians alſo, for leaving Caravantius, and paſſing with their armies to ſide with the Romans, he endowed with the like immunity. They of Scodra, Daſſara, and Selepita, with the reſt of the Illyrians, were to pay the one moity of the tribute which they had yeelded to the King. After this he divided Illyricum into three cantons: the one of them he made of thoſe before named: the ſecond, all the Labeats: and the third, of the Agravonits Rhezonits, Olciniats, and thoſe that bound and border upon them. Having ſet down this order in Illyricum, he returned to Paſſaro a City in Epirus, there to lie for the winter time.

Whiles theſe things hapned in Illyricum, Paulus before the coming of the ten Legats, ſent Q. Maximus his ſon (who was now lately returned from Rome) to the ſaccage of Æginium and Agaſſa. The quarrel againſt Agaſſa was, for that they having delivered the Town one to Martius
D the Conſul, and therwith of their own accord craved the alliance of the people of Rome, revolted notwithſtanding afterwards to Perſeus. As for the Æginians, they had committed a late and freſh treſpas: for giving no credit to the fame that was voiced of the Romans victory; they cruelly handled certain Roman ſouldiers, who were entred into their City. Moreover, he ſent L. Poſthumius likewiſe to ranſack in hoſtile manner the City of the Ænians, for that they had perſiſted in arms more ſtifly than the other neighbour Cities. Now was it about that ſeaſon of the year which men call Autumn: in the beginning whereof, ſo ſoon as he had determined to ride a circuit and viſit all Greece round, and to ſee thoſe places whereof there went ſo great a name, and which were more renowned by hear-ſay than known by ſight of eye: he left C. Sulpitius Gallus for the command and guard of the camp, & ſet forward in his progreſs, accompanied with no great train. And being guar-
E ded of the one hand with his own ſon Scipio, and on the other, with Athenæus the brother of King Eumenes, he paſſed through Theſſaly, toward the famous Oracle at Delphos. Where, after he had ſacrificed to Apollo, he deſtined and appointed thoſe Columns & Pillars (which were begun in the porch of that Temple, and whereupon the ſtatutes of King Perſeus ſhould have been erected) for to ſuſtain and bear the ſtatues of himſelf with the title Victorious. He viſited alſo the temples of Jupiter Trophon in Lebadia: where, after he had ſeen the mouth of that peakiſh cave into which they uſe to deſcend that would have the benefit of the Oracle, and know the will of the Gods: after ſacrifice alſo done to Jupiter and Hercinna, whoſe temple there is to be ſeen he went down to Chalcis, to behold the frith of Euripus, and that Iſland which in times paſt was united & joined to the firm
F continent by a bridg. From Chalcis he croſſed over to Aulis three miles diſtant from thence, a port enobled for the rode ſome time there of Agamemnons fleet, conſiſting of a thouſand ſail. Being there, he went to the Temple of Diana, where that King of Kings (Agamemnon) offered his own * daughter in ſacrifice upon her altar, to have a proſperous voiage for his fleet intending to ſail to Troy. After this, he came to Oropus, a Town in Attica, where Amphilochus the Prophet is worſhipped as a God. There, was to be ſeen an ancient Temple, moſt pleaſant to behold for the goodly Fountains and Rivers round about it. Then went he forward to Athens, a City likewiſe for antiquity of fame much ſpoken of, and highly renowned time out of mind: wherein were many monuments alſo worth the ſeeing: namely, the citadel, the havens, the walls that reach from the City to Pyræum, the arſenals made by great Captains and Commanders, the images of the Gods and of men likewiſe, for rare & excellent, as well for the artificial workmanſhip, as the matter wherof they G were made. When he had ſacrificed within the City to Minerva the goddeſs and patroneſs of the ſaid citadel, he kept on his journey, and the next day following arrived at Corinth. A fair & beautifull City this was in thoſe daies, before it was deſtroied, the fortreſs there and the Iſthmus were things of eſpecial mark and worth the ſight: for the ſaid fortreſs notwithſtanding it be mounted up to an exceeding height above all, yet is it full of fountains; and the Iſthmus by a narrow ridge of land divideth two ſeas neer together, the one lying Eaſt, and the other Weſt. From thence he went to Sicyon and Argos, two noble Cities, and ſo forward to Epidaurus, nothing in wealth comparable to the reſt, yet of great name for the famous temple of Æſculapius, which ſtandeth 5 miles H from the City, where at this day are to be ſeen the marks and tokens of the empty places from whence the oblations have been plucked away: but then a rich place it was and full of thoſe of-frings and gifts, which diſeaſed perſons had conſecrated to that God in recompence and reward for thoſe ſoveraign ſalves and wholeſom remedies which they there found. From thence he came to Lacedæmon, a City memorable not for any magnificence of ſtately works and buildings, but for good diſcipline and orders there obſerved. From whence paſſing through Megalopolis, he aſcended up to Olympia: where among other things there to be ſeen, he beheld Jupiter as it were repreſented even before his eies, whereat he was much moved in ſpirit. And therfore as if he had been to ſacrifice in the capitol, he commanded a ſacrifice to be prepared with more ſtate and magnificence than ordinary. Thus having viſited all Greece over without any ſearch and enquiry made, I how men either in general or particular ſtood affected in the war againſt Perſeus, (becauſe he would not trouble and diſquiet the minds of the allies with any fearful occurrent) as he returned toward Demetrias, he was encountred by the way with a number of Ætolians all clad in doleful & mourning array. And when he wondred and asked what the matter might be, he was given to underſtand that 550 of their principal men of name, were by Lyciſcus and Tiſippus maſſacred, who with the help of certain Roman ſouldiers ſent from Babius the Governor, had beſet their Senat:

that the reſt were driven into exile; and the goods as well of thoſe who were murdered, as alſo of the baniſhed perſons were now poſſeſſed by their accuſers. He commanded them to attend upon him at Amphipolis, and when himſelf had communed & conferred at Demetrias with Cn. Octavius, after he once heard that the ten legats had paſſed the ſeas, he laid aſide all other affairs, and went K directly to Apollonia there to meet with them. To which place when Perſeus came to meet him, for he having over-large liberty of poiſon, was come from Amphipolis & that was a daies journey off; unto the K. he ſhewed good countenance and gave him good and gracious words, but after he was returned to the camp at Amphipolis, he ſharply checked and rebuked, as men ſay, C. Sulpitius, firſt for ſuffering Perſeus to range ſo looſly and ſo far off from him, all over the province: ſecond-ly, for giving his ſouldiers ſo much liberty as to pluck the titles from off the walls [and houſes] of the City to cover the places of their winter harbour: and therewith he commanded that the tiles ſhould be carried thither again where they had them, and the houſes to be repaired as ſufficiently as before. As for Perſeus and his elder ſon Philip, he delivered unto A. Poſthumius to be kept in ſafe cuſtody: but his daughter and yonger ſon, he ſent for to Amphipolis from Samothrace, and uſed L them with all courteſy and kind intertainment as poſſibly he could. When the day was come, on which he appointed that ten principal burgeſſes out of every City ſhould repair to Amphipolis & that all the Kings letters and writings in what place ſoever to be found, ſhould be ſought up & repreſented there together with all his mony; he ſat him down upon the tribunal ſeat, together with the ten legats from Rome, and the whole multitude of the Macedonians were gathered round about him. Albeit they had been uſed to ſubjection under the King, yet this new Tribunal carried with it a form and ſhew of a terrible government, namely, when they ſaw the tipſtaves & huiſhers to keep the doors and places of entry, the publick crier and the ſergeant: ſtrange matters all unto their eies and ears & whereto they had not been accuſtomed, able to ſtrike a terror to allies much more then, to conquered enemies. After ſilence made by the crier, Paulus pronounced in the Latine M tongue what the Senats pleaſure was to be done, and what himſelf with the advice of his Councel affiſtant about him had thought upon and ſet down: all which points Cn. Octavius the Pretor (for he alſo was in place) interpreted and related again in the Greek language. Imprimis, they ordained the Lacedæmonians to be free, to have and enjoy the ſame Cities and territories, to uſe and exerciſe their own Laws to create yearly Magiſtrats, and to pay half of that tribute to the people of Rome, which they uſed to pay unto their Kings. Item, to divide Macedony into 4 quarters; The one, and that the principal, for to contain all the country between the 2 rivers Strymon and Neſſus; to which part there ſhould be laid the tract on the farther ſide of the river Neſſus Eaſtward (where Perſeus held Towns, Caſtles and Cities) excepting Ænus, Maronea, and Abdera: alſo beyond Stry- mon Weſtward all the Biſaltique territory, together with Heraclea, which they call Syntice. For the N ſecond, all thoſe parts which on the Eaſt-ſide the river Strymon encloſeth, except Syntice, Heraclea, & the Biſaltes: alſo on the Weſt, whatſoever is bounded with the river Axius, together with the Pæonians lying to it, who inhabit upon the river Axius Eaſtward. The third quarter was that, which Axius from the eaſt and Peneus the river from the weſt do compaſs; and to the north-ſide is limited with the mountain Bora, and to this portion was adjoined the tract of Paonia, which coaſteth along the river Axius toward the weſt: Edeſſa alſo and Berrhæa were annexed therto. The fourth was beyond the mountain Bora, confining on the one ſide upon Illyricum, & on the other upon Epirus. The head cities of every quarter where they ſhould hold their ſeſſions and councels he appointed theſe: For the firſt, Amphipolis; Theſſalonica for the ſecond; In the third Pella; & Pela- gonia in the fourth. To theſe places he ordained that by ſummons they ſhould repair, and hold the O aſſemblies of each quarter; thither the mony to be brought; and there the magiſtrats to be created.
Item, he declared and pronounced that it ſhould not be lawful for any perſon to contract mariage, neither to have commerce & traffick together in buying or ſelling of lands or tenements without the limits of their own diviſion. Item, that in their mines they ſhould no more dig for ſilver and gold: but for Iron and braſs they had permiſſion. And thoſe that had the profit therof, were to pay the one half of the old rent, which they were wont to yeeld and grant unto the King. Item, he for-bad

A bad them to uſe any more forrain ſalt brought from out of other parts. When the Dardanians put in their claim for Paonia, for that it had ſometime been their appurtenance, and alſo confined upon their country; he pronounced freedom to all thoſe who had been ſubjects to K. Perſeus. But afterwards, when they could not obtain Paonia, he granted unto them the commodity of the traffick for ſalt; and he charged the inhabitants of the ſaid country to cary it to Stobi in Paonia, and he ſet them down a certain price. Item, he debarred them from felling any ſhip-timber themſelves, and from ſuffering any others. Unto thoſe countries which bordered upon the Barbarians (and except the third quarter all the reſt confined upon them) he granted that they might keep armed garriſons upon their frontiers and marches. Theſe Acts and ordinances thus publiſhed the firſt day of the ſeſſion, wrought diverſly in the minds of men. Freedom granted beyond their expectation, and
B the eaſment in the yearly tribute, comforted their ſpirits and made them look up. But by the interruption of the commerce & traffick one region with another, they ſeemed like creatures diſmembred and plucked aſunder joint-meal, ſo as having need one of another, yet they had no mutual & reciprocal uſe and intercourſe. In ſo much as the Macedonians themſelves knew full little how big and large Macedony was, and how commodiouſly it was divided, ſo as each part was ſufficient in it ſelf without the help of others. The firſt region containeth the Biſaltæ who inhabit beyond the river Neſſus and about Strymon, the moſt valiant men of all the reſt: beſides, it hath many proper commodities by it ſelf as well fruits of the earth as mines of metals, together with the opportunity and commodious ſituation of Amphipolis, which as a frontier-bar ſtoppeth all avenues on the eaſt ſide into Macedony. The ſecond quarter hath in it two moſt famous and frequented cities, Theſſa-
C lonica and Caſſandria: & Pallene, a fertile & fruitful land. Beſides, the maritime commodities which the havens at Torone and the head of Athos (and it they call the port or rode of Æneas) do yeeld; to ſay nothing of other bayes lying handſomely, ſome toward the Iland Eubœa, others toward Helleſpont. The third conntrey containeth the famous cities Edeſſa, Berrhœa and Pella; the warlike nation of the Veteii, and many Gauls and Illyrians beſides who there inhabit, notable men all of action & execution. The fourth region is peopled with the Eordians, Linceſtians and Pelagonians: unto whom, the provinces Atintania, Stymphalis, and Elimiotis are adjoyned. All this quarter is cold, rough and hard to dwell in. The nature of the inhabitants is likewiſe ſutable to the ſoil: & the fiercer they are by reaſon of the barbarous nations their neighbours, who one whole find them occupied with war, and othetwhiles mingle their rites and faſhions with theirs in time of peace.
D When Macedony was thus divided and each part diſtinguiſhed by their ſeveral uſes & commodities, he appointed a general review to be made and enrolment of all the Macedonians; having declared unto them before, that he purpoſed to give laws unto them.

This done, the Ætolians were cited and called next; and in the whole courſe of the commiſſion as touching them and their affairs, more inquiſition there was, who favoured the Romans, and who affected the King, than of any that either had done or ſuffered wrong. The murderers were found unguilty and abſolved and the baniſhment of the exiled was as much avowed, as their death juſtified who were maſſacred: A. Babius only was convicted and condemned, for that he had ſent Roman ſouldiers to execute the ſaid butchery. This iſſue of the Ætolians cauſe, puffed up the ſpirits of all thoſe who had ſided with the Romans, throughout all the nations and cities of Greece,
E in ſuch ſort as they grew to a pride intolerable: but contrarywiſe put down & abaſed under their feet, as many as were ſuſpected any waies to have caſt a favor and born good will to the King. The principal ſtates-men of their cities were of three ſorts; two of them were skillful in the art of footh-ing, & either by ſubmitting and ſubjecting under the Roman Empire, or winding within the favor and friendſhip of the KK. grew infinitly rich and mighty themſelves in privat, with the publick oppreſſion and undoing of their countrey: the third between, ſung a mean, and was croſs to the other; men that ſtood for the defence of their liberties and maintenance of laws, who as they were more dearly beloved of their neighbours at home, ſo they were leſs gracious and of credit with ſtrangers abroad. The favorits and ſuppoſts only of the Romans, were advanced by their proſperity; they alone ſat in place of government, they were employed in all embaſſages, and none but they.
F These being there preſent in great number coming out of Peloponneſus, Bœotia, and from other frequent aſſemblies of Greece, filled the heads of the ten delegats and high commiſſioners: buzzing into their ears, that not they alone who openly were ſeen in their bravery and vanity of ſpirit, vanting themſelves for the hoſts and friends of King Perſeus, but many more beſides under-hand took part with him and favoured his proceedings: as for the reſt (under a colour of maintaining liberty) practiſed in all their counſels and complotted againſt the Romans what they could: and never would the Greek Nations abide long in their allegeance, unleſs the hearts of that ſide were taken down and broken; and their authority only cheriſhed, confirmed, and ſtrengthned, who regarded nothing elſe but the empire and ſoveraignty of the Romans. When theſe had informed and preſented divers by name: ſent for they were by the letters miſſive of the General, out of G Ætolia, Acarnania, Epirus, and Bœotia, to give their attendance and follow him to Rome, there to anſwer the cauſe. But into Achaa two of the high Commiſſioners were ſent, namely, C. Claudius and Cn. Domitius, who perſonally ſhould ſummon them by vertue of their edict. And this was done for two conſiderations; the one, becauſe they thought verily that the Achæans were more confident and couragious, and therefore would not obey the ſummons by letters, and peradventure alſo. Callierates and other the informers and accuſers who made preſentment of their names, ſhould be in ſome danger of their lives: the other cauſe why they would be preſent to give them ſummons was this, that amongſt the Kings records and rols they had found the letters of the principal Stateſmen of other nations; but of the Achæans there appeared no writing at all under their hands, and therefore the imputations charged upon them were nothing evident. H

After the Ætolians were diſmiſſed, the nation of the Acarnanians was cited and called into place: as for them, there was no change nor alteration; only Leucas was exempt from doing ſervice to the high court and general aſſembly of the Acarnanians. As they followed the inquiſition ſtill farther and farther, making enquiry who either in publick or private had taken part with the King, they extended their commiſſion as far as into Aſia; and ſent Labeo to demoliſh and race Antiſſa a City in the Iſle Lesbos, and to tranſlate the inhabitants thereof to Methymna: the pretence was, for that they had given harbor in their haven to the proviſions of Antenor the Kings Admiral, at what time as he hovered and ranged about Lesbos with his pinnaces. Two there were that I loſt their heads, men of quality and great worth, to wit, Andronicus the Ætolian, ſon of Andronicus, for that he followed his father and bare arms againſt the people of Rome; and Neon a Theban, by whoſe advice and perſwaſion they had contracted a ſociety with Perſeus.

After this enqueſt of forrain cauſes interpoſed and coming between, the aſſembly of the Macedonians was called again; wherein as touching the ſtate of Macedony, pronounced and publiſhed it was, That there ſhould be certain Senators choſen, whom they call Synedri, by whoſe counſel the common-weal ſhould be managed and governed. After this, were the names read of the principal Macedonians, whom he appointed (together with their children as many as were above fifteen years of age) to go before into Italy. This at firſt was thought to be an hard and cruel courſe, but anon it appeared to the multitude of the Macedonians that it was all done for their liberty. For K nominated there were, the Kings friends and gallants of his court, the commanders of armies, the Admirals of the fleets, and the Captains of the garriſons, who were wont to ſerve the King baſely, but to over-rule others proudly and imperiouſly: ſome exceeding rich and wealthy, others ſpending above the proportion of their revenues and living: all faring at their table, and arraied in apparel like KK. not one carying with him the civil mind of a good citizen, not one that could abide to hear of laws, or of equal liberty. Al theſe therfore, who had been employed in any miniſtry or ſervice about the King, even they alſo who had been uſed in the leaſt embaſſages that were, had commandment to depart out of Macedony and to go into Italy: and look who obeyed not this edict, were threatned with death. Unto Macedony he gave laws, with ſuch diligent care and good regard, as if he had reckoned them not for enemies vanquiſhed, but for allies of good deſert: ſuch L laws (I ſay) as the very practiſe and tryal of long time (the only corrector of all ſtatutes) was not able upon that experience, to check and control.

After theſe ſerious affairs were finiſhed, he exhibited with great furniture and preparation, a ſolemnity of game and diſport at Amphipolis, which long before he had intended, and for the intimation wherof he had both ſent out his meſſengers to the States of Aſia and to the KK. and alſo himſelf in his circuit and viſitation of the Grecian Cities, had given warning to the great men and principal citizens. And thither repaired out of all parts of the world, a number of cunning, dextrous, and artificial actors, that made profeſſion of ſuch plaies and paſtimes; beſides a ſort of wreſtlers, champions, and brave horſes of the beſt kind & breed. Alſo divers embaſſages with their beaſts for ſacrifices, and whatſoever elſe was uſually done of cuſtome, at the great and ſolemn gamings in Greece. Thus it came to paſs, that men admired not only his magnificence, but his wiſedome alſo in exhibiting theſe ſhews and ſights, wherin the Romans at that time were altogether rude and ignorant. Moreover, he feaſted and banketted the Embaſſ. in the ſame ſumptuous manner and reſpective conſideration. And this (by report) was an apophthegm and common ſaying of his, That none could make feaſts and ſet forth plaies better than he who had the skill to win a field. Having repreſented theſe ſolemnities of all ſorts, and beſtowed all the braſen ſhields on ſhipboord; all other armor and weapons of ſundry kinds, he piled upon a mighty heap, and after his praiers made to Mars, Minerva, dame Lua, and other Gods and Goddeſſes unto whom of right and duty appertained to conſecrate and dedicate the ſpoils of enemies; himſelf the General with his own hands put under a burning torch, and kindled the fire, and after him all the marſhal-colonels ſtanding round about, caſt every man his fire-brand, and ſet all a burning. This was a thing noted in that great aſſembly of Europe & Aſia, where there was ſuch a conſluence of people from all parts, as well to teſtify their joy in his behalf as to ſee the ſhews and diſports: in that meeting, I ſay, of ſo great armies of ſea-ſervitors and land-ſouldiers, there was that plenty of all things and cheapneſs of victuals, that Æmylius the General, of that exceeding ſtore and abundance, gave much away freely to privat perſons, to cities and nations, not only for their preſent uſe, but alſo to cary home with them into their countries. And this multitude there aſſembled took not more pleaſure either in beholding the ſtage-plaies acted, or ſeeing men practiſe feats of bodily ſtrength and activity, or the running of horſes in the race, as in viewing the Macedonian booty and pillage laid all abroad to be ſeen; namely, of Statues, and painted tables, of rich cloth of tiſſue, of veſſels in gold, in ſil- O G ver, in copper, and ivory, moſt curiouſly wrought in that roial ſeat and City of Pella, not only to ſerve for a preſent ſhew and no more (like thoſe that the Kings Palace of * Alexandria was repleniſhed with) but alſo for continual and everlaſting uſe. Theſe were all embarked, and committed to the charge of Cn. Octavius to be tranſported to Rome. Paulus after he had given the Embaſſadors a gracious and courteous farewel, paſſed over the River Strymon, and lodged within a mile of Amphipolis. From thence he diſlodged and journeyed untill he came on the fifth day as far as 18 Cities there be of that name.

Pella,

A Pella. And passing by the City, he abode two daies at a place which they call Spelaum, and then he sent P. Nasica, and Q. Maximus his own son with part of the forces in an expedition, to give the waste unto those Illyrians, who had succoured Perseus in his wars, but he commanded them to meet him at Oricum. Himself marching toward Epirus, at the fifteenth remove arrived at Passaron. Not far from thence lay Anicius encamped: unto whom he dispatched his letters, to the end that he should not be troubled at those designs which were to be put in execution; signifying therein, that the Senat granted to the army the pillage of all the Cities of Epirus, which had revolted unto Perseus: which done, he suborned certain Centurions, and sent them into all the Towns with instructions, to give out that his coming was to withdraw all the garrisons from thence, with an intent that the Epirots should enjoy their freedom as well as the Macedonians;
B & so he summoned out of every City ten of the chief to repair unto him. And when he had charged & commanded them to bring abroad into the market place all the gold and silver which they had, he sent out certain cohorts and companies of souldiers to every of the said Cities: they who were assigned for the places farther remote went before them which were appointed to the neerer; and this was ordered so, that upon the same day they should enter into them all at once. Now the Colonels and Centurions had their errand delivered them what to do. In the morning betimes all the gold and silver was brought forth together accordingly, and that at the fourth hour of the day a signal was given to the souldiers to fall to ransack and rifle the Cities. Wherein they found so great store of pillage, that every horsman had for his part * 400 Denarii, and the footmen 200 apiece, and a hundred and fifty thousand pols were led away into captivity. Then the walls
C were rased of the said Cities thus spoiled, and those were to the number of seventy. All the booty and prizes were sold, and out of that mass of money were the souldiers paid. From thence Paulus went down to the Sea side, unto Oricum. But the souldiers minds were nothing so well satisfied, as he supposed they had been, for discontented mightily they were and angry, that they had no share at all in the Kings pillage and treasure, as if they had made no war in Macedony. At Oricum he found those forces which he had sent under the conduct of S. Nasica and Maximus his son; there he shipped his whole army, and sailed over into Italy. In like manner a few daies after, Anicius, when the session and general meeting of the other Epirots and Acarnanians was ended, having given commandment, that the principal persons should follow him into Italy (the knowledge and deciding of whose causes he reserved and referred thither) himself attended the ships
D which the army had used in Macedony, and passed over likewise into Italy.

At what time as these affairs were thus managed in Macedony and Epirus, the Embassadors who had been sent with Attalus to end the war between the Gauls and King Eumenes, arrived in Asia. A surcease of arms for the winter time, was agreed upon between both parties, during which cessation the Gauls departed home, and Eumenes was retired to Pergamus there to winter, where also he lay grievously sick. The spring was no sooner come, but the Gauls began to stir and look abroad: but by that time they were come as far as the Synada, Eumenes had assembled his forces from all parts to Sardis. There at Synada, the Romans parled with Solovittius the General of the Gauls; Attalus also went with them: but thought good it was not, that he should enter within the Gauls camp, for fear of stirring coals in heat of argument, and raising choler of the one side or E other. So P. Licinius communed with the Duke of the Gauls aforsaid: and when he had done he brought word back, that the more he was entreated, the worse he was and less tractable; insomuch as it might seem a wonder, that the words of the Roman Embassadors were so powerful and effectual with Antiochus and Ptolomæus (two mighty and puissant Kings) as to make peace so presently between them, since they prevailed so little or nothing at all among the Gauls.

To return again to Rome. First, the two captive Kings, Perseus and Gentius were sent thither, and committed there to ward they and their children: after them, the multitude besides of prisoners, then consequently those Macedonians, as also the other chief peers of Greece, who were warned to repair unto Rome. For not they only were summoned to make apparence there, who had been seen present in place, but also all those were sent for by letters missive peremptorily, who F were but reported to have been with the Kings. Then Paulus himself a few daies after embarked in a ship of the Kings, a Galeace of a mighty bigness, making way with sixteen banks and rowes of oars to a side, and the same set out and adorned with the Macedonian spoils, not only of brave gorgeous armour, but also of rich hangings, tissue & cloth of gold out of the Kings wardrobe, came up the Tyber against the stream: where great numbers of people went forth to meet him, and filled the banks on both sides of the river. Some few daies after Anicius and Octavius arrived also with their fleet. And to all three by an act of the Senat was triumph granted. Q. Cassius the Pretor had commandment to deal with the Tribunes of the Commons by warrant from the Senat, that they should prefer a bill unto the common people, that those three should be in full commission of command and government that day when they were to ride triumphant into the City. See, how G mean things escape the touch of envy, but the highest commonly are met with. No doubt was made at all of the triumph of Anicius, nor yet of Octavius. But Paulus, with whom even they themselves would have been abashed to compare, could not avoid the backbiting of slanderous & malicious tongues. His souldiers according to the ancient discipline of war, he had held hard to their service. And to them had he given a donative indeed out of the booty, but more niggardly & with a lighter hand than they hoped for, from out of so great wealth and riches of the Kings: and yet in good faith to say a truth, full well he knew that if he had satisfied their greedy desire, and dealt ſtill amongſt them til they had cried Ho, he ſhould have left himſelf juſt nothing to have brought H into the common treaſury. So that all this Macedonian army gave a ſhew by this time, as if they had but cold devotion to their General, either to appear, or to give their voices for the ſetting forward of the bill aforeſaid, as touching his triumph and plenary power of command, when the day of aſſembly ſhould come. Over and beſides, Ser. Sulpitius Galba, who had been a martial Colonel in the ſecond legion, in Macedony, and in privat enmity with the General; both himſelf in per-ſon was in hand with him, and by the ſouldiers alſo of his own legion ſollicited and ſpurred on the reſt to appear in ſufficient number, there for to give their ſuffrages againſt him, and check the bill:

ſaying, "That as he was an imperious and Lordly commander, ſo he was as miſerable a pinch-
"peny withal, and a good deed it were to deny his grace and to croſs the law propoſed for his "triumph, & ſo to be revenged of him throughly: for no doubt the commons of the City would I "go that way that they ſhould ſee the ſouldiers to lead before. He could not forſooth (ſay they) "give money among his ſouldiers liberally: well, he ſhall ſurely know, that his ſouldiers yet can "give him honour; but never let him look for the fruit of favor and grace, where he hath deſer-
"ved none. Theſe words ſet them agog; and when Tiby Sempronius a Tribune of the Commons read out and publiſhed the foreſaid bill in the Capitol, and that by permiſſion of law any private perſon might have ſpoken thereto, and no man came forth, as being a matter whereof no doubt & queſtion was to be made: then Servius Galba ſuddainly ſtept forth, and required of the Tribune, That (foraſmuch as it was ſo far forth dayes, as being the eight hour thereof, ſo that he had not time enough to declare and ſhew at large, what allegations he had why they ſhould not grant *L.
Æmylius* a triumph) they would adjourn the aſſembly to the next day, and betimes in the morning ſet the matter on foot again; for that he had need of a whole day and no leſs, to plead that K cauſe to the full as he ſhould do. But when the Tribune willed him again to ſpeak his mind that day, if he had ought to ſay; he made a ſpeech, and with his long oration held the court until it was within night: putting them in mind and alledging, "How preciſely and rigorouſly he had "exacted at their hands all military duties; how he had impoſed upon the ſouldiers more painful "and dangerous labour than need was: but contrary-wiſe in dealing rewards and beſtowing ho"nourable recompences for good ſervice, he was over-ſtraight-laced & too ſhort in every point:
"and verily ſouldiery and warfare, if it continued ſtill under ſuch Captains, will be more hard, tra-
"veſome, and rough to ſouldiers and warriors: but when all is done and victory obtained, rewar"ded it ſhall be with bare poverty and neglect of honour. Certainly, the Macedonians are in bet- L
"ter caſe yet than the Roman ſouldiers. But if they would be preſent in great frequency the next "morrow for to deny and revoke this bill, then theſe rich and mighty men ſhall know full well,
"That all lieth not in the hands of the Captain and Commander, but that the ſouldiers alſo can do ſomwhat. The ſouldiers animated and induced with theſe perilous words, reſorted the day following in ſo great multitudes, and peſtered the whole Capitol ſo full, as none but they could come in to give their voice. The firſt tribes that were called in, clearly caſſed the grace: which when the principal and chief men of the City ſaw, they ran all into the Capitol with open mouth crying out upon this indignity offered, That L. Paulus a conqueror in ſo great and dangerous a war, ſhould be deprived of his due triumph; and the grand Commanders and Generals of the field were now ſubjected and enthralled to the looſe licentiouſneſs and greedy avarice of their ſouldiers. In this one thing (ſay they) have we too too much faulted, ſuch hath been our favour and partiality, and M ſo loth have we been to diſpleaſe any: but what will become of us in the end if ſouldiers once may come to be Lords and maſters, and thus to crow over their Generals? And every man railed and cried out upon Galba. In the end after this garboil was appeaſed, M. Servilius who ſometime had been Conſul and great maſter of the horſe under the Dictator, requeſted the tribunes that they would begin all again annulling that which was paſt, and give him leave withal to make a ſpeech before the people. The Tribuns went aſide to conſult of this matter; and in fine, over-ruled with the authority and countenance of the nobles and peers of the City, began to treat afreſh and go in hand with all matters anew, making it known openly that they would recal back thoſe firſt tribes, in caſe M. Servilius and other privat men who were willing to utter their mind to the cauſe had N once ſpoken. Then ſaid Servilius as followeth, "Maſters and friends, citizens here of Rome if and
"by nothing elſe it might be judged, how ſingular & how excellent a Commander L. Æmylius was "in the field, this only (if there were no more) may ſuffice, that having in his camp ſuch ſeditious
"and light headed perſons for his ſouldiers, and an adverſary of his own among them ſo noble of "birth, ſo raſh of action, and withal ſo arrogant and ſelf-conceited, ready to incite and ſtir up a "multitude to commotion, yet troubled he never was with any mutiny at all in his whole army.
"The ſame ſeverity it was in government & conduct, that held them in aw and good order, which "now at this preſent they hate & deteſt. And ſo long as they were managed by ancient diſcipline, "they durſt not quetch nor give offence. As for Sergius Galba if (like a new barriſter who is to "ſhew the firſt proof, & to give the aſſay and hanſel of his eloquence) he would have made choice O
"of L. Paulus to begin withal and accuſe him at the bar, he ſhould not yet have hindred his tri"umph, which (if there were nothing elſe to diſſwade and draw him back) the Senat had judged
"to be juſt & due: but the morrow after his triumph (when he had ſeen him a privat man again)
"he might have given preſentment of his name, & by order of law miniſtred interrogatories unto
"him and ſo entred proceſs: or rather he might have ſtaid a little longer, namely, until himſelf
"had been a Magiſtrat in place, and then have gone roundly to work, areſted him upon an action

The Oration of M. Servilius in the behalf of Paulus.

A " to answer at a day, and so accused him judicially before the people. Thus should L. Æmylius have " had his triumph for reward and recompence of his well-doing, in that so nobly & valiantly he " had conducted this war: thus likewise should he have suffered condign punishment, if he had " committed ought unworthy either of his ancient glory or this new honor. But will you have the " truth? when he could find no matter of crime to reproach him with, he sought by-waies and in" direct means to detract his well deserved praises. He demanded yesterday, one full day to accuse
" L. Paulus: and * four hours, even all the day time that was left he spent in making an invective " against him. What prisoner was there ever brought to the bar so culpable and sinful, but all the " faults of his whole life might be ripped up, deciphered, and painted forth in so many hours space?
" But what objected he all that while, that L. Paulus if he were to frame his defence, would wish B " to deny? O that some man would procure me here for the while, two assemblies and courts, the " one of Roman souldiers employed lately in Macedony: the other more pure and uncorrupt of the " twain, namely, of citizens sounder in judgment, void of all favor, & cleer from hatred. And the " people of Rome I would have to be the judg. First, let Paulus be accused in the grand assembly &
" court of these citizens. Tell me O S. Galba, what would you say against him before those Quirits " of Rome. For there you should have been cut off and lost all this discourse & special part of your " oration, carying these terms, You looked too streightly & precisely to the corps de guard in their " stations; you held the souldiers too hard to their watch and ward: the sentinels were neerly and
" narrowly looked unto; & you were over curious about going the rounds & relieving the watch
" in the night season: about the works and fabricks you put the souldiers to more toiling & moil-C " ing than heretofore; whiles you, my L. General, their surveior, over-seer, and task-maker, rode
" all about to exact the utmost with all extremity; in one & the same day when you had the army
" on foot, presently from a journy you led them forth to battail; when the victory was got, you " would not suffer the souldier to breath and take repose, but caused him to march immediatly &
" to follow the enemy in chase: also, wheras the booty to be parted & shared out might have en" riched your self, yet will you carry the Kings treasure in shew of triumph & then lay it up in the " chamber of the City. As these be shrewd matters, like sharp goads to prick those souldiers & set " them on, who think they have not scope enough to serve their dissolut loomes or too small al" lowance to content their covetous appetits: so, with the people of Rome they would have no" thing at all prevailed: who if they should not call to mind examples & stories of old, which they D " have heard their fathers talk of: namely, what overthrows have been received through the indul" gence and popularity of Generals; and contrarywise what victories have been atchieved by their " severe discipline and government: yet at least wise they cannot chuse but remember what ods & " difference there was in the late Punick war, between M. Minutius General of the horse, and Q.
" Fabius Max. his Dictator. And therfore since the accuser might know all this, the defence of Pau- " lus in this behalf, was altogether needless and unnecessary. Let us go now to the other audience " and assembly of the Macedonian souldiers. But now me thinks I must not cal you Quirites any " more, but souldiers: if haply there be so much grace in you, as that this name yet may cause you " to blush, & be abashed for very shame of the world, to offer abuse unto your Genera. And veri" ly for mine own part, I find a great change in my self, & am otherwise affected in my mind, now E " that I seem to speak unto an army of souldiers, than ere-whiles I was, when my Oration was ac" commodate and framed to the commons of a City. Now souldiers, what say you to the matter?
" Is there any one at Rome (but Perseus again) that would not have a triumph over the Macedoni" ans? & are you not ready to pull such a one in pieces with those very hands, wherwith you van" quished the Macedonians? He, whosoever he is, that impeacheth you for entring into the City in " triumph, trust me truly, would have debarred you of victory if it had bin in his power. Lo, how
" fouly are ye deceived (souldiers) and far out of the way, if ye think that the triumph is the honor
" only of the General, and not of the souldiers likewise, and consequently of the whole people of " Rome. This is not Paulus his case alone. Many others likewise there have been, who when they " could not obtain triumph at the hands of the Senate, triumphed nevertheless upon the Albane F " mountain. As impossible it is for any man to bereave L. Paulus of the honor due for the finishing " of the Macedonian war, as it was to disappoint C. Luctatius of his glory for ending the first Pu-" nick war, P. Cornelius for the second; or others besides who after them triumphed. It is not a tri" umph that can make L. Paulus better or worse, either the greater captain or the less. Herein con-
" sisteth the credit, renown & reputation of the souldiers and of all the people of Rome more than " his: for fear lest they be reputed & noted either for envious & malicious or else unthankful for " their best members & noblest citizens: & therin seem to imitate the people of Athens, who ever" more persecute and plague with envy their best men that live amongst them. Your ancestors and " forefathers when time was (faulted this waies enough I wis) in the person of Camillus, whom they
" offred abuse unto, before the City by his means was recovered out of the Gauls hands. Much you G " were to blame your selves here & overmuch too in P. Africanus. That in Liternum his mansion " house and place of habitation (who was the conqueror of Africk) should be shewed: that in " Liternum (I say) the sepulchre of P. Africanus should be seen. Let us blush for very shame, that
" L. Paulus, as he is equal to them in glory and honor, should likewise go with them and have his " part of your hard and wrongful dealing. The first thing that ye do then, let be this: Out with this " spot & stain of infamy which ye have caught; so reproachful in regard of other nations, so hurt-H " full to your selves. For who wil ever hereafter wish to be like Africanus? who will endeavor to " resemble

* By this is to be collected, that they counted the day 12 hours from 6 to 6. & not from sun to sun, as some would have it.

" resemble L. Paulus, in a City so unthankful, nay so spiteful and malicious to all good men? Say H
" there were no question at all of infamy and obloquy, but of honor only and reputation, tell me
" (I beseech you) is there any triumph that compriseth not the glory also of the Roman name? So " many triumphs over the Gauls, so many again over the Spaniards, and so many over the Cartha" ginians, are they reputed and called the triumphs of the Captains alone, and not likewise of the " people of Rome? And like as we say, that we triumphed not over Pyrrhus only, nor over Anni-
" bal, but over the Epirots likewise and the Carthaginians: even so neither M. Curius alone, nor
" P. Cornelius, but the Romans also have triumphed. True it is, and I must needs say, that the soul-
" diers have a proper interest and part by themselves, in that they alone (dight with branches and
" chaplets of laurel, and every one bravely to be seen and adorned with the gifts that have been " given them) resound Io Triumphe, Io Triumphe, and as they pass along the City sing and chant the I
" praises of themselves and of their Captain-Generals. And if it fortune at any time that the soul-
" diers be not brought home out of the province to the triumph, they grumble & are disconten" ted: & yet notwithstanding, absent though they be, they think it is their due: and so long as their " General and leader triumpheth, they triumph also, because the victory was atchieved by the " strength of their arms. Good souldiers, if a man should ask you, for what intent you were recon-
" ducted into Italy? and wherfore so soon as the service was performed and the war brought to an " end, ye had not presently your congy of discharge? moreover to what purpose ye came by com" panies and squadrons under your ensigns and colors? for what cause ye stay and remain here, and " go not every man his waies to his own home? what answer would ye make else, but, That ye
" would be seen in triumph? And to say a truth; since ye have won the victory and are conquerors, K
" I cannot blame you: nay, ye ought to desire for to be seen and seen again. It is not long since we " triumphed over Philip (this mans father) and over Antiochus likewise: and reigned both they " did as KK. when the triumph was: and shall there be no solemnity of triumph over Perseus, " taken prisoner and brought captive with his children into the City? If L. Paulus, standing beneath
" as a privat person (one amongst the company of gowned citizens) seeing L. Anicius and Cn. Octa-
" vius arraied sumptuously in cloth of gold, and in their rich purple robes and mantles of estate, " mounting up the Capitol in their triumphant chariots, should ask them the question and say in " this manner: Tell me, O Lucius Anicius and you Cn. Octavius, judg ye in your own conceit that " you are more worthy of a triumph than I? They would no doubt come down each one out of " his chariot and yeeld him their place, yea, and for very shame deliver up all their ensigns and or" naments unto him. And you Quirites, had you rather see Gentius than Perseus led in triumph? L
" would you wish indeed to triumph for an accidental appendant only of the war, rather than for
" the main substance of the war? Shall the legions coming out of Sclavonia, and the mariners at sea,
" enter the City crowned with laurel garlands; and the legions out of Macedony, being denied " their own triumph stand still and behold others to triumph? Moreover, what shall become of " that rich booty? what shall be done with the spoils of that great and wealthy victory? where " shall be bestowed and laid up so many thousand corslets and armors plucked from the bodies of " enemies slain? Shall they be sent back again into Macedony? Those costly images of gold, of mar" ble, of ivory; those goodly fair pictures; those pretious clothes and hangings of purple, scarlet, and " tissue; that mighty quantity of gold and silver wrought into vessels chased and engraven; that " huge mass of the Kings mony and coin, what shall we do with it? What? shall it be carried all by M " night as stolen goods into the publick treasury and City Chamber? The goodliest sight of all the " rest, what say you to it? A most noble & puissant King is taken prisoner; where shall he be shewed " to the people of Rome his conqueror? What running, what concourse there was of people to see
" K. Syphax captive (& yet he was but an accessary to the Punick war) most of us do well remem" ber. Shall K. Perseus then, a prisoner and captive; shall Philip and Alexander his sons (persons of " so great name) be hidden and kept from the sight and eyes of the City? And there were no more
" but L. Æmylius himself, twice Consul, the conqueror & subduer of Greece, all men would desire " to see him enter the City in his triumphant chariot. We created him Cos. for this intent that he " should finish and determin this war, which to your dishonor and great shame had hung for the N " space of 4 years. To him then who (at what time as the lot of that province fell unto him and " when he departed on his voiage from Rome) had all our hearts to presage victory and triumph, " shall we now deny triumph when he hath the victory? And verily in so doing, we shall not only
" defraud men but rob the gods also of their honor; for due it is to the very gods also and not to " men alone. Have not your ancestors ever used to enterprise all great affairs in the name of the " gods first & therin also to end last? The Cos. or Pretor, when he is to take his journy into his pro" vince or to levy war, with his Lictors before him clad in their coats of arms, is ever wont to make " his solemn vows in the Capitol: after he hath acquit himself of his charge and obtained victory,
" when as he triumpheth, he transferreth in pomp the rich presents of the people of Rome so well
" deserved and offereth them to the same gods in the said Capitol, unto whom there first he pro- O " nounced his vows. And the beasts for sacrifice going before the pomp of triumph, are not the least
" part of this solemnity: that it may appear, how the General in his return is mindful of the gods, &
" rendreth thanks unto them for the happy managing of the affairs of Common-weal. As for those " beasts for sacrifice which he hath appointed to be shewed in the pomp of triumph, slay them:
" neither makes it matter whose hand doth it: some kil one & some another, but those sacred viands
" of the Senat, which are not to be eaten in any privat house, nor in publick place unhallowed,

" but

A "but only in the Capitol; and there, not for the pleasure of men, but of Gods and men together, "will ye trouble and impeach at the suggestion of Servius Galba? Shall the gates be shut against "the triumph of L. Paulus? shall Perseus King of the Macedonians, with his children and the mul"titude besides of captives, with the spoils of the Macedonians, be left behind at the river side?
"shall L. Paulus go directly from the City gate home to his house as a privat person, like one that "hath been abroad in the countrey to see his farm, and is newly returned? But thou Centurion and "thou souldier, give ear, I advise thee, to the ordinance which the Senat hath decreed as touching "the General Paulus, rather than to the vain speech of Serv. Galba: hearken to this that I say the "word, rather than he. As for him, he hath learned nought else but to prate and talk, and that to "the depraving of others full maliciously. I tell thee, fought have I with mine enemies even upon B "defiance given twenty times and three; done I have my devoir, and from them all that were in "combat with me, I never failed but carried away their spoils; I bear the marks about me of many "a wound, and the honorable scars therof are to be seen, all of them in the breast and forepart of "my body. At which word, they say, he bared his naked skin, and related withal in what battel he "had received this or that wound. Now as he shewed these scars, and chanced to discover some "parts that better I wis and more honestly had been unseen, and therewith, a * bunch or swelling
"of a rupture that he had in his groin, wherat some of them that stood next unto him took up a "laughter, then (qd. he) even this that you have espied here, and make such game at, I caught with "a strain, riding continually as I did, and never from my horseback day nor night: and no more
"ashamed I am and displeased with my self for that infirmity, than for these scars which you here
C "see; since that it never was any impediment unto me in performing my service to the Common"weal either in civil affairs of City, or in warfare abroad. Well, I an old servitor, have been con"tent here to shew unto yong men and raw souldiers, my body, many a time and often hacked,
"pierced and slashed with the sword. Let Galba now lay bare that whole skin of his own so slick "and fair. Now my masters, you that are Tribuns, call the tribes again to the scrutiny, and take "their voices. As for me [down I will, and go after the souldiers hard at heels. Know I will which
"be those lewd and unthankful companions that had rather be soothed up and flattered in the "wars by mutinous persons, than serve under the martial discipline of their General.] * *

* * * * * * * * * * * *

Valerius Antias reporteth, That the sum of all the gold and silver taken in pillage and carried in D the pomp of this triumph, amounted to the worth of 120 millions of Sesterces. Which mass, no doubt, ariseth much greater by the proportion of the number of wains and the poises both of gold and silver by the same author set down in general sums. And as some have recorded, he either spent in the war next before, or else scattered and lost in his flight when he made haft to Samothrace, as much again as that came to. And the more wonder it was, that so mighty a mass of money had been gathered and heaped up within thirty years after the war between Philip and the Romans, raised part out of the issue and incomb of his metal mines, and part out of other profits and tributs. Thus Philip very bare of money, and Perseus contrary-wise exceeding rich, began to make war with the Romans. Last of all, Paulus himself rode in his chariot, carrying a great port and majesty with him both for his comely and personable body, and also for his reverent old age.
E After his chariot, among other honorable personages rode his two sons, Q. Maximus and P. Scipio. Then followed the horsemen by troops, and the footmen by their cohorts and companies, every one keeping their ranks full decently. The footmen had given them a hundred Sesterces apeece, the Centurions double, and the horsemen triple so much. And it is thought, that he meant to have given the footmen asmuch as the most, and to the rest in proportion, in case they either had not denied his honour by their voices, or if in token of thankfulness and joy, they had but willingly and cheerfully shouted, when this sum which they received was pronounced and related unto them. And not Perseus alone (led as he was through the enemies City in chains before the triumphant chariot of the conqueror) but also Paulus himself the conqueror glittering so glorious-F ly in his cloth of gold and costly purple, was a mirror to the word in those few daies, of the transitory and mutable state of mans life. For of those two sons, whom (after he had given the other two by way of adoption from himself) he kept alone at home as heirs to bear his name, to maintain the sacred rites and sacrifices of his family, and to uphold the house it self, the yonger a stripling under twelve years of age, five daies before his triumph died, and the elder full fourteen years old and more, departed within three daies after the triumph. Which two youths indeed ought to have been arraied in their embrodered robes of purple, and so to have ridden in the chariot with their father, predestining and aiming to themselves the like triumphs another day.

Some few daies after, M. Antonius a Tribune of the Commons assembled a solemn audience of the people for his sake, wherein when after the manner and custome of other Generals he should discourse of his own exploits and worthy acts, he made unto them a memorable Oration and G well beseeming a noble Roman Prince, to his effect. "Albeit I suppose (quoth he) my neighbors "and friends, the citizens of this noble City, you be not ignorant, both how happily I have ad-
"ministred the weal publick, and also how unfortunatly within these few daies two thunderbolts
"have shaken my private house, as having one while beheld the goodly shew and pomp of my "triumph testifying the one, and seen another while the wofull funerals and obsequies of my two "sons declaring the other; yet I beseech you suffer me with that singleness of heart and affection,
"as I ought, to make a brief comparison between mine own particular private fortune, and the

All within these marks [ ] is supplied out of Plutarch. Somewhat wanteth besides immediatly after this Oration, namely, part of the description of Paulus his triumph.

The Oration of L. Æmylius to the people of Rome.

" publick felicity of the City. At my departure from Italy, I looſed from Brundiſium, and ſet up ſail H " at the ſun-riſing: by the ninth hour of the ſame day I arrived ſafe with all my ſhips at Corphu.
" The fifth day after I came to Delphi, where I ſacrificed unto Apollo, for my ſelf, for your armies " and your navy. From Delphi I departed, and within five daies was in the leaguer. Where, after " I had received the charge of the army, and altered ſome things which might greatly have hin" dered the victory, I marched forward, for that the enemies camp was inexpugnable, and the " King could not be forced by any means to fight: and piercing through his guards that kept the " paſſage, I went as far as Petra: ſo as by this means having perforce drawn the King to fight, I " vanquiſhed him in plain field and ranged battel. Macedony I ſubdued, and brought it in ſubje" ction to the people of Rome. Finally, that war which for four years together other Conſuls be" fore me ſo managed, as each one left it ever to his ſucceſſor worſe than he found it, I atchieved I
" and brought to a final end in fifteen daies. I followed then in this train other proſperous affairs,
" as the fruits enſuing of that victory. For all the Cities of Macedony yeelded unto me. The Kings
" treaſure I ſeized upon: the King in perſon (as if the very Gods themſelves had delivered and " put him into my hands) I took priſoner, with his ſons in the Temple of the Samothracians. But " then my heart miſgave me, and even then I ſuſpected the ſurpaſſing favour of my good fortune:
" then caſt I doubts, and began to fear the dangers at ſea, having ſo mighty a maſs of the Kings
" treaſure to tranſport, and my victorious army to reconduct back into Italy. But ſeeing all things
" fall out to hearts deſire, a proſperous voiage, a ſafe arival and whatſoever I could pray for at the " Gods hands; this I wiſhed in my heart, (as knowing full well the wonted manner of fortune,
" when ſhe is at the higheſt pitch, to turn back again and come as faſt down) that mine own K
" houſe, rather than the Common-weal, might feel that change and alteration whenſoever it " came. And therefore I hope that this ſo notable a calamity of mine own, ſhall excuſe the City " for having any other misfortune, ſince that my triumph (as it were to check and mock the " changes of this world) hath faln ſo juſt between the funerals of my two ſons. See how I and
" Perſeus are repreſented above all others for two notable examples of the frail and unſtable con" dition of man. Lo how he, who being a priſoner himſelf, ſaw his ſons likewiſe led captives before " his face, hath them yet living ſound and ſafe: and I, who have triumphed over him, came from " the burial of one of my ſons to ride in my chariot up to the Capitol, and from thence deſcen-
" ded again to find the other lying at point of death: neither is there of all that fair iſſue that I " had, one left to bear the name of L. Paulus Æmylius. For two of them the houſe of the Cornelii L
" and the Fabii have, unto whom I gave them in adoption, as out of a great race and breed of " children: ſo as now in the family of Paulus there is not one left but himſelf. Howbeit for this " calamity and ruin of my houſe, your felicity and the happy eſtate of the City is a great comfort " and conſolation again. Theſe words delivered with ſuch a magnanimity, troubled the ſpirits of the auditors, and aſtonied them more, than if he had lamentably moned himſelf unto them with pitcous tears, for his childleſs eſtate and deſolat condition.

C. Octavius ſolemnized his naval triumph over King Perſeus the firſt day of December: in which ſolemnity, he neither had priſoners led in ſhew, nor ſpoils carried in pomp. He gave to his mariners and ſailers ſeventy and five Denarii apeece; to every pilot double, and to the ſhip-maſters four times as much. After this, the Senat aſſembled, and the LL. ordained, That Q. Caſſius ſhould M lead King Perſeus with his ſon Alexander, together with his train that accompanied him, as alſo bring all his money and goods, ſilver, or what moveables and furniture ſoever he had to Alba, there to be kept in ſure cuſtody. Bitis the Kings ſon of Thrace, with the hoſtages was ſent to Carſeoli, there to lie in ſafe ward. As for the reſt of the captives who had been led in triumph, thought good it was they ſhould be clapt up faſt in priſon.

Some few dayes after theſe things, there arrived Embaſſadors from Cotys King of the Thracians, bringing with them money for the ranſome of his ſon and the other hoſtages. Into the Senat they were brought; where, by way of preamble they laid this for the ground of their ſpeech, That Cotys had not ſided with King Perſeus in the war, upon his own motive and accord, but was compelled to give hoſtages: then they beſought the LL. of the Senate to ſuffer them to be redeemed at N what price ſoever they would ſet down, were it never ſo high. Unto whom this anſwer was returned by authority of the Senat, " That the people of Rome bare well in mind the amity which " they had with Cotys, with his progenitors, and the whole nation of the Thracians. As for the " giving of the hoſtages, it was rather an evidence to prove, than an argument to excuſe their
" treſpaſs and fault: conſidering that when Perſeus was quiet, the Thracian nation ſtood in no " fear and aw of him, much leſſe then, when as he was troubled and occupied in war with the Ro" mans. Howbeit although Cotys preferred the favour of Perſeus before the friendſhip of the peo" ple of Rome, yet they would conſider of the matter, and reſpect more his quality and what was " meet for his eſtate, than his deſert and what he was worthy to have; and therefore they would " releaſe his ſon and the hoſtages, and ſend them home again. As for the people of Rome, their man- O
" ner is to beſtow their favours and benefits freely without regard of recompence: the worth and " eſtimation whereof they had rather leave to the conſideration and minds of the receivers, than " require and demand the ſame preſently. So there were Embaſſadours nominated to reconduct the hoſtages into Thrace, to wit, T. Quintius Flaminius, C. Licinius Nerva, and M. Caninius Rebilus.
And to thoſe Thracian Embaſſadours were given by way of preſents 2000 aſſes apeece. So Bitis with the reſt of the hoſtages was ſent for from Carſeoli, and with the fore-named Embaſſadors returned again to his father.

The

A The Kings ſhips taken from the Macedonians, of an extraordinary and monſtrous bignes before time, were landed upon Mars field and there laid up drie. Whiles the late remembrance of the Macedonian triumph remained ſtill not in the minds only, but as it were in the very eyes of men, L. Anicius triumphed over King Gentius and the Illyrians upon the very day of the feaſt * Quirinalia. It was generally thought that all things therein rather reſembled ſome likenes in ſhew, than otherwiſe countervailed in ſubſtance the former triumph. The General himſelf Anicius was inferior to Æmylius both in nobility and alſo in quality of perſon: and ſetting together their places of command, the one being but Pretor, and the other Conſul; neither was Gentius equal to Perſeus, nor the Illyrians to the Macedonians. Spoil for ſpoil, money for money gifts for gifts, there was no proportion nor compariſon between them. And therefore as that reſpect late triumph was B more reſplendent and glorious than this, ſo conſidered in it ſelf without other reſpect it was not to be found fault withal and deſpiſed. Anicius within few daies had vanquiſhed and throughly tamed the nation of the Illyrians; both by Sea and Land proud and mighty, bearing themſelves ſtout and bold for their ſtrong and fenced forts. The King he took priſoner, and thoſe of the Kings race and roial blood. He ſhewed in triumph many field-enſigns, beſides other ſpoils and moveableſgoods of the King. Likewiſe of gold ſeven and twenty pound weight, and of ſilver nineteen; beſides 3000 Denarii, and a hundred and twenty thouſand peeces of Illyrian ſilver in coin. Before his chariot were led King Gentius with his wife and children; Caravantius alſo the Kings brother, and certain noblemen of Illyricum. Out of the pillage he gave unto his footmen 45 Denarii apeece, to every Centurion a double proportion, and unto the horſemen a triple. To the allies of the La- C tine nation he allowed aſmuch as to citizens; the ſailers and mariners he made equal with the footmen. Herein he ſurmounted the triumph of Æmylius, for that his ſouldiers followed after his triumphant chariot more jocund and merry, and the General was praiſed and extolled in many a ditty and ballad. Antias writeth, That of his booty there was raiſed as much money as came to twenty millions of Seſtertii, over and above the gold and ſilver that went into the common treaſury. But becauſe I could not ſee how poſſibly ſuch a ſum ſhould be made, I have ſet down mine author for the thing, now, chuſe you whether you will believe him. King Gentius with his wife, children, and brother, was by order from the Senat led to Spoletium, there to be kept in ward: all the captives beſides were at Rome caſt into priſon, and there lay. But when the Spoletins refuſed to take the charge and cuſtody of him and the reſt, theſe Princes were tranſlated from D thence to Igiturvium. There remained beſides of the Illyrian prizes two hundred and twenty barks, which being taken from King Gentius, Q. Caſſius by the ordinance of the Senat gave and diſtributed among the citizens of Corphu, Apollonia, and Dyrrhachium.

The Conſuls that year after they had only waſted the territories of the Ligurians, becauſe they could never train the enemies forth to fight, having done no memorable ſervice, returned to Rome for the choice of new Magiſtrats in the room of the old. And ſo the firſt comitial or court day that came, they created Conſuls M. Claudius Marcellus and C. Sulpitius Gallus. The morrow after were elected for Pretors L. Livius, L. Apuleius Saturninus, A. Licinius Nerva, P. Rutilius Calvus, P. Quintilius Varus, and Marcus Fonteius. Theſe Pretors had their government in this manner: two for the juriſdiction within the City, two for Spain, the other for Sicily and Sardinia. This E year leapt, and the leap day was the morrow after the feaſt Terminalia. That year died C. Claudius the Augur, and in his place the colledg of the Augurs choſe T. Quintius Flaminius. Alſo M. Fabius Pretor the Flamin of Quirinus the ſame year departed this life. This year alſo came King Pruſias to Rome with his ſon Nicomedes. He entred into the City with a great train attending upon him: from the gate he went directly to the common place and the tribunal of Q. Caſſius the Pretor. And when there was a great concourſe of people about him from all parts; he ſaid that his coming was to worſhip the Gods which are the preſidents of the City of Rome, as alſo to ſalute the people of Rome, and withal to ſhew his own joy and to wiſh theirs for their happy victory over the two Kings Perſeus and Gentius, and for that by ſubduing the Macedonians and Illyrians, they had enlarged their ſiegnory and dominion. And when the Pretor made an offer to call F a Senat for him even that preſent day, if he would ſo himſelf; he deſired two daies reſpit to ſee the Temples of the Gods, to view the City, and to viſit his good friends and acquaintance. L. Cornelius Scipio the treaſurer was appointed to go about with him and ſhew him all: who alſo had been ſent as far as to Capua for to meet him upon the way: alſo for him and his train about him, there was a ſufficient houſe taken up, where he was kindly and liberally intertained. The third day after he came into the Senat, where after he had congratulated in their behalf for their late victory, he recounted his own demerits and good deſerts during the war: and then requeſted, that he might have leave to pay his vows and namely, to ſacrifice at Rome in the capitol, ten head of greater beaſts, and one at Preneſte to Fortune. For that he ſaid thoſe vows were made for the victory of the people of Rome. Alſo that the league and alliance with him might be renued. Item that the G land won by conqueſt from King Antiochus, which being not by the people of Rome given unto any, the Gauls notwithſtanding held in poſſeſſion, might be conveied unto him by a deed of gift. Laſt of all, he recommended his ſon Nicomedes to the Senat. He found much favor among all them who had been Generals of armies in Macedony. And therefore he obtained directly all other ſuits that he made: only as touching the ſaid lands, this anſwer he had. That they would ſend certain commiſſioners to ſee and view the thing. "And if it appeared and fell out, that the foreſaid land "appertained to the people of Rome, and was not paſſed away by gift to any already, they would

* It was called the tools holy day, and kept upon the 17 of February.

" repute King Pruſias the worthieſt man of all other, to receive that donation at their hands. H
" But if it never belonged to King Antiochus, and ſo was plain and evident that the people of " Rome had no right unto it, or if the Gauls had a grant thereof already, Pruſias then muſt be con" tent and pardon them, if they were unwilling to gratify him with any gifts prejudicial and in" jurious to another. Neither could a thing never ſo freely given, be an acceptable gift, which he " knew the donor may take away from the donee at his pleaſure. As for Nicomedes his ſon, they " would willingly receive him into their protection at his hands ſo recommended. And how " careful and tender the people of Rome was over Kings children committed unto them to keep,
" may appear by Ptolomæus the King of Ægypt. With this anſwer was Pruſias diſmiſſed. Order was given that he ſhould be preſented with a certain ſumme of ſeſterces, and with ſilver plate to the quantity of 50 pound weight. Alſo they ordained that his ſon Nicomedes ſhould have gifts pro- I portionable to that ſum which was given Maſgaba the ſon of Maſaniſſa; alſo that beaſts and all other things appertaining to ſacrifices, ſhould be allowed unto the King out of the City-chamber, like as to the magiſtrats of Rome, chuſe whether he would ſlay and offer them at Rome or Preneſte.
Alſo that out of that fleet which rid in the harbor of Brunduſium, there ſhould be twenty gallies aſſigned him to uſe, until ſuch time as the King were arrived at the fleet which was given him.
Finally, that L. Cornelius Scipio ſhould accompany him and never depart from him, but bear the charges both of him and his retinue about him until they were embarked and on ſhipboord. It is ſaid, that the King joied wonderouſly at this courteſy and kindnes offered him by the people of Rome and that he would needs pay for thoſe preſents which were given him: only he commanded his ſon to take a gift at the hands of the people of Rome. Thus much have our Hiſtorians writ- K ten as touching K. Pruſias. But Polybius reporteth, that this King was unworthy the Majeſty of ſo honorable a name, for that he was wont to meet the Embaſſadors of Rome with his head ſhaven and a cap upon it: alſo to acknowledg and call himſelf the freed villain and vaſſal of the people of Rome, and to teſtify ſo much, he wore the badg and token of that degree and condition. At Rome likewiſe when he entred the Councel-houſe, he ſtooped down and kiſſed the very door-ſill, calling the Senators Gods, his Saviors, yea, and to have uſed other ſpeeches not ſo honorable to the hearers, as baſe and unfitting his own perſon. When he had ſojourned in and about the City not above thirty daies, he took his leave and departed into his own Realm.

To the Reader.

From the five and fortieth book forward, all the reſt of Livy (to the great maim and blemiſh of the Latine tongue, and no ſmall grief of learned men) is loſt, even 100 books wanting five, like as thoſe ten between the tenth and one and twentieth books, commonly called the ſecond Decad. For as it M appeareth by L. Florus the Epitomiſt, there were in all 140: and the arguments of ſo many remain at this day, by him collected. But if it be true that Francis Petrarch ſaith, Levy wrote in all 142: and as Charles Sigonius probably conjecture th, the 36 and 37 Breviaries of L. Florus be wanting of this later number. How all theſe complete books of T. Livius ſhould miſcarry, it is not certainly known. Some hope there is, that they are but mis-caſt and laid out of the way. For like as within theſe hundred years ſome fragments of the ſtory were diſcovered N in Mogunce: and the laſt five books now extant, found by Simon Grinæus in the Library of a monaſtery over-againſt the City of Worms, and dedicated by Eraſmus of Rotterdam unto Charles, the ſon of William Lord Montjoy, in the reign of Henry the eight of famous memory K. of England, &c. ſo we are not to deſpair of the reſt. In the mean time, we muſt make much of theſe brief ſummaries left unto us. Even as therefore I have inſerted thoſe ten Breviaries in ſtead of the books: ſo I thought it not amiſs (in hope that one day the very books O themſelves will come to light) to proceed in the reſt following: and the rather, for that neither he that tranſlated Livy into the Tuſcan language, nor they who have done him into French (as far as I could ever ſee) have taken that pains.

EUmenes came towards Rome. Now becauſe in the Macedonian war he had carried himſelf indifferent between Perſeus and the Romans, there paſſed a law in general terms, That no King might repair to Rome; to the end, that if he were excluded, he ſhould not be reputed an enemy; nor if he were admitted, acquit and cleered of all fault. Cl. Marcellus the Conſul ſubdued the Gauls inhabiting the Alps, and C. Sulpitius Gallus the Ligurians. The Embaſſadors of King Pruſias complained of Eumenes, for that he invaded and waſted their borders; and they informed beſides, that he had conſpired with Antiochus againſt the people of Rome. At the earneſt ſuit and entreaty of the Rhodians, a league was contracted with them. The Cenſors took a review and ſurvey of the City, wherein were enrolled and ſeſſed 327022 citizens of Rome. M. Æmylius Lepidus was elected preſident of the Senat. Ptolomæus the King of the Ægyptians, was by his yonger brother expelled out of his realm, but by the means of Embaſſadors (ſent from Rome) he was reſtored to his Kingdom. Upon the death of Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, his ſon Ariarathes came to the crown, and by entercourſe and mediation of Embaſſadors, renewed amity with the people of Rome. This book containeth beſides, the wars againſt the Ligurians, Corſians, and Luſitanians, fought with variable fortune: the troubles alſo in Syria after the death of Antiochus, who left behind him Antiochus his ſon, a very child. This yong Prince (together with his guardian Lyſias*)* Demetrius the ſon of Seleucus (who had been ſent in hoſtage to Rome) murdred privily, becauſe he was not ſet at large and diſmiſſed by the Romans: and ſo himſelf entred upon the Kingdom. L. Æmylius Paulus who had conquered Perſeus, departed this life; whoſe incorruption and abſtinence from the publick treaſure was ſuch, that notwithſtanding he had brought both out of Spain and Macedony ſo great ſtore of wealth and rickes, yet when his goods were prized and ſold, there would be hardly raiſed thereof ſufficient to repay his wife her dowry. The Pomptine mariſhes were drawn drie by Cor. Cethegus the Conſul (unto whom that charge was by lot faln) and the ſame turned into firm ground.

CNeus Tremellius a Tribune of the Commons had a fine ſet on his head, for that he had contended in a wrongful cauſe with M. Æmylius Lepidus the ſoveraign Pontifie. The power and authority of the clergie Magiſtrats, was greater and mightier than before. A law was enacted as touching inordinate ſuit for offices. In the ſurvey of the City, there were taxed in the ſubſidy book 328314 Roman citizens. L. Æmylius Lepidus was choſen again preſident of the Senat. Between the two brethren Ptolomees, who were at variance, there paſſed this accord and agreement, That the one ſhould reign in Ægypt and the other in Cyrenæ. Ariarathus King of Cappadocia, by the politick plot and forcible power of Demetrius King of Syria diſpoſſeſſed of his Kingdom, was by the Senat ſet into it again. Certain Embaſſadors were ſent as delegats from the Senat to determine of the litigious ground between Maſaniſſa and the Carthaginians. C. Martius the Conſul fought againſt the Dalmatians, at the firſt unfortunatly, but afterwards atchieved the victory. The occaſion of the war with them was this; for that they had made waſt upon the Illyrians, who were allies of the people of Rome. The ſame nation Cornelius Naſica the Conſul brought in ſubjection. Q. Opimius the Conſul ſubdued the Ligurians beyond the Alps, who had ſpoiled Antipolis and Nicæa, two Towns belonging to the ſeignory of the Maſſilians. Moreover, here are contained the adventures of many Captains in Spain, with no good ſucceſs. In the 598 year from the foundation of the City, the Conſuls ſo ſoon as the aſſembly for election was paſt, and other Conſuls choſen for the year following, began their office. The cauſe of this alteration was, becauſe the Spaniards were entred into rebellion. The Embaſſadors aforeſaid who had been ſent to take up and decide the controverſy between Maſaniſſa and the Carthaginians, made report, That they had found great ſtore of ſhip-timber and other matters for a navy at Carthage. Certain Pretors accuſed by the provinces for avarice, were condemned.

Of the XLVIII. Book.

THe Cenſors took a review and tax of the city, wherein were reckoned three hundred four and twenty thouſand polls of citizens. The cauſes of a third Punick war be here recorded. Upon a report that there was a right puiſſant army of Numidians upon the borders of the Carthagians, conducted by Archobarzanes the nephew of Syphax, M. Porcius Cato perſwaded in an oration to proclaim war againſt the Carthaginians, for that they intertained ſuch a power within their frontiers under a colour againſt Maſaniſſa, but in truth raiſed againſt the Romans: howbeit Publius Cornelius Naſica gainſaid him and diſſuaded the matter. Whereupon ordeined it was, that Embaſſadors ſhould be ſent to Carthage in eſpial, to obſerve what they did, and whereabout they went. Who after they had given the Carthaginian Senat a check and rebuke, for that against the covenants of the league, they maintained forces, and were provided of timber and other stuff for a navy, they were willing to conclude a peace between Masanissa and them; so as Masanissa should forgo and part with the land in question. But Gisgo the son of Amilcar, a busy and seditious man, who then was soveraign Magistrate (notwithstanding their Senat promised to be ruled by the award of the said Embassadors) incited them so by his perswasive remonstrances to war upon the Romans, that the Embassadors made shift to flee and save themselves, or else they had come to a mischief. When they related these news at Rome, the Senat already set and bent against the Carthaginians, were now by his words provoked much more. M. Portius Cato performed the funerals of his son, deceased in his Pretorship, with exceeding small charges, according to his ability, for he was but poor. One Andriscus, who stoutly made the world believe, that he was the son of Perseus the King of Macedony, was sent to Rome. M. Æmylius Lepidus, now six times chosen President of the Senat by the Censors, gave his son in streight charge before he died, to carry him forth to burial in a couch without linnen clothes and the purple pall, and not to bestow in other obsequies above one denier; saying, that the funerals of the greatest and best personages are wont to be ennobled and honoured with the shews of images and titles, and not with sumptuous expenses. An inquisition there was about the practise of poisoning and sorcery. Publilia and Licinia, who were endited for making away their husbands, put in sureties before the Pretor, to be bound in goods, lands, and body for them, and after judicial process passed and their cause heard, by a decree of their kinsfolk suffered death. Gulussa the son of Masanissa gave intelligence, that at Carthage there was mustering and levying of souldiers, rigging and providing of a fleet, all preparations no doubt for war: and Publius Cornelius Nasica replied again, that nothing was to be done inconsiderately, without advise. Thought good it was to send ten Embassadors, for to see the truth of all, and upon their knowledg to certify. L. Licinius Lucullus and A. Posthumius Albinus the Consuls, when they took musters with severity and rigour, and would not for favour spare any one, but prest all, were committed by the Tribuns of the commons, who for their friends could obtain at their hands no release and immunity of souldiery. By occasion of the wars in Spain, which many times had been untowardly and unfortunatly managed, when the City of Rome was so dismaied and daunted, that there could not be found any one who would so much as accept of a martial Tribunship, or was willing to go in quality of Lieutenant; P. Cornelius Æmylianus stepped forth, made offer and professed, that he would undertake any kind of military service whatsoever should be laid upon him: and by his own example stirred up all the rest to the love of warfare. L. Lucullus the Consul, when Claudius Marcellus (after whom he succeeded) was thought to have quieted all the states and nations of Celtiberia, subdued the Vacceans, Cantabrians, and other regions and nations as yet unknown in Spain. P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus Æmylianus, the son of L. Paulus, and the nephew of Africanus by adoption, being there a martial Colonel, slew a Barbarian challenger that defied him. But in the winning of the City Intercatia, he adventured a more dangerous enterprise: For he was the first of all other that scaled and mounted over the wall. Servius Sulpitius Galba the Preter sped but badly in a battail against the Portugals. When as the Embassadors were returned out of Africk, together with the Carthaginian Orators, and Gulussa the son of Masanissa, bringing word, That they found at Carthage both an army and also an armado; thought good it was, to put to question and debate the matter in the Senat: where Cato and other principal Senators were of opinion and gave advice, to transport an army presently into Africk: but because C. Nasica opined and said, That he saw as yet no just and sufficient cause of war, agreed it was to forbear all hostility and force of arms, in case the Carthaginians would burn their navy and discharge their army: if not, then agreed it was, that the Consuls next following in place of government, should propose as touching the Punick war. When the Theatre was built, which by the Censors had been put forth to no kmen to frame, and set up at a price, through the means of Pub. Cornelius Nasica, who inferred, that it was a peece of work unprofitable, yea, and hurtful to the manners generally of the citizens; by vertue of an act of Senat demolished it was and pulled down; so as the people for a long time stood on their feet to behold the publick plaies. The Carthaginians at that time took arms contrary to the league, and warred upon Masanissa. But vanquished they were in field by him (who notwithstanding he now was fourscore year old and twelve, yet he used to tast his meat simply without any dainty sauce yea, and to chew his bare bread still) and over and besides they deserved to draw upon their head the Roman war.

Of the XLIX. Book.

THe beginning of the third Punick war, in the six hundreth and one year from the Cities foundation, which within 5 years after it began, came to a full and finall end. Much diversity there was in opinion between M. Porcius Cato whom they reputed for the wisest, and Scipio Nasica, who by the Senat was judged the best and honestest man in the City. Cato was altogether for the wars, and advised to destroy Carthage quite: Nasica contrarywise disswaded what he could. Nevertheless, in the end ordained it was. That because against covenant and accord they kept a navy at sea, and had led forth an army out of their borders: also for that they entred into arms and levied war upon Masanissa, a friend and confederat to the people of Rome, and received not into their Town Gulussa his son, who was in the company of the Roman Embassadours; war should be proclaimed against them. But before that any forces were embarked and had taken the sea, the Embassadors of Utica repaired to Rome, yeelding themselves and all that they had. That embassage, as a special presage to the issue and event of the war, was acceptable and pleasing to the Lords of the Senat, but heavy and grievous to the Carthaginians. In Terentum [a place it was in Campus Martius, whereupon the pestimes Terentins took their name] were plates exhibited exhibited to Father Dis the infernal God, according to the direction of the books of Sibylla. These had been set out one hundred years before in the first Punick war, and in the five hundreth year and one, after the City was founded. Thirty Embassadors came to Rome, by whom the Carthaginians presented their submission. But the sentence of Cato imported and prevailed, to hold still their former determination, and that the Consuls with all speed should set forward in their journey to the war. Who having passed the seas and arrived in Affrick, received of them three hundred hostages, whom they had required and demanded; and also took into their hands all their armor and weapons, and what furniture of war soever they found at Carthage. They proceeded moreover after all this, to command them by warrant and authority from the LL. of the Senat to build them a new Town for to inhabit in some other place, so that it were ten miles at least remote from the Sea: by which indignity offered, they provoked the Carthaginians to rise and take arms again. L. Martius and M. Manilius the Consuls, began to besiege and assault Carthage: during which siege and assault, it fortuned that two Colonels unadvisedly adventured to break into the City with their cohorts, at one part thereof where the walls were neglected, and when by the Townsmen they were sore beaten and killed, by the means of Scipio Africanus they were rescued: by whom also a certain sconce and fort of the Romans, which the enemies by night assailed, with the help of a few horsemen was delivered. Moreover, he saved the camp, against which the Carthaginians sallied forth of their City to give the assault at once upon it with all their forces; by which service he above the rest won great honor. Over and besides, when as the Consul (for the other was gone to Rome to hold the election of Magistrats) seeing the siege and assault of Carthage took no better effect, minded to lead the army against Aldrubal, who with another power of men kept the narrow streights of a certain passage, he counselled the said Cos. first, not to give battel in a place of such disadvantage; but afterwards overweighed and born down by the opinions of the greater number (who envied as well his wisedom as vertue) he also entred into the same streights. And when the Roman army, according as he foretold, was discomfited and put to flight, and two cohorts beset round and invested by the enemies, he with certain small cornets of horse returned into those streights, rescued them, and brought them away in safety. Which valour of his, even Cato, (a man otherwise more ready of his tongue to find faults) so recommended in the Senate, that in these terms he gave out and said, * That all the rest who were employed in the wars of Affrick, served as shadows and dead men, but Cato had true vigour and spirit indeed. The people of Rome besides cast such a favour and good liking to him, that at the next election, most of the tribes pricked him for to be Consul, notwithstanding he was by law under age. When L. Scribonius a Tribune of the Commons had promulged a law, That all the Portugals (who according to covenant and composition, yeelded to the people of Rome, and yet by S. Galba were sold in France) should be restored to their freedom; M. Cato most earnestly pleaded in the behalf of that law, and maintained it. His Oration is extant to be seen, included within his Annals. Q. Fulvius Nobilior, albeit he was by him shaken up and well checked in the Senat, answered in the behalf of Galba. Yea, and Galba also, seeing himself at the point to be condemned, took in his arms and embraced his own two sons; being * Prætextati, and a son of C. Sulpitius whose Guardian he was, and made such piteous and ruful mone, all the while he spake in his own cause that the foresaid law was revoked and cancelled. Three Orations of his there are to be seen; two against Libo a Tribune of the Commons and his proposed laws, as touching the Portugals; and one against L. Cornelius Cethegus, in which he confesseth and avoweth the killing of the Portugals encamped neer unto him: for that he knew certainly that they after their manner had sacrificed an horse and a man, and under a colour of peace, intended to set upon and charge his army. Andriscus one of base birth and the most abject lowest condition, who made the world believe that he was King Perseus his son, and thereupon changed his name and was called Philip, having made an escape and fled secretly from Rome (whither Demetrius King of Syria had sent him in regard of this his notorious lie) had many men come flocking unto him, embracing a forged and counterfeit fable of his, as if it had been a true fame and report: by which means he gathered an army together, and either with the good will of the inhabitants, or by force of arms, seized all Macedony and held it in his hands. Now had he devised and framed the pageant in this wise, That Perseus the King had begotten him (forsooth) of a concubine: that he was committed to * one Cyrthesa to be fostered and brought up: to the end that if ought should fall out but well unto the K. in that war which he waged with the Romans, there might be yet some seed as it were and issue remaining of the Kings blood and royal race. When Perseus was deceased, he had his education at Adramyttium until he was 12 years old, supposing him to be his natural father who fostered and kept him, and wist not at all from what stock he was descended. Now it fell out (saith he) that the said foster father of mine lay very sick; and being at the point of death, bewraied at length my birth and parentage. Moreover, that there was a little book given to my supposed mother, sealed with the sign manual of King Perseus which she was to deliver unto me when I came once to ripe age, and to be 14 years old: charging her most streightly of all loves, to conceal the whole matter until that time were come: and when I was grown to that age aforesaid, then the book was given me, wherin mention was made of two chests of treasure left for me by my father. Then the woman, who knew full well that I was no child of hers, but only so reputed, bewraied my birth unto me, who was a fortime ignorant of of mine own descent: also the woman laid great wait upon me to depart out of those quarters before that Eumenes, a professed enemy to Perseus, came to the knowledg thereof, for fear to be murdered. In which respect I being affrighted and hoping withal to find some aid at the hands of Demetrius, went into Syria; and there first I took heart unto me, and dared openly to profess who I was, and never before. [Thus much of Andriscus this counterfet Kings son.]

himself most abstinent and uncorrupt: for of all that wealth, and those goods and ornaments wherewith Corinth was mightily enriched, there came not one parcel into his house. Quintus Cæcilius Metellus triumphed for the conquest of Andriscus, and Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus Æmylianus likewise over Carthage and Asdrubal. Viriatus in Spain, first of an herdman became an hunter, and of a hunter proved to be a very thief and robber: and within a while after, was chosen General of a complete and main army, and seized to his own use all Portugal. He took prisoner M. Vitilius the Pretor, when he had first discomfited his host in the field. After whom C. Plautius the Pretor sped no better in fight. This enemy so terrified the Romans, that to make head against him they found it necessary to employ a full consular army, and a Consul Commander. Moreover, in this book be recorded the trouble of Syria and the wars between the Kings. * Alexander an obscure person and base born, having slain (as is before-said) Demetrius the King, reigned in Syria. Him Demetrius (the son of Demetrius) slew, by the help of Ptolomæus King of Ægypt, whose daughter Cleopatra he had espoused and married. This Demetrius in times past had been sent out of the way into Gnidos by his father, fearing the doubtful chances of the war: and he entred upon this action by occasion of the contemptible sloth and cowardise of the said Alexander. Ptolomeus was grievously wounded in the head: and in the cure, whiles the Chirurgians went about to * trypanize the bones of his skull, died under their hand. And in his stead Ptolomæus his yonger brother who reigned in Cyrenæ, succeeded and took upon him the crown. Demetrius for his cruelty which he excercised upon his people by racking and other torments, was vanquished in battail by Diodorus, one of his own subjects: who made claim to the Kingdom in the right and title of Alexanders son, a yong child hardly two years old: wherupon he fled to Seleucia. Lucius Mummius triumphed over the Acheans, in which solemnity he carried in pompous shew sundry images as well of brass as marble, besides pictures and painted Tables.

Of the LIV. Book.

QUintus Pompeius the Consul subdued the Termestins in Spain: with whom verily as also with the Numantins, by occasion of his infirmity and sickliness, he concluded peace. A review and numbring of the citizens was taken by the Censors: wherein were enrolled four hundred twenty eight thousand, three hundred forty two polls. At what time as the Macedonian Embassadors came to complain of D. Junius Syllanus, the Lord Deputy over them, for that he took their money, and nevertheless made an havock of the Province, and therupon the Senat was willing to have the hearing of their complaints: T. Manlius Torquatus the father of Syllanus, exhibited a request, and obtained, that the inquiry and decision of such a matter as this might be referred over and committed unto him. And after he had sitten upon this commission at home in his own house and found his son guilty, he both condemned him and put him away: nay, when afterwards he had hanged himself, for that was his end, he would not be so much as present at his funeral, but according to his ordinary manner and custome, sat in his house, attending all clients and commers to him for counsel. Q. Fabius the Pro-consul, after he had manged the war in Spain right prosperously, marred all with this foul blot and spot of dishonor, in that he contracted a peace with Viriatus, upon even and equal conditions. This Viriatus by a practise complotted by Servilius Cæpio, was treacherously murdered by traitors, and of his own army wat much bewailed. At his death he was rung out of this world with a notable peal of * farewel, and right honorably enterred: an excellent man, and most brave Captain for the space of thirteen years, during which time he warred with the Romans, and ever for the most part went away with the winning hand.

Of the LV. Book.

WHiles P. Cornelius Nasica, who by way of mockery was surnamed Serapio, by scoffing Curatius a Tribun of the Commons, and D. Iunius Brutus the Consul took the musters, there hapned in the very sight of the new and raw souldier an occurrent of great consequence, and for exemple sake exceeding profitable. For C. Matienus was judicially accused before the Tribuns of the Commons, for that he had abandoned and forsaken his own army in Spain, whereupon he being convict, was condemned and scourged a long while with rods, carrying a fork or cross upon his shoulders, and in the end sold as a slave for a small peece of silver of * three half pence farthing cue. The Tribunes of the Commons, because they might be allowed to exempt from military service ten souldiers apeece, whom it pleased them to chuse, commanded the Consuls to prison. Iun. Brutus the Consul, whiles he was in Spain, endued those souldiers who had served under Viriatus with land and living, and gave them a Town to inhabit called Valentia. M. Popilius, together with his army was foiled and put to the rout by the Numantins, with whom the peace that was concluded, the Senat had passed an act, that it should not stand in force. The occasion was this:

* Sestertio nummo, the fourth part of Denarius.

this: As C. Mancinus the Consul was devoutly sacrificing, the sacred chickens chanced to flie away out of their cage or coop. Afterwards, as he was about to take Sea and go a ship lord for to pass over into Spain, there hapned a voice to be heard, saying, Stay, Stay Mancinus. These proved in the effect to be unfortunat and heavy presages unto Mancinus; for he received an overthrow at the Numantins hands, and was turned clean out of his camp. And seeing no hope else to save his army, he entred into a dishonorable peace with them, but the Senat expresly revoked and annulled the same. 30000 Romans were defeated by 4000 Numantins & no more. D. Iunius made a general conquest of all Portugal, even as far as to the Ocean, by forcing and sacking their Cities and strong Towns: and when his souldiers were loth to pass over the river * Oblivio, he caught up a banner from the port-ensign, and carried it over with him, and by this means perswaded them to go through. Alexanders son, King of Syria, a child not above ten years old at the most, was trecherously murdered by Diodorus his guardian or protector, surnamed Tryphon. There were Physicians by corruption bribed and suborned to give it out and bear the people in hand most falsly, that the yong Prince pined away with the pain of the stone in the bladder, and whiles they would seem to cut him for it, they killed him out of hand in the very section.

* A river in Spain, called sometime Limæa, or Lethe, and at this day Limia.

DEcius Iunius Brutus had good fortune in the farther Province of Spain, fighting with the Gallicians. But M. Æmylius Lepidus Pro-consul sped far otherwise in his wars against the Vaccei, and suffered the like overthrow to that other received from the Numantins. When Mancinus the author and maker of the accord with the Numantins, was delivered up in person to the Numantins, for to assoil the people of Rome, and discharge them in conscience for cancelling the said covenant, they received him not, and would none of him. The people was numbred and taxed by the Censors, in which survey and account taken, there were entred into their books 323000 Roman citizens. Fulvius Flaccus the Cos. brought the Vardeans in Illyricum under subjection. M. Cosconius the Pretor fought in Thracia with the Scordiscians, and won the better. When by the default and error of the Captains and Commanders, the Numantin war continued still, not without the publick shame and dishonor of the state; the Senat and people of Rome conferred the Consulship upon Scipio Africanus, without any suit or seeking of his part. And when he was unwilling to accept thereof, by reason of a law forbidding expresly, * that any man should be created Cos. the second time, he had a dispensation, and was freed from the law in that behalf, like as from the * other in his former Consulship. There was an insurrection of bondslaves arose in Sicily: and when it could not be suppressed by the Pretors and Lord Governors, C. Fulvius had the charge of that Province and service. This war began by occasion of one Eunus a bondslave and a Syrian born; who having assembled together a power of rustical peasants and country slaves, broken prisons and houses of correction, came to have a full and complete army. Moreover, Cleon also another notable slave, raised to the number of 70000 villains like himself: and they both joyning their forces together, waged war many times against the people of Rome and their army in those parts.

* The text is here corrupt, for there were 12 years between this time and his former Consulship, & therefore it is not meant, de lege Decennali, but of another law lately made, ne quis iterum Consul fieret, and according to the place corrected by Sigonius I have translated it. [* lege annali.]

Of the LVII. Book.

SCipio Africanus laid siege to Numantia: and whereas the army was grown to be corrupted through lewd ssolute riot and loose life, he reclaimed the same, and reduced it unto a most streight and severe kind of military discipline. For he cut off all the means and occasions of delight some pleasures: he sent packing away two thousand whores and trulls that followed the camp: he held the souldiers hard to work every day: he forced each one to carry on his shoulders corn for thirty dayes, and seven good stakes besides for a pallisado. If he spied one of them to go heavily under his load; he would say thus under him, Sirrha, when you have the skill to empale your self with your swords point, then cease to carry pales, but not before. When he saw another practise to wield very nimbly a little light buckler, he commanded him to bear a targuet of a bigger size and weightier than ordinary, as finding fault that he knew better how to hold his shield for defence of his own body, than to handle his sword for offence of the enemy. Met he with a souldier out of his rank and file? If he were a Roman, up he went and was well beat and swadled with vine-wands by the centurion; if a stranger, swinged and jerked he was with [birchen] * rods by the Lictors. And verily all the pack-horses and other labouring beasts he caused to be sold; because they should not ease the souldiers of their cariage. Well, many a time he bare himself worthily in fight, and had a fortunat hand against the enemies that sallied forth against him. The Vacceans were streightly besieged: and after they had killed their wives and children, they slew their own selves upon them. Scipio, at what time as Antiochus King of Syria had sent unto him most rich and stately presents: whereas other Generals of the field were wont to conceal the gifts of KK. he avowed the accepting of them in open sight of all men, even at the very Tribunal seat. And when he had so done, he commanded the treasurer to receive all, and enter in his book of receits for the state; promising out of that stock to reward the hardiest men and most valiant knights. When he had blocked and invested Numantia on every side, and saw the enemies driven to great distress for hunger, he forbad expresly to kill any of them that went forth of the Town to forage and purvey victuals, saying, That the more they were in number, the sooner they would consume and spend up the corn which they had.

TIberius Sempronius Gracchus a Tribune of the Commons, when he promulged an Agrarian law, that no man ſhould hold and occupy above *five hundred arpens or acres of the City lands ſeeing the Senat and order of Gentlemen to ſtorm againſt it, grew into ſuch an heat of choler and furious rage, that preſently by an act made, he deprived of Tribunitian power M. Afterwards, when there fell out to be leſs ground than could be divided, he proteſted that without the offence of the common people (becauſe erewhile he had ſtirred up their appetite to hope for great matters) he would prefer a law, That amongſt all them, who by vertue of the law* Sempronia ought to receive lands, the money which belonged ſometime to King Attalus ſhould be divided. When Carbo, a Tribune of the Com. propoſed a bill, that it might be lawful to create the ſame man Trib. of the Commons ſo often as one would; P. ## Of the LXXIV. Book.

CNeus Pompeius discomfited the Picents in battell and held them besieged: for which victory the embroidered purple robes, with other ornaments and badges of the Magistrats were taken up again and put on. C. Marius fought against the Marsians with doubtfull event. The Libertins then and never before, began to serve in the wars. Aurel. Plotius the lieutenant, in a battell overcame the Umbrians: likewise L. Porcius the Prætor vanquished the Marsians, when as both these nations had rebelled. Nicomedes was placed again in the kingdom of Bithynia, and Ariobazanes of Cappadocia. Cn. Pompeius the Cos. overthrew the Marsians in a pitcht field. When the City was deeply engaged and plunged in debt, A. Sempronius Asellus the Prætor, because he gave sentence respectively in the favour of the debtors, was slain in the market-place by their creditors the Usurers. Moreover, this book relateth the inrodes and invasions of the Thracians into Macedony, together with their wasting of those parts.

Of the LXXV. Book.

AUl. Posthumius Albinus a lieutenant General, being Admiral of the fleet, was upon an infamous imputation of betraying his souldiers massacred by his own army. L. Corn. Sylla, a lieutenant, overthrew the Samnits in fight, and won two camps of theirs. Cn. Pompeius received the Vestins upon their submission. L. Porcius the Cos. after fortunate success in battell, and that he had sundry times discomfited the Samnits, as he assaied to force their camp lost his life; which accident gave away the victory of that battell to the enemy. Cosconius and Luceius overcame the Samnits in battell, slew Marius Egnatius, a most noble and renowned commander of the enemies, and had many of their towns surrendred up into their hands. L. Sylla tamed the Hirpins, and defeated the Samnits in many battels; and certain States submitted unto him: who having atchieved so worthy and brave exploits before his Consulship (as seldome any other man besides, the like) repaired to Rome for to sue to be Consul.

Of the LXXVI. Book.

AUlus Gabinius a lieutenant, having fought fortunatly against the Lucans, and won from them many towns: as he laid siege to the enemies leaguer, was cut off and slain. Sulpitius in quality of lieutenant had the execution of the Marrucins, and the surrender of that whole nation. Cn. Pompeius the Pro-Consul took the submission of the Vestins and Pelignians. The Marsians likewise having been in certain battels quelled by L. Muræna, and Cæcilius Pinna lieutenants, craved peace. Asculum was won by Cn. Pompeius: and the Italian people by Mamercus Æmylius the lieutenant were put to the sword. Silo Popedius, General of the Marsians, and the author of the villany, was slain in battell. Ariobarzanes of Cappadocia, and Nicomedes of Bithynia were driven both out of their kingdoms by Mithridates King of Pontus. Last of all, this book discourseth of the incursions and spoil that the Thracians made in Macedony.

Of the LXXVII. Book.

WHen P. Sulpitius a Tribune of the Commons, by the advice and instigation of C. Marius had promulged certain pernicious laws. That the banished should be restored, and new Citizens together with Libertins be sorted into Tribes: also that Marius should be chosen General against Mithridates King of Pontus: and when he offered violence against Q. Pompeius and L. Sylla the Consuls, who contradicted his proceedings; and had slain the son of Pompeius the Consul, who had married Sylla's daughter: then L. Sylla Consul entred Rome with an army, and within the very City fought against the adverse side of Sulpitius and Marius, and drave them forth: of which faction twelve were by the Senat judged enemies, and amongst them C. Marius both father and son. As for P. Sulpitius, when he lurked in a certain farm-house of the country, was bewraied and betraied by his own bond-servant: and so pulled forth from thence and killed. The slave, because he might seem to be rewarded for revealing his Master according to promise, was manumised and set free: but for his wicked treachery in betraying his own Master, he was thrown down the rock Tarpeia. C. Marius the son crossed the seas into Africk. C. Marius the father lay hidden amongst the marshes of the Minturnians, and was plucked out from thence by the townsmen: and when a certain bondslave, and a Frenchman born, was sent to kill him, he was so affrighted at the Majesty and countenance of so brave a man, that he went back and would not do the feat: whereupon Marius was embarked at the charges of the City, and carried into Affrick. L. Sylla reformed the State of the City, and drew out from thence inhabitants to people the Colonies. Q. Pompeius the Cos. took his journey to receive the army of Cn. Pompeius the Cos. and by his counsell was slain. Mithridates King of Pontus seized upon Bithynia and Cappadocia; drave out Aquilus the lieutenant, and with a mighty army invaded Phrygia the Province of the people of Rome.

MIthridates held Asia with his garrisons; he cast into prison Q. Oppius the Pro-Consul, and likewise Aquilius the lieutenant. Also by his commandment, all the Roman Citizens to be found in Asia, were in one day massacred. The City Rhodes, which only continued true and kept allegeance, he assailed, but being in certain battels at sea overcome, he gave over and retired. Archelaus a chief governor and commander under the King, entred Greece with an army, seized upon Athens and held it. Moreover, this book containeth the fearfull troubles of certain Cities and Islands: whiles the Inhabitants endeavoured to draw their states, some to side with the King; others, to take part with the Romans.

Of the LXXXIV. Book.

SYlla returned this answer unto the Embassadors sent unto him from the Senat, That he would be ordered by them, in case those Citizens who (upon the hard usage of Cinna) fled unto him, might be restored. The Senat thought this a reasonable condition and just demand: but by means of Carbo and that faction, who made reckoning that war would be more commodious unto them, there ensued no greement and accord. The same Carbo when he was minded to exact hostages of all the towns and colonies of Italy, thereby to bind them upon their allegeance against Sylla, was by a generall consent of the Senat crossed and inhibited. The new enfranchised Citizens, by vertue of an act by the Senat granted, were allowed the priviledges of their suffrages and voices. Q. Metellus Pius, who had sided with the nobility, whiles he levied war in Affrick, was by C. Fabius the Prætor discomfited: and by the faction of Carbo and those that followed the part of Marius, an act of Senat passed, That all armies and forces whersoever should be cassed and discharged. The Libertins were distributed indifferently throughout the five and thirty tribes. Besides all this, here is specified the preparation of war which was rased against Sylla.

Of the LXXXV. Book.

SYlla crossed the seas with an army over into Italy: and when those Embassadors which he sent to treat for peace were by the Consul C. Norbanus evill entreated, he overcame the said Norbanus in a battell. And when he was about to assail the camp of L. Scipio the other Consul, with whom he had travelled and assaied all means to conclude peace, and could not compass it: the whole army of the Consul in generall, being sollicited by Souldiers whom Sylla had sent out under-hand to that purpose, turned their ensigns unto him, and followed his standard. Scipio, when he might have been killed was let go. Cn. Pompeius, the son of that Cneus who won Asculum, enrolled an army of voluntaries, and came unto Sylla with three legions: unto whom also the nobility all and whole ranged themselves; so as abandoning the City they repaired to the camp. Finally, in this book report is made of the expeditions performed by Captains of both sides throughout all Italy.

Of the LXXXVI. Book.

THat year wherein C. Marius (the son of C. Marius) was by forcible means and strong hand created Consul before he was twenty years of age; C. Fabius in Affrick was burnt quick in his own pavilion for his bloudy cruelty and greedy avarice. L. Philippus, lieutenant unto Sylla, seized Sardinia, after he had discomfited and slain Q. Antonius the Prætor. Sylla contracted a leagne with the states of Italy, to put them out of fear that he would not bereave them of their freedom of Rome and liberty of suffrages lately granted unto them. In like manner, upon assured confidence (that he had already) of undoubted victory, he commanded all those that were in suite and resorted unto him for jurisdiction, to adjourn their apparance in Court, and to appear at Rome. Whiles the City yet was divided and distracted two wares, L. Damasippus the Prætor, having according to the will and pleasure of C. Marius the Cos. gathered the Senat together, massacred all the nobility of the City. Out of which number Q. Mutius Scævola the arch-Pontifex, as he fled was in the very porch and entry of Vestans Temple murdered. Besides, this book containeth the war renewed by L. Muræna against Mithridates in Asia.

Of the LXXXVII. Book.

SYlla after he had discomfited and overthrown the army of C. Marius, near a place called Sacriportus, besieged him within the town Prænestе. The City of Rome he recovered out of the hands of his enemies: and when Marius made an offer to sally forth, he repelled him. Moreover, this book containeth the exploits atchieved by his lieutenants, with the like fortune of that side in all places.

Of the LXXXVIII. Book.

SYlla after that he had defeated and put to the sword the army of Carbo at Clusium, Faventia, and Fidentia, chased him forth of Italy. With the Samnits, who alone of all the Italian nations had not yet laid down arms, he fought one finall battell, and vanquished them near the City of Rome, even before the gate Collina: and thus having recovered and got into his hand the absolute managing of the state, he polluted and stain'd this most goodly and beautifull victory with the foulest cruelty that ever man committed. He cut the throats of 8000 in the great hostilry called Villa Publica, even those that had yielded themselves. He set up the table of proscription and outlawry. The City of Rome and all Italy throughout filled with massacres. Among the rest he caused all the Prenestins, disarmed as they were, to be slain. Marius, a Senator by calling, he killed in this manner, by breaking his arms and legs, by cropping his ears, and digging out his eyes. C. Marius besieged within Prænestе by Lucretius Asella and that side with Sylla; when he sought means of evasion by a mine under the ground, seeing how he was environed by the army, slew himself within the said mine: for perceiving that he could not escape, he and Pontius Telesinus, that accompanied him in this flight, ran one at the other with their drawn naked swords: and when he had killed him, and was himself hurt, he found so much kindnest at his slaves hands as to make an end of him quite.

Of the LXXXIX. Book.

LUcius Butus sent from Cn. Papyrius Carbo, who was arrived at Corcyra in a fisher boat to Lilybæum, in espiall to see whether Pompey were there: being compassed and hemmed in round about by those vessels which Pompey had sent out, turned his swords point to his body, and set the pommell against a seat within the boat and so bending forward with the poise of his body was pierced through and died. Cn. Pompeius sent by the Senat with full commission of rule and command took Cn. Carbo prisoner, who was arrived in the Islands Cossura and slew him, who kept a puling and weeping, like a woman, when he should die. Sylla became Dictator, and that which never any man had done besides him, kept his port abroad with 24 Ushers or Lictors going before him with their rods and axes. He altered the State, a nd in that innovation eſtabliſhed it. The Tribunes of the Commons he abridged of their authority, and wholly deprived them of their power to prefer and eſtabliſh laws. The Colledg of the Pomifies and Augurs he amplified and augmented, to the number of 15. The body of the Senat he ſupplied out of the order of Gentlemen. The children of thoſe whom he had proſcribed and outlawed he diſabled for being elegible to any honourable office, and of their goods made port-ſale, whereof at firſt he ſeized much by violence and had it away. A mighty maſs of money he raiſed thereof, amounting to * a hundred and fifty millions of Seſterces. He commanded Q. Lucretius Oſella to be killed in the very Forum of Rome, for that he preſumed without his leave and licence to ſue for a Conſulſhip: and when the people of Rome were highly offended at this indignity, he aſſembled them to a publike audience, and before them avowed the fact and took it upon him. Cn. Pompeius in Affrick vanquiſhed and ſlew in battell Cn. Domitius, one of the proſcript outlaws: and Hiarbas *King of the Numidians, who prepared to levy war. When there passed an act of the Senat, that one or other without fail should be employed to succeed Cæsar, M.Antonius and Qu.Cassius, two other Tribunes (for that by their negative and inhibitions they seemed to cross and stay that act) were expelled the City: and a commission was directed by the Senat to the Consuls, and to Cn.Pompeius, in this form, To see that the Common-weal sustained no damage. C.Cæsar intending to persecute his adversary, came with his army into Italy. Corfinius together with L.Domitius and L.Lentulus he took prisoners, and let them go again: but Cn.Pompeius, and the rest of that side he utterly chased forth of Italy.

Of the CX. Book.

CAius Cæsar besieged Massiles, which had shut the gates against him: who leaving C.Trebonius and D.Brutus at the siege, took a journey into Spain, where he received upon submission Lu.Afranius and C.Petreius, two lieutenants of Pompeius, together with seven legions at * Ilerda, and dismissed them all with no harm done unto them. Varro also a lieutenant of Pompeius, together with his army came under his obeisance. The Gaditans he enfranchised and gave the City unto. The Massilians after two overthrows in sea-fight, and a long siege which they had endured, submitted at last and were at the devotion of Cæsar. C.Antonius a lieutenant of Cæsar fought an unfortunat battel against the Pompeians, and in Illyricum was taken prisoner: during which war, the inhabitants of * Opitergium, beyond the river of Padus (who were the auxiliaries of Cæsar) seeing their chained bridge of boats and lighters locked up and fast shut within the enemies ships, rather than they would fall into the hands of their enemies, ran one upon another, and died every one. C.Curio, a lieutenant of Cæsar in Affrick, after he had fought against Varus a captain of the Pompeians, was together with his army defeated, and cut in peeces by Juba King of * Mauritania. CAius Cæcilius Rufus the Prætor going about to raise commotions and seditions all that ever he could within the City, and having sollicited the commons upon the hope of cancelling all debt-books, was first deposed from his Magistracy, and after driven out of the City. Then he banded with Milo a banished person, who had levied a power of fugitive outlaws: but both of them in this preparation of war came short of their purpose and were slain. Cleopatra queen of Ægypt was by her brother Ptolomæus expelled out of her kingdom. By reason of the avarice and cruelty of Q. Catulus the Prætor, the * Cordubians in Spain, together with two Varian legions, revolted from Cæsar and his side. Cn.Pompeius was besieged by Cæsar at Brundusium: but having won his sconces with the guards thereto belonging, and that with great loss of the adverse part, he was delivered from the siege. But after the war was translated into Thessaly, he was at Pharsalia in a battel overthrown. There remained still within the camp Cicero, a man by nature framed for nothing more unfit than war. Cæsar pardoned all those of the adverse part, who after his victory submitted themselves to his mercy.

Of the CXII. Book.

HErein is related the fearful condition of that side which was vanquished, and how they fled in sundry parts of the world. Cn.Pompeius being arrived in Ægypt, by the commandment of Ptolomeus the King, as yet an infant under age; and perswasion of Theodorus his teacher and schoolmaster, who might of all other over-rule the K. most; also of one Photinus, was killed by the hands of Achilla, one who had a warrant to execute that feat, even in the very barge before he was landed. But Cornelia his wife and Sextus Pompeius his son fled back into Cyprus. Cæsar three daies after the foresaid victory, pursued Pompeius: and when Theodorus presented unto him his head and signet of his finger, he was displeased in his heart and wept withall. He entred Alexandria without any danger, notwithstanding the troubles and hurliburly therein. Cæsar was created Dictator. He restored Cleopatra unto the kingdom of Ægypt: and when Ptolomæus made war by their advice and counsell who moved him to murder Pompeius, Cæsar vanquished him, with great perill and hazard of himself. As Ptolomæus fled, his vessell wherein he was embarked ran a ground in Nilus, and there stuck fast. Besides, this book sheweth the painfull and toilsome journey of Marcus Cato with his legions, in Affrick through the desart wilderness: and the war which Cn.Domitius fortunatly managed against Phaartes the Parthian King.

Of the CXIII. Book.

WHen the side of Pompeius had gathered heart and strength in Affrick, the soveraign command thereof was committed to P.Scipio: for Mato who before had equall power and commission with him gave place and yielded his right. Now when it was debated in counsel as touching the subversion and utter ruin of Utica, for that the City was so enclined and favourable to Cæsar: whiles M. Cato stood stiffly in this point, that it should not be destroyed; and Juba [the K.] was earnest to have it rased: the guard and keeping thereof was committed unto Cato. The son of Pompey the great, having levied forces in Spain (the conduct and leading whereof, neither Afranius nor Petreius were willing to undertake) made fresh war upon Cæsar. ## To the Reader.

THe hiſtory of Titus Livius, as it was by him paſſing well penned otherwiſe, and none thereto in Latine comparable: ſo in the calculation and date of times, which they call Chronology (a ſingular light to give direction in a ſtory) he is ſomewhat defective and unlike himſelf, ſo as he cannot be praiſed without exception. But if a man conſider the huge volumes which he wrote, and namely, in his declining age; the variety and diſagreement of former authors, whom he followed, who before him faulted alſo in this point, and whereof he much complaineth; he is to be pitied and pardoned, if his memory failed ſomewhat in this behalf. For where ſhall we find a man that is ἄπαντα σοφὸς, omnique ex parte beatus? And indeed, if we weigh the thing aright, as it was a profeſſion by it ſelf, and required a whole man: ſo many travelled therein alone, and they that performed well but it only, deſerved high thanks and commendation. And to let many others paſs, how worthily is T. Pomponius Atticus praiſed by Cicero his friend, for digeſting the head Magiſtrates of 700 years in one book? As for Verrius Flaccus, who lived in the time of Auguſtus Cæſar, he collected a catalogue and regiſter of the chief Rulers of Rome, how they were choſen ſucceſſively, and how they governed from time to time: which as he cauſed to be cut and engraven in a marble wall within the Capitol for a perpetuall memory to poſterity: ſo thereby he deſerved alſo to have his own ſtatue erected near the Temple of Veſta, for an everlaſting memoriall of ſo great a benefit. But what is there ſo durable, that time waſteth not? What ſo conſpicuous and evident, but troubleſome daies may overwhelm and hide in oblivion? Thus amidſt that havock which the Goths and Vandals made in Italy, there remained not one fourth part extant of Livies ſtory: thus in that generall confuſion of Rome, theſe records of Verrius Flaccus were defaced, broken, and buried deep under the ruins of the Capitoll and other ſtately edifices. But the revolution of times, as it hath brought to light again ſome reliques of Livy; ſo it hath diſcovered alſo thoſe marbles of Verrius: for in the time of Paul the third, Pope of Rome, the fragments of the ſaid ſtones were digged out of the ground between the Roman Forum and the broad ſtreet Via Sacra; brought forth alſo & laid abroad in the Capitol to the view of the world. To which, as the true touch-ſtone certain learned men of late daies have laid to their own labors in that kind, namely, Bartholomew Marlian of Millain, Onuphrius Panvinius of Verona, Charles Sigonius of Modena, and Francis Robertellus of * Udine: and comparing the ſame as alſo the annals gathered by Henry Glareanus before time, with the foreſaid antiquities of Verrius late found, have recovered much light to the hiſtory of Livy, and ſupplied his wants in that behalf. I thought it not amiſs therefore to gratifie my countrimen in ſome meaſure this way alſo, and deliver the ſame in Engliſh which I found annexed to the beſt editions in Latine, as followeth.

A CHRONOLOGIE TO THE HISTORY OF TITUS LIVIUS,

Compiled according to the Tables and Records of Verrius Flaccus in the Capitoll, and ſet out with moſt profitable Notes, ſhewing the variety and diſagreement of Authors about the names of the Roman Conſuls.

The cauſes of diſſent and repugnance in Hiſtoriographers, as touching the computation and relating of the years from the foundation of the City of Rome.

Since we intend to ſet forth a Kalender or Regiſter of the Conſuls mentioned in the Hiſtory of Livius, which by reaſon of uncertainty, obſcurity, and diſcordance of the times, is ſo dark and intricate, that not only the learned and moſt experienced Hiſtorians of our age, but the beſt writers of the Roman ſtory in ancient time very often complained thereof; we think it not impertinent to our purpoſe, briefly to ſearch into the cauſes of this diſſent: which being once known, we may follow that account of the times, which ſeemeth to accord beſt with the Hiſtoricall truth, and to be grounded upon the authority and teſtimony of the moſt authenticall and approved writers. For ſeeing that an Hiſtory (as Cicero hath moſt truly ſaid) is the witneſs of times; what is more unfitting for it, than to miſs and want that which is the chiefeſt point therein, and without due and diligent reckoning made, to be ignorant what was firſt and what was laſt done? It ſeemeth therefore, that of this diverſity in the account and computation of the Roman Conſuls, there be three eſpeciall cauſes.

The firſt is, for that the year in which the firſt Conſuls entred into that Magiſtracy, is by the Roman Hiſtoriographers, not after one ſort but diverſly ſet down. For Dionyſius (a moſt diligent writer of the Acts of Romans) in his firſt book, in the end of the fourth and beginning of the fifth, reporteth, that the KK. reigned 244 years: which alſo is collected out of the yearly computation gathered by Varro and approved by the authority of others. For Meſſala reporteth, how upon the expulſion of the KK. which hapned in the 244 year after the foundation of the City, the Romans were ruled under the yearly government of Conſuls. To which opinion Livy alſo ſubſcribeth in the end of his firſt book, ſaying, that the regiment of KK. continued 244 years from the foundation of the City, unto the freedom and liberty thereof. But Eutropius in his firſt book writeth that the ſeven Kings reigned in Rome 243 years: which account agreeth with Sex. Ruffus in his abridgment. In which variety this is to be obſerved, that theſe two laſt named, reckon the years only of every Kings raign, and out of the whole and groſs ſum leave out the year of the interreign, which Dionyſius, Livius, Meſſala, and the reſt inſert between, and that right truly and upon good reaſon: for after the death of Romulus, the interreign continued one year. Conſider then and examine the thing diligently, and ye ſhall find, that in reckoning the years of every Kings reign in ſeverall, Eutropius and Sextus Ruffus both, attribute as many years to the Kings government, as Denis. Livy, and the reſt: ſo that this difference is not much. But others there be (as Euſebius hath delivered in his Chronicles) who write, that the KK. reigned but 243 years, and take the interregency withall: whoſe judgment, Oroſius, Iornandes, and Bede ſeem to follow. For Oroſius in the fift chapter of his ſecond book recordeth, that Brutus the Conſul in that very year, namely the 244, put his own ſons to death. The Kings reigned not preciſely ſo many years juſt, but, for that ſome (and namely, Romulus) went over ſome months and daies, Dionyſius and Livius reckoned them for a full year, and laid it to Tarquinius Priſcus: but the other above-named, together with Euſebius, left out thoſe odd months and daies (becauſe they made not up a compleat year) and aſſigned but only ſeven and thirty years to the reign of King Priſcus. To this may be added another reaſon of the like nature: namely, that as divers authors have doubtfully reported the year, ſo they are no more certain of the month and day on which the firſt Conſuls began their government. For Plutarch in his Problems writeth, that they entred upon the firſt day of January: but Macrobius in the firſt book of his Saturnalia and ſeventh chapter, ſeemeth to imply that they took their Conſuls place the firſt of June, ſaying, (according to the opinion of others) That June took the name of Junius Brutus: for that in this month, and namely, upon the firſt day thereof (according to a vow whereto he was obliged by the baniſhment of Tarquin) he ſolemnized a ſacrifice to the goddeſs Carnea upon mount Cœlius.

Othres

Others again write, how this hapned the 24 of February; grounding herein upon the old antiquities and records of ſtone, together with the teſtimony of Ovid, who in the ſecond book of his Kalender thus writeth:

King Tarquin with his ſons then fled: The Conſuls yearly bear
The ſoveraign rule at Rome: ſince that, no King ever raign'd there.

Some there are beſides of opinion, that they entred the firſt day of July: and of their mind ſeemeth Joachimus Perionius to be, in his third book of the Greek Magiſtrates. In this repugnancy therefore of opinions, very doubtfull it is which to follow. As for that of Plutarch, it hath long ſince been clearly and learnedly confuted by two great and excellent clarks, Onuphrius Panvinius, and Sigonius: ſince it is plain that it was the ſix hundred year from the foundation of the City, and not before, that the Conſuls began their government the firſt of January. But in ſetting down the certain day, they themſelves are not well agreed. For Sigonius after Marlianus inclineth this way and ſaith, That the firſt day of the Conſuls government was the ſix and twentieth day of May. But Panvinius thinketh that the firſt Conſuls were created the 26 day of February. And this diverſity is found not only in the day when the firſt Conſuls took their government, but alſo in the time after enſuing. What was the uſuall day of any month whereon the Conſuls were wont to begin their Magiſtracy, a man can hardly find any certainty before the ſix hundred year from the Cities foundation. In the four and fortieth year verily after the Kings were exiled the firſt day of July, as Livy writeth, was the ordinary day for yearly Magiſtrates to take their place: but how many years following, that order continued, or at what time it was changed, he ſhewed not before he come to the three hundred and two year, and then he ſaith in his third book, That the thirteenth of May was the ordinary day for Magiſtrates to begin their government. Thus much at leaſtwiſe we may collect by him (when he ſaith that this time was ſolemn) that he meant not two or three years only, but many. For that is properly called ſolemn, which is by law uſually obſerved. Again, we read a little after the beginning of the fift book, that this time alſo was altered: for whereas the fift day of December was the uſuall time that Magiſtrates began to execute their office, he ſaith, that it was changed, in theſe words, The principall Nobles and Lords of the Senat, were it upon the default or the inſortunity of their Generals (that ſo ſhameſull an overthrow was received) opined and adviſed, not to expect and ſtay for the ordinary time of the election, but preſently to create new military Tribunes in Conſuls authority, who ſhould enter into their government the firſt day of October, &c. Which opinion of theirs imported, and the whole houſe accorded to it: whereupon the other Tribunes gainſaid it. But Sergius and Virginius withſtood this Act of the Senat, and denied flatly to reſign up their dignity before the eleventh of December, the ordinary day of taking their oath and beginning their Magiſtracy. And a little after, within one page, he ſheweth that the uſuall day of entrance into government was altered from the eleventh of December to the firſt of September, ſaying, When this ſpeech was received with a generall applauſe of all men, and that the Nobles and Lords of the Senat &c. But this day was kept but a few years. For about ſix years after, he ſaith, by occaſion that both Conſuls lay ſick, it was ordained that the firſt of July ſhould be the ordinary day. And this alſo I find was changed to another, whatſoever it was, for named it is not; and therefore uncertain. But this hapned in the four hundred and thirteenth year after the Cities foundation: as Livy about the beginning of the eighth book ſheweth in theſe words; And when the Conſuls were commanded to reſign up their Magiſtracy before the time, to the end that new Conſuls might the ſooner be created, againſt ſo great troubles of war, &c. For in theſe words [The ſooner, &c.] he declareth that the uſuall day of entier into government was then changed. But as it is not certainly ſet down what day this was; ſo the other was as well known: for ſoon after, and namely, the eighth year following it was appointed, to wit, the firſt day of July. Immediatly therefore (quoth he) the new Conſuls, L. Æmylius Mamercus, and Cn. Plautius were enjoyned that day (even the firſt of July) on which they began their office, to agree and part between themſelves their Provinces. As for the month, wherein for the moſt part the aſſembly for election of Magiſtrates was holden, we read it was February; like as the thirteenth of March was ordinary for them to begin their government. For this day held alwaies, during the ſecond Punick war and the Macedonian, and longer than ſo. Thus Livy teſtifieth in many places (which to quote is needleſs) as in the ſixt book of the ſecond Punick war, and in the beginning of the firſt book as touching the Macedonian. By which, who ſeeth not that there is great variety in the month and day both, whereupon the Magiſtrates were wont to begin their rule? But whereas all the certainty in computation and account of the time dependeth upon a preciſe, exact, firm, and ſetled reckoning of years, months, and daies; and ſeeing that in Livies ſtory it is neither expreſly ſhewed, what year, month or day the Magiſtrates began their government, nor preciſely noted when the reckoning altered; conſidering alſo that nothing therein is more wavering and inconſtantly delivered than the very uſuall day of entring into Magiſtracy: what marvel is there, if authors diſſent ſo much about the computation of the times? whiles one beginneth at this month, another at that: whiles ſome, I ſay, aſcribe theſe Magiſtrates created to this year, others attribute the ſame to another?

Thirdly, there being great difference between Dionyſius and Livy, as well about the reckoning of the times and years, as the acts and affairs that therein paſſed; all ſeemeth to have riſen hereupon, that the purpoſe of Livy was not to deliver exactly the acts and occurrents of greateſt antiquity which hapned in the State of the people of Rome, and which by many writers aforetime had been moſt diligently ſet down and penned to poſterity: but to record and write thoſe things eſpecially, which from the time a little before the ſecond Punick war had been atchieved by the people of Rome unto the age wherein himſelf lived. But becauſe (as Polybius moſt wiſely and pithily writeth) a generall ſtory cannot be underſtood by particular regiſters; and for that an Hiſtoriographers ſtudy & endeavour ought to be employed rather in an univerſall treatiſe, than in particular diſcourſes: therefore, leſt ſo great a piece of work as his, wanting a beginning, ſhould ſeem maimed & unperfect; in the formoſt 20 books he ſlightly & briefly ran over the deeds of the people of Rome from the fouudation of the City, unto the beginning of the ſecond Punick war. But Dionyſius profeſſing purpoſely to deſcribe the ancient monuments of the Romans, thought it his part to overpaſs and omit nothing worthy of remembrance, but moſt curiouſly and exactly hath delivered all things pertinent, either to the calculation of the times or diſcourſe of affairs, inſomuch as thoſe things whereof Livy hath ſcantly made 3 books, he hath declared at large in eleven. Hereupon if a man read in Dionyſius, the ancient beginning and originall of the Roman Empire, and examine well the times how they are by him digeſted & compare the ſame with the brevity in Livy, no doubt he will prefer the diligence of the former before the overhaſtineſs of the later. But if the indifferent reader conſider the purpoſe and intent of them both, he will yield unto either of them their due praiſe; & whereas Livy making haſte to other matters, hath either let paſs or more ſlightly handled ſome things, he will judge him worthy rather to be excuſed than reproved for it.

To theſe three cauſes above rehearſed, others alſo might be adjoyned; namely, the ordering of the years by Romulus, and the variety as touching that year wherein Rome was founded: but it may ſuffice only to touch theſe & point unto them with the finger. Howbeit, this we think good to advertiſe and admoniſh the reader by the way; that albeit in the digeſting and reckoning of the Conſſ. we have ſet before our eyes to follow the marble tables and monuments of Verrius Flaccus, and according thereunto have framed and applied the computation of the years: yet that year before the 250 as alſo the other, which Verrius rejected, we have inſerted with the reſt, that our account might fall out juſt with the ſum of the years, as they are collected by Varro. Which, before us, Onuphrius Panvinius a moſt learned man hath done in his Kalender, thinking that the year which Verrius and they that followed him raſed out was the 423. and therefore he hath put it to the reſt without Conſuls, according to the Capitoline records.

Of the computation of times uſually obſerved by the Romans, and of the year of the Cities foundation.

THe calculation of years was taken and obſerved by men in old time divers and ſundry waies. The Achæans (as we read) received it from the revolution of the ſtars: the Argives from their women Prieſts; as for example, if Chryſis ſuch a year were chief Prieſt to offer ſacrifices, they counted the number of years from the ſaid Chryſis. But many have derived and fetched the courſe and conſequence of their acts and affairs, from the years before Troy was built, or elſe after the winning thereof. Howbeit, from the 408 year after the captivity thereof, by occaſion of the Olympian games, which Hercules firſt inſtituted in the honour of his great grandſire by the mothers ſide and which by his ſon Iphiclus (or Iphitus, as ſome will have it) were renewed that year: from that time (I ſay) they began to number the years by the Olympiads, eſpecially among the Grecians, whoſe ſtory (as Euſebius affirmeth) is not of any credit but from the time of the firſt Olympias. The Hebrews (like as other nations in the Eaſt) received the denomination and reckoning of the years from their KK. The Athenians, from their Eponymi (as they called them) but that in their Archareſiæ, [that is the election of their Magiſtrates] which were wont to hold for certain daies about the beginning of the year, they counted in this wiſe, ἐπὶ πρώτης πρυτανείας τῇ δεκάτῃ ἢ ἑνδεκάτῃ, i.e. the tenth or eleventh of the firſt Prytaneia. And hereof it ſeemeth, that the name cometh τῷ ἐπωνύμῳ; as if from thence, their acts received both the time and alſo the name. After the example of the Athenians and others, the Romans reckoned their daies, made their Kalender, and regiſtred their acts by ſuch and ſuch Conſuls; noting thereto otherwhiles the year from the Cities foundation. But about it there is much more diverſity in authors, than about that wherein the firſt Conſuls took their government. And ſeeing the clearing and declaration of that point is not impertinent to this place, briefly we will rehearſe the opinions of authors as touching the time when the City of Rome was founded.

To begin therefore at them, who (according to the common received opinion of others) have written longer ago and further off, Timæus Siculus (I know not upon what reaſon induced) hath recorded, how the City was built by Romulus much about the time that Carthage in Affrick by the Tyrians, namely, in the 38 year before the firſt Olympias.

L. Cincius (a Senator of Rome by calling) ſaith it was in the fourth year of the twelfth Olympias.

Q. Fabius Pictor (a moſt ancient writer of the Roman ſtory and of greateſt credit) attributeth it to the firſt year of the eight Olympias.

Polybius Megapolitanus, and Diodorus Siculus quote the ſecond year of the 7 Olympias.

Appollodorus, Q. Lutatius Catulus, C. Cornelius Nepos, Eratoſthenes, M. Porcius Cato, Dionyſius Halicarnaſſæus, and Theophilus Antiochenus name the firſt year of the 7 Olympias.

M. Verrius Flaccus (the avoucher of the Capitoline ſtone-records) T. Livius, C. Julius Solinus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and others, will have it to be the fourth year of the 6 Olympias.

L. Taruntius

L. Taruntius Firmanus, M. Terentius Varro, T. Pomponius Atticus, M. Tullius Cicero, Auguſtus Cæſar, C. Plinius Secundus, Plutarchus Chæronæus, Domitianus Cæſar Auguſtus, P. Cornel. Tacitus. Caſſius Dio, A. Gellius, L. Septimius Severus Auguſtus Cenſorinus, M. Julius Philippus Auguſtus. Euſebius Pamphil. Cæſarienſis, Eutropius, Paulus Oroſius, Paulus Diaconus Longobardus: and after the time of C. Cæſar Dictator, the common opinion of the people of Rome (which we alſo go by) will have the City to be founded the third year of the ſixt Olympias.

But by what motives and reaſons each one of theſe authors is induced, & whereby they would ſeem to confirm their ſeveral opinions, needleſs it is in this place for to declare: both becauſe the ſpeculation hereof pertaineth properly to another profeſſion, and alſo for that (beſides Plutarch in Romulus, Solinus in the 1. chapter of his Polyhiſtor, and Camers in his annotation thereupon) the queſtion hath been ſo throughly handled by Onuphrius Panvinius in the firſt book of his Calender, that the thing requireth no further examination.

Now for the day on which the foundation of the City of Rome was laid by Romulus, it was the *eleventh day before the Calends of May, called Parilia or Palilia. Now was this a feſtival day to Pales the goddeſs of ſhepherds, celebrated by the ſaid ſhepherds upon the eleventh Calends of May, in the fields and country villages, for the chaſing away of wolves, for the preſervation of their ſhip and cattell from diſeaſes, or for the ſafe yeaning and bringing forth their young: whereupon they were called Parilia. Of this matter writeth Propertius in his fourth book, in this wiſe: * 21. of April.

A feaſt there was, Palilia, our fathers did it call,
And on that day they firſt began, for Rome to build a wall.

Ovid alſo in the fourth book of his Faſti:

A time full meet they choſe, with pough the plot to mark,
Dame Pales was hand, and ſo began the wark.

The ſame is avouched by M. Tullius, Plutarch, Solinus and others. And that theſe Palilia were ſolemnized ordinarily the eleventh day before the Calends of May, appeareth as well by the old marble Calenders, as alſo by the ſame authors before rehearſed.

Of the firſt ſoveraign Magiſtrates of the City of Rome, namely, of the KK, who were in number ſeven.

ALL ſorts of policies and governments in a Common-weal which are ſet down and named by ancient Writers, the City of Rome (were it by the fatall courſe of deſtiny or upon ſome troubles in the State) hath received and endured every one: ſo as no Common-weal in manner there can be found, wherein they ſucceeded ſo one after another, as they did in the very City of Rome. For in the beginning, the KK. ruled it; but when they for their exceſſive outrage and inordinate luſt exerciſed upon their Citizens and ſubjects, were depoſed and expelled, the Conſſ. (and after them the Tribunes military in Conſſ. authority) held the ſoveraignty. But in proceſs of time, when this frame and form of Common-weal (ſimply the beſt) was by the outrage of the two Gracchi (Saturninus and Druſus Tribunes of the Commons) put out of joynt and troubled, untill ſuch time as their power and authority was by Sylla rent in twain, and the Commons diſſeized of their lands and killed: then the adminiſtration of the Common-weal was reſtored again to the Nobles and principal perſons of the City. But at length, when it was oppreſſed again by the civill war of Pompey and Cæſar, the ſoveraign rule of the State was devolved upon the Empire of Cæſar alone; wherein, being firſt ſhaken a few years before, through the wicked inſolency and luſt of the three Triumvirs, it continued untill the time that it fell to utter ruin. We therefore will briefly go through all theſe ſorts of government, in that ſucceſſive order as they followed one after another, and firſt begin with the KK.

Romulus the firſt King of the Romans, reigned 37 years.

Romulus, the founder of the City, reigned 37 years: for ſo many Livy aſſigneth unto him. Likewiſe Dionyſius in the firſt book, which he repeateth alſo in the ſecond: and Plutarch in Numa diſſenteth not from them, howſoever in Romulus, he writeth, that he departed this world in the 37 year of his age. Solinus in like manner rehearſing his worthy acts attributeth unto his raign 37 years. Only Eutropius (1. book 4. chap.) alloweth unto him 39 years: but Cuſpinian thinketh very well that the Copy is corrupt. This Prince having raigned (according to the more common received opinion of authors) 37 years; in which time, he laid the firſt ground-work of the Roman Empire, with excellent laws and ordinances, and eſtabliſhed both civill and alſo military diſcipline, departed this life upon the Nones of July, which day was called afterwards, Nonæ Caprotinæ: by occaſion that he in muſtering and reviewing his army at the lake of Capra, was conveyed out of mens ſight: whereupon the people fled as amazed at the ſudden death of their King, as Plutarch & Dionyſius do witneſs. This Romulus after his * deification was named Quirinus, of which ſurname Ovid in his * Kalender giveth theſe reaſons. * Apotheoſis. * Faſt. 2. Sive

Some read thus, * Latinis. ^ Arma. * Romanus viderat, but corruptly.

Sive quod haſta quiris, priſcis eſt dicta * Sabinis:
Bellicus a telo, venit in * aſtra Deus:
Sive ſuo regi nomen poſſuere Quirites,
Seu quia * Romanus junxerat ille Cures.

A ſpear, old Sabins Quiris call'd, which Romulus us'd in fight:
This martial man a god became, and ſo Quirinus hight.
Quirites eke his ſubjects liege, their King this name might give:
Or elſe the Curets, whom he brought with Romans for to live.

That he was baſe born, and could not avouch his own father, beſide other writers, Plutarch eſpecially affirmeth in his Theſeus. Howbeit, the old opinion went currant, that he was by Mars begot in ſtealth of a veſtall virgin, Ilia, Rhea, or Sylvia, for ſo many names there go of her: and that firſt he was called Romus, of Ruma, which ſignifieth a teat or pap, and afterwards by way of flattery, Romulus.

FOr one year after the death of Romulus the nobles fell to variance & ſtrove who ſhould be K. but by reaſon that no one perſon excelled above the reſt in that ſtate ſo newly founded, there grew ſeverall factions & debates in their head-corporations. They who were deſcended from the Sabins (becauſe after the death of Tatius none of them raigned with Romulus in equall ſociety) were deſirous to have a K. created out of their body, becauſe they would not forgo their hold and poſſeſſion in the Empire. But the old Romans could not away with a ſtranger-King. Howbeit, as different as they were in affections, all were willing to ſet up a K. as having not taſted yet the ſweetneſs of liberty. The Peers moreover mightily feared (by reaſon that the neighbour States bordering round about were provoked againſt them) leſt ſome forraign force might aſſail their City leſt thus without ſoveraign government, and the army without a leader. Whereupon the two hundred Nobles agreed among themſelves to enter into an aſſociation of rule, and made ten Decuries: and in every Decury created one to have the ſoveraignty over the reſt. Theſe Senators were then 100 in number, as Livy ſaith, and according to Plutarch a hundred and fifty. But Dionyſius writeth, that there were two hundred of the Sabins & as many Romans. After this they caſt lots: and their Decury unto whom the lottery firſt fell, ruled the City: howbeit, not all of them at once, but one alone had the regall ornaments, and the Lictors going before him. Five daies he governed and no longer; and ſo by this order in courſe, the nobles of every Decury governed the City fifty daies. For after five daies determined, he whoſe lot was firſt to govern in that Decury, delivered up unto the ſecond the imperiall dignity together with the enſigns thereof: and he again, when his five daies were expired, unto a third, and ſo to the tenth. Thus when theſe ten firſt Interregents had paſſed one 50 daies a ſecond Decury of Senators in like manner ruled the City other 50 daies; and thus they went round through all untill they had fulfilled a years ſpace in this regency. This government was of the thing it ſelf called Interregnum, which name it ſtill retained afterwards, and the men likewiſe were named Interreges. In this year therefore was the Magiſtracy of the Interregents firſt deviſed among the Romans. And not only after the death of Romulus the State was ruled by Interregency, but alſo after the deceaſe of Numa, Tullius, and Ancus, Kings. In like manner during the time of the free State and Common-weal, after the time of yearly Magiſtrates expired, the ſaid government took place very often, before the creation of new: for they held the aſſembly for elections, wherein new governors were by the people created. Now the office and charge of this Interregent was, during the time of his regency (which ordinarily paſſed not five daies) to execute all thoſe functions in the City which belonged either to KK. or Coſſ. namely, to miniſter juſtice, to rule the Common-weal, to hold a Senat, and there to propound the affairs of State, and laſtly, to ſummon the generall aſſembly for chuſing new Magiſtrates. As touching the beginning of Interregents, Dionyſius in his ſecond book, Livy in his firſt, Plutarch in Numa, Sext. Ruffus, Euſebius and other old writers, have written at large.

Numa Pompilius the ſecond K. raigned 43 years.

ONe year of Interregency being thus accompliſhed, the people of Rome thought this a grievous and heavy manner of government; and the Commons grumbled that their ſervitude was manifold more than before, as having two hundred Lords over them inſtead of one. Which when the Senators perceived, they agreed at laſt upon this point, That the old Senators ſhould create a King, whom they would, ſo he were not one of their own body and degree. Whereupon Numa Pompilius (for that in juſtice & wiſdom he excelled all other) was called out of Cures a City of the Sabins, to be their King. That he raigned three and forty years, all accord, ſave Eutropius, Euſebius, and Caſſiodorus (late writers) who ſet down but one and forty, as Onuphrius and Sigonius have obſerved. Of this K. Dionyſius in the ſecond book, Livy in his firſt, Solinus in his ſecond chapter, Plutarch, Pliny, and Eutropius in his life; in like ſort Valerius Maximus have delivered much in record. He died not much above the age of 80 years, as Plutarch writeth; for born he was (as he teſtifieth) the ſame day whereon Romulus laid the firſt foundation of the City, namely, the twelfth Calends of May. Now for the name of Numa, ſome ſay it was the forename of Pompilius. But out of Sextus Pompeius it appeareth, that neither Tullius nor Numa were forenames, as alſo by this conjecture, for that the ſons of Numa are by Dionyſius called by other ſundry names divers from the family. Some thought therefore that Numa, Ancus, Arunt, Voluſus, Druſus, Fauſtus, Julus, Mammurius, and certain other ſurnames, were at firſt forenames, as Marlianus in his Annals hath very well noted.

Tullus Hoſtilius, the third King of Rome, reigned 32 years.

Numa being deceaſed, the Interregency took place again: during which time an Act of Senat paſſed, wherein by the approbation of the Commons and advice of the Nobles, Tullus Hoſtilius was created the third K. of the Romans, in the 81 year after the foundation of the City. Who having raſed Alba, commanded the Albans to be tranſlated to Rome. Their Commons he made free denizens, and the principall Nobles he took into the order of Senators. After Numa he raigned 32 years, as all writers moſt conſtantly affirm. He periſhed, as Dionyſius witneſſeth, by occaſion that his houſe was on fire, wherein his wife and children and all their houſhold beſides were conſumed and burnt. Some ſay, that his palace took fire by lightning through the ire of the gods, for that he had forlet ſome ſacrifices and holy rites: others write, that it was occaſioned by the treacherous practiſe of Ancus Martius, who reigned next after him. Of him Dionyſius writeth in his 3 book: That he carried before him the name of Hoſtus it appeareth by this, that both his father and grandſire bare the ſaid name. A Prince he was, not only far unlike to Numa, but alſo more fierce and ſtout than Romulus.

KIng Tullus being departed this life, there was an Interregent by the Nobles declared, who held the aſſembly for election in the 114 year from the foundation of the City: wherein the people created Ancus Martius the fourth K. of the Romans, and the Senators approved the ſame. He built Hoſtia a town 16 miles diſtant from the City of Rome; and fought ſeven battels. Livius, Dionyſius, and Solinus ſay, that he reigned 24 years; but Euſebius, Eutropius, and Caſſiodorus, 23. What death he died, neither Livy in his firſt book, nor Dionyſius in his 3. do ſet down: notwithſtanding that by them his noble acts are ſet out at large. Now Ancus (as Sex. Pompeius hath reported) is he called, who hath an arm bowing inward, ſo as it cannot be put ſtraight forth.

L. Tarquinius Priſcus, the fifth K. of Romans, reigned 38. years.

THis Tarquinius being left by Ancus (when he died) guardian to his children, was the firſt that ambitiouſly intercepted the kingdom to himſelf; he ſent the ſons of Ancus, during the time of Interregency, out of the way, as it were to hunting, and made an oration unto the people to win their hearts & affections to him: and ſo with the ſuffrages of the people, and authority of the Nobles, he was by the Interregent declared K. in the 170 year after the foundation of Rome, and in the 41 Olympiad. This noble Prince as well for warlike proweſs as peaceable policy and government, at the length (being above fourſcore year old) was forelaid by the ſecret trains of of the two ſons of Ancus Martius, in the eight and thirty year of his reign, according to Livy and Dionyſius, whoſe judgment we follow: or in the 37, as Solinus, Meſſala, Ruffus, Eutropius, Caſſiodorus, Euſebius, and Bedas write; like as we have before ſhewed. Priſcus he was ſurnamed afterwards, becauſe he lived before Tarquinius Superbus, ſaith Sex. Pomponius, unto whom accord Dionyſius and Laurentius Valla: who writeth, that the addition of Priſcus was given unto him, not by men of that time wherein he lived, but by the age following. But Livy ſheweth plainly, that he had the ſurname of Priſcus given him, even then when he came firſt into the City, becauſe he was born before Superbus. He alſo was called Lucumo, and was the ſon of Demaratus the Corinthian, deſcended from the family of the Brachiades.

Servius Tullius the ſixt K. of the Romans, reigned four and forty years.

AFter Priſcus Tarquinius was ſlain preſently Servius Tullius was the firſt that (without any election of the people, yet with the generall conſent of the Nobles) took upon him the Roman kingdom, in the year from the foundation of the City 176. Concerning whoſe conception, we muſt not let paſs that which Pliny writeth in the 36 book after this manner. During the reign of Tarquinius Priſcus, there appeared ſuddenly the genitall member of the maſculine ſex upon the hearth where the fire was kept, & thereupon preſently a captive woman and bond-ſervant of Tanaquil the Queen, named Ocriſia, ſitting there by the fire ſide, conceived and was with child; and ſo was Servius Tullius born, who ſucceeded in the kingdom. Afterwards as the boy lay aſleep within the KK. palace, his head was ſeen on a light fire, and ſuppoſed he was the ſon of the familiar Lar of that houſe. In which regard, he inſtituted firſt the Compitalia and plaies to the Lars. Concerning his birth, Plutarch hath written more in his book of the Romans fortune. By the crafty and ſubtill device of his wives mother Tanaquil, he attained to the Crown in the fourth year of the fift Olympias, and reigned 44 years: but by the villanous complot of Tarquinius his ſon in law, and Tullia his own daughter and Tarquins wife, he was moſt impiouſly ſlain in the very ſtreet; which thereupon was called Sceleratus. As touching the years of this Kings reign, ſome controverſie there is among writers: for Livy, Dionyſius, and Solinus (whom we have followed) write, that he reigned 44 years: but Meſſala Corvinus, Sex. Ruffus, Eutropius, Euſebius, Caſſiodorus and Bedas 34 and not above. Howbeit, in adding thoſe ten to the reign of Tarquin afterwards, they hinder not this groſs ſum and computation of the years: for they ſet them down 35, which Livy, Dionyſius, and Solinus, make but 25. This K. took the name of Servius, by occaſion of his own fortune, for that his mother Ocriſia a captive (but a moſt beautifull and wiſe woman of Corniculum) bare him during her bondage: but Tullius he was called, by the name of his fathers kindred, as Dionyſius writeth

L. Tarquinius Superbus, the ſeventh King of Romans, ruled 25 years.

IN the two hundred and twentieth year after the foundation of the City, L. Tarquinius the younger, having killed Servius Tullius, entered upon the Roman kingdom with force of arms, nor by Interregent, nor yet any right of law. Superbus he was named for his cruell demeanour, in that he forbad to commit to earth the dead corps of his father in law, by him murdered; giving out that Romulus likewiſe died and lay unburied. He was the ſon of L. Tarquinius Priſcus the King; as Q. Pictor, Au. Gellius, Licinius Macer, Verrius Flaccus, and Livius have written. Howbeit, Dionyſius out of L. Piſo in his Annals, by moſt ſtrong reaſons diſproveth their errour, and by the certain computation of the yeers ſheweth how it cannot poſſibly be ſo, but rather that he was the ſon of Tarquinius Priſcus his ſon, who died in the life of Priſcus. Five and twenty years he reigned according to Livy in his firſt book. Dionyſius in his fourth, and Solinus in his Polyhiſtor. But Caſſiodorus, Euſebius, Eutropius, and Beda, aſcribe unto him five and thirty years, adding unto his raign thoſe ten years which they took from Servius Tullius, and thereby giving occaſion of errour to the later writers. Of him Dionyſius, Livy, both the Plinies, Gellius, Macrobius, and Eutropius, have written much. Collect then, into one ſum the year of theſe Kings reign, and thereof will ariſe the number of two hundred forty four.

Of the firſt Elections of Conſuls.

THis is the ſecond change of the Common-weal, by occaſion that Superbus the King, as well for his inſolent and proud government, as for the villany offered by Sextus the Kings ſon to Lucretia, was expelled, and liberty recovered: whereupon the ſoveraign government yeat by year was committed to two men, who firſt were named Prætors, for that they were ſet over the people: then, Judges, becauſe they decided their controverſies: and laſtly, Conſuls, in that they adviſed and provided for the good of the Common-weal: as Cicero in the third book of Laws declareth in theſe words: Let there be two inveſted in royall government; and of ruling, judging, and counſell-giving, be they called Prætors, Judges, and Conſuls: let them alſo have the ſoveraignty of command in war. Now the firſt Conſuls or Prætors were created by Sp. Lucretius (father of Lucretia, and Interregent for the time) in a generall aſſembly by the voices of the Centuries, according to the commentaries of Servius Tullius the King. The firſt Conſul had all the right, prerogatives, and regall enſigns of the KK. this only provided, that both of them ſhould not have the rods and axes carried before them, for fear of preſenting any terrour to the people. Both of them were choſen out of the Patritii: which for this intent I advertiſe the Reader of, that the progreſs of the Common-weal might be known; ſeeing that in proceſs of time they came to be be created out of the Commons alſo. Moreover, as concerning the year month, and day, when as the firſt Conſuls entred their government, ſomething were to be ſaid in this place: but becauſe we have ſpoken before of the variety and diſſention of Authors thereabout; therefore letting paſs theſe circumſtances, proceed we to the very Conſuls, who by the teſtimony of all writers were firſt choſen: namely,

IT is recorded by all writers, that L. Junius Brutus, and L. Tarq. Collatinus, were the firſt Coſſ. or Prætors of the Roman people: who in the end of the 244 year ſince the foundation of the City, and upon the firſt day of March (after the Tarquins KK. the father & the ſon were expelled the City) in an aſſembly of the Centuries were ſolemnly pronounced and declared Coſſ. But after that Brutus had compelled his Collegue Tarquinius to reſign up his Conſulſhip, either becauſe he was ſuſpected for the affinity and name of the Tarquins (as L. Piſo in Gellius the 15 book and 29 cap. Livy, Plutarch, and Cic. 3. Offic. do write:) or by occaſion of a variance between Brutus and Collatinus about the execution of Collatinus his ſiſters ſon, (as Dionyſius reporteth) he ſubelected in his place Pub. Valerius Voluſius the ſon of Voluſus whoſe helping hand he had uſed eſpecially in baniſhing the KK. Of whoſe Conſulſhip, Polybius in the third book, Dionyſius, Livy, Valerius Max. 4. book 4. chapter. Plutarch in Popilicola, and Pliny 36 book, chap. 15. have made mention. But Valerius, after that Brutus in his Magiſtracy was ſlain by Aruns the ſon of Superbus (for the King his father had levied war againſt the Romans) in a generall Court of all the Centuries, took unto him for his companion in government, Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus the father of Lucretia; and to him (being the elder) ſubmitted the preheminence of ſoveraignty. And ſoon after, within few daies upon his death, (for he was very aged) he aſſumed unto him M. Horatius Pulvillus for his Collegue in the Conſulſhip. The ſaid Valerius was called Poplicola, for that during his Magiſtracy, he enacted certain laws very popular, and namely, concerning the appeal from the Conſuls to the people, and the receiving of the ſtate-government from the ſaid people, as Livius and Dionyſius do witneſs. In the vulgar books, as alſo in the old written Copies (whether by errour or of purpoſe I wot not) we read his name evermore Publicola, but ſtill in one and the ſame ſignification. Only the letters are a little altered, which otherwiſe have much affinity one with another, as Quintilian writeth, namely o with u, and p with b. For in antique titles and inſcriptions, you ſhall read often Poplicus for Publicus. To conclude therefore, in the firſt year after the Kings were exiled, Coſſ. at Rome were theſe, L. Junius Brutus, and Lu. Tar. Collatinus, P. Valerius Publicola, Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, and M. Horatius Pulvillus.

P. Valerius II. T. Lucretius.

THe Conſulſhip of theſe two is recorded unto us by Dionyſius, Livius and Caſſiodorus. Onuphrius Panvinius, giveth unto Lucretius the ſurname of Tricipitinus, both for that it was a peculiar addition to that houſe; and alſo, becauſe by an ancient Chronologer in the records of Cuſpinian, he is named Triciptinus. Now for Publius the Etymology thereof according to Sextus, is twofold: For ſome call him Pub. who hath been brought up at the publike charges; others again name him ſo, who was a ward before he had his name given him.

Livius calleth this Lucretius by the forename of P. but other books of Titus. Dionyſius writeth, that P. Valerius Poplicola the third time, and M. Horatius the ſecond time were Coſſ. Plutarch ſpeaketh of the third Conſulſhip only of P. Valerius. Onuphrius and Sigonius follow Dionyſius. As for Caſſiodorus, he leaveth out altogether theſe Conſuls.

AFter Poplicola the third time, and Pulvillus the ſecond time Conſuls, Dionyſius hath placed Sp. Lartius and T. Herminius. The ſame doth Caſſiodorus. And the book noted by Cuſpinian, under an unknown author, hath in it thus written, Poplicola III. & Pulvillo; Rufo & Aquilino; Valerio & Tuberto. Livy omitteth theſe Conſuls, and in their place putteth down M. Valerius, and P. Poſthumius: But as Sigonius thinketh, the fault is in the writers of the book.

But that this year ſhould neceſſarily come between, Onuphrius thinketh, according to the book of M. Tullius Cicero entituled Brutus: and certain it is, that Verrius Flaccus in his Capitoline tables hath not rejected theſe Conſuls. Now this name Lartius is derived of Lars, and ſo ought it to be written, and not Largius, as corruptly it is to be ſeen in ſome Copies of Livy and Dionyſius. As for the ſurname to Herminius, Onuphrius ſuppoſeth it to have been Eſquilinus, both for that the mention of that ſurname appeareth in a fragment of the Capitoline marbles, as alſo becauſe of what family elſe it ſhould be, no writer ever hath delivered. This Sp. Lartius was the brother of Titus Lartius the firſt Dictator, as writeth Dionyſius.

Plutarch, as alſo Dionyſius and Livius writeth, that this M. Valerius was brother to M. Valerius Publicola, and therefore truly is he ſaid to be the ſon of Voluſus. Poſtumius for his ſurname had Tubertus. Witneſs Zonaras, together with Plutarch in Poplicola, and Dionyſius in the fift and ſixt books. Him Dionyſius calleth the brother of Quintus, where he treateth of the Conſular Embaſſadors ſent unto the Commons in the year 260. This Poſtumius, as Onuphrius teacheth, was by old authors written without the aſpiration (h) either becauſe of Poſtea, Poſtumus, and Poſtimius, and ſo Poſtumius is derived, or for that in old time they wrote umus without the ſaid (h.) Now is he called Poſtuminus, who was born laſt, as Ceſellius witneſſeth in his commentaries of ancient readings. Howbeit, lawyers pronounce the word with the aſpiration, and call by that name him only, who was born after his fathers death: and with them accord Varro and Plutarch in the life of Sylla.

Dionyſius, Livius, Plutarch and Caſſiodorus, report theſe for Coſſ. this year. But the regiſters of Cuſpinian deliver unto us Poplicola the fourth time, and Tricipitinus. Valerius Maximus in the fourth book and fourth chapter writeth thus, Valerius Poplicola began his Conſulſhip with Brutus, and the ſame man bare three Conſulats afterwards, to the great contentment of the people.

Dionyſius hath for Coſſ. this year, Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, and L. Poſtumius the ſecond time. Livy, Caſſiodorus, Cuſpinians book, and the Greek records diſagree not from him. Valerius Max. 4. book, 4. cap. corruptly calleth him M. Menenius Agrippa. Now Agrippæ are they called, who are born into the world with extraordinary throws & birth-travels of their mothers, namely, not with their heads, but their feet forward, againſt nature.

Livius, Zonaras, and Caſſiodorus, name theſe Conſuls barely thus. Dionyſius yet is more liberall, calling Sp. Caſſius, Uſcellinus: and Opiter Virginius, Tricoſtus. But whom Dionyſius calleth ὑπατεύοντα, Cicero in his Lælius termeth Caſſius Becillinus. And Cuſpinians Kalender Viſcellinus. For firſt of Viſcus cometh Viſcellus, and ſo from thence they derive Viſcellinus. Opiter (to note that by the way, as Sex. Pompeius ſaith) is he, whoſe father died before his grandſire. And the word ſoundeth thus much, as if he were born after his fathers death; or becauſe he taketh his grandſire for his father.

Poſthumius Cominius. T. Lartius.

Livy, Dionyſius, Zonaras, and Caſſiodorus name theſe ſimply thus. But Cuſpinians Kalender, giveth to Poſthumius the ſurname Auruncus, & to Lartius Ruffus. And thoſe whom Cuſpinians book nameth Ruffi, the Greek regiſters by another word, but to the ſame ſence, call Flavi.

Ser. Sulpitius. M'. Tullius.

Livy and Caſſiodorus allow to theſe no ſurnames at all. The Sicilian Records give to Sulpitius the addition of Camerinus, like as the Kalender of Cuſpinian; and to Tullius of Longus: as alſo doth Dionyſius, who writeth, that Manius Tullius died in the time of his Magiſtracy, and that in his place there was none ſubſtituted becauſe the yearwas welnear at an end. Of this M'. Tullius, Cicero ſpeaketh in his Brutus, ſaying, As if I ſhould avouch my ſelf to be deſcended of M'. Tullius the Patritian, who in the tenth year after the expulſion of the KK. was Coſ. with Ser. Sulpitius. This ſurname Manius, as Sext. Pompeius ſaith, cometh hereupon that ſome one was born mane, i.e. in the morn, like as Lucius, who entred into the world by daylight. And in another place, this Manius (qd. he) conſecrated the field Nemorenſis, from whom many noble and famous men ſprung, and continued many years. Whereupon aroſe the Proverb, Multi Manii Ariciæ, i.e. there be many Manii at Aricia. Moreover, he was called Servius, who came of parents (either both or one at leaſt) whiles they were in bondage, or elſe, who when his mother was dead, lived ſtill in her womb, and ſo was ſaved.

THe forename of this Vetuſius or Veturius in ſome Copies of Livy, as Marlian ſheweth in his annals of Coſſ. is Caius: in other Cneus: in Caſſiodorus, Lucius: in Dionyſius Publius: who alſo ſurnameth Veturius, Geminus: and T. Ebutius Helua; and in ſome place ἔλαλβαν, but faultily; for the Latine writers alſo affirm his ſurname to be Helua. The Greek Records likewiſe have Helua and Geminus. Moreover they that write him Vetuſius, imitate the ancient manner of putting s. for r. as when they call men Fuſii, Valeſii and Papiſii. But they who call him Veturius follow the latter uſage. Of this matter Livy ſpeaketh in the year 292.

THus ſay Livy and Caſſiodorus: but Dionyſius ſurnameth T. Lartius, Flavus; and Q. Cloelius, Siculus: to whom accord the regiſters both of Cuſpinian and Sicily. This T. Lartius is the ſame, as appeareth by Dionyſius, who before was Coſ. and therefore is his ſurname Flavus rightly added. The houſe of the Cloelii, as alſo of the Julii Servilii Geganii, Curiatii and Quintilii deſcended from the Albans firſt, as Dionyſius writeth.

Au. Sempronius. M. Minutius.

THus Livy and Caſſiodorus deliver unto us theſe Coſſ. But Cuſpinians regiſters and the Sicilian, ſurname them Atratinus and Auguri-nus. And Dionyſius nameth them A. Sempronius Rhætinus, and M. Minutius Augurinus, albeit he maketh no mention of Auguriuus, but in the ſecond Conſulſhip of Minutius. As for Aulus, he was ſo called, who being new born, was nouriſhed and foſtered by the gods.

258

Au. Poſthumius. T. Virginius.

THus are theſe Coſſ. ſet down by Dionyſius, Livy, and Caſſiodorus. And to them verily the greek records put to the ſurnames of Albus and Calimontanus. But the book of Cuſpinian addes Regillenſis & Tricoſtus beſides: ſo that by him they are thus written, Au. Poſthumius Albus Regillenſis, and T. Virginius Tricoſtus Calimontanus.

App. Claudius and P. Servilius.

Livius and Caſſiodorus record theſe for Coſſ. this year. The regiſters as well of Cuſpinian as Sicily, Sabinus and Priſcus: But Dionyſius more fully, App. Cladius Sabinus, and P. Servilius Priſcus. This App. Claudius was the top of the Claudian kindred, firſt named, Attius Clauſus, and afterwards, App. Claudius; who from Regillus, a City of the Sabins (whereupon he was called, Sabinus Regillenſis) came to Rome in the two hundred and fiftieth year after the foundation of the City, and was ranged among the Patritii, as Livy, Dionyſius, and Suetonius in Tiberius make report. This man was grandſire to that App. Claudius the Decemvir. As touching his forename, there is ſome difference; whereof ye may ſee Onuphrius and Marlianus in their Kalenders.

A. Virginius and T. Vetuſius.

THeſe are thus ſet down by Livy and Caſſiodorus, as here they be named. Dionyſius writeth them, An. Virginius Montanus, and T. Veturius Geminus. The regiſter of Cuſpinian, barely Montanus and Geminus. The Sicilian, Calimontanus and Geminus. Montanus and Calimontanus are both one. Pædianus upon the Oration of Cicero for Cornelius, calleth theſe Conſuls, Au. Virginius Tricoſtus, and L. Veturius Cicurinus: whereby it may be underſtood, that both of them had two ſurnames, to wit, the one, Tricoſtus Calimontanus, and the other, Geminus Cicurinus; for ſo elſewhere other writers teſtifie. Cuſpinianus obſerveth, that this Cicurinus, is alſo called Coturnius by ſome writers.

SO Livius and Dionyſius. Of them ſpeaketh Cicero alſo in his Oration for Cornelius. But Cuſpinian his books ſet forth unto us, Viſcellinus & Aurunceus. The Sicilian records, Aurunceus, and Vitellinus. And that theſe ſame were Conſuls together in this yeer, and entred upon their government the firſt of September, ſooner then the cuſtom was, as Dionyſius writeth.

Dionyſius in the beginning of the ſeventh book nameth for Coſſ. this year T. Geganius Macerinus, and P. Minutius. The ſame doth Livius in the ſecond book. Caſſiodorus likewiſe and Eutropius. Oroſius alſo in the ſecond book and fifth chapter, leaving out one of their ſurnames. But the Greek records and Cuſpinians book ſurname them both, the one Marcerinus, the other Augurinus. And theſe are ordinary ſurnames, this to Minutii, and the former to the Geganii.

M. Minutius, and Aul. Sempronius.

SO Livy and Caſſiodorus ſet them down, omitting their ſurnames, as alſo the numerall note II. But Dionyſius recordeth them fully in this maner, A. Sempronius Atratinus the ſecond time, and M. Minutius Augurinus likewiſe the ſecond time. This yeer reckoneth Dionyſius for the nineteneth, after that Poplicola the Coſ. publiſhed the law of appealing.

Sp. Nautius and Sext. Furius.

AFter Aul. Sempronius and M. Minutius Coſſ. Dionyſius bringeth in to ſucceed them, Q. Sulpitius Camerinus, and Sp. Lartius Flavus the ſecond time. Cuſpinian regiſters, Cornutus and Flavus. the Sicilian, Camerinus and Flavus. Moreover, Cornutus is an ordinary ſurname to the Sulpitii, as may be gathered out of the Capitoline tables of ſtone. And that theſe Coſſ. are not to be left out, either according to the acconut of the Capitol, or to make up and digeſt the ſum gathered by Varro, appeareth by the Triumph of P. Valerius, which would not fall to the yeer 279, if we ſhould deduct theſe Coſſ. out of the Kalender.

NExt after the former Conſuls, there followed according to Dionyſius, C. Iulius Iulus and P. Pinarius Rufus Conſuls. Cuſpinian his records deliver unto us Iulus and Mamercinus: But the Greek, Iulus and Rufus. And that Mamercus is a ſurname to the Pinarii, appeareth by another place. Theſe Conſuls Livy over-paſſeth, like as the other the yeer before: upon whom, they that undertook the explication of the Capitoline tables have noted, that there want Conſuls for two yeers. So that of himſelf the like may be ſaid to that which he writeth in the ninth book of Piſo, in this maner [Theſe Conſuls, Piſo bringeth in immediately after Q. Fabius and P. Decius, leaving out two yeers, whereof we have reported that Claudius and Voluminius were Conſuls in the one, and Cornelius with Martius in the other.] Whether he forgat them in the digeſting of the Annals, or of purpoſe paſſed by them (notwithſtanding he thought of thoſe two couple of Conſuls) it is uncertein. Moreover, the ſurname of C. Iulius, was transformed every where into Tullus and Tullius; but that it is to be read Iullius, both Marlianus, and alſo after him Panvinius ſheweth. For this ſurname Iulus is ſet from Aſcanius the ſon of Æneas, and from the ſaid ſurname is derived the denomination of a family; and therefore Virgil ſaith,

The Iulian houſe at Rome, firſt came
From Iulus great, a prince of name.

And Livy ſpeaking of the ſame in this wiſe ſaith; which Iulius, the houſe of the Iulii avouch for the author of their name.

BVt to leave theſe things; Sp. Nautius and Sex. Furius, are by Dionyſius, Livius, and Caſſiodorus, ranged Conſuls in this yeer. In Cuſpinian his Annals, there is Rutilius, the ſurname of Nautius, and likewiſe Viſcellinus. But in the Sicilian, Nautius and Fuſius.

ACcording to Livy the Conſuls this year were T. Sicinius, and C. Aquilius; whom Dionyſius and Caſſiodorus name to be T. Siccius & C. Aquilius. The ſurnames of theſe, by the Greek records and Cuſpinians Kalender, were Tuſcus and Sabinus. As for Aquilius, he was ſo called (as Marlianus obſerveth) who was aquilo colore, i. of a duskiſh black, or browniſh colour.

Livy avoucheth Conſuls for this yeer, Sp. Caſſius and Proculus Virginius: and Dionyſius Sp. Caſſius the ſecond time, with Proculus Virginius. And Diodorus in his eleventh book, unto Virginius addeth the name Tricoſtus. The Greek records, as alſo thoſe of Cuſpinian make mention of Rutilius and Viſcellinus. Now as concerning the name of Proculus, ſome think they be ſo called, for that they were born when their parents were old, quaſi, Procul ætate progreſſi, i. far ſtept in yeers.

M. Fabius. L. Valerius.

Diodorus in the ſaid 11 book, declareth Q. Fabius Vibulanus, and Servius Cornelius Coſſus, for this yeers Coſſ. The ſame do Dionyſius Livy, and Caſſiodorus, ſaving that they leave out the ſurnames. But as touching the ſurname of Coſſus, (that ye may be reſolved) men were named Coſſi in the old time, who had rivel'd and wrinkled bodies, like to the wood-worms breeding in trees, called Coſſi. Plinius in his 17 book and 24 chap. ſaith: Ryot and wantonneſs hath brought up the uſe at the table of the daintier wood-worms breeding in oaks. Hereupon Saint Hierome againſt Jovinian: In Pontus, (quoth he) and Phrygia, it is counted high and delicat fare to eat Xylophagion: for ſo he called thoſe plump and fat worms which came of rotten wood, and among them are reckoned to yeeld a great revenue and commodity to the houſekeeper. Of them the Romans took their names of Coſſi, Coſſutij, Coſſanii, and Coſſutiani.

Q. Fabius. C. Julius.

Lucius Æmylius the ſon of Mamercus, and Caſo Fabius the ſon of Caſo, are by Dionyſius recorded the Conſuls of this yeer. Livy and Caſſiodore approved the ſame. Diodorus likewiſe, ſaving that he addeth to L. Æmylius the ſurname of Mamercus: but they leave out the fore-names of their fathers. The Greek records have Mamercus and Fabius. As for the ſurname of Mamercus, Dionyſius giveth it unto Æmylius himſelf in the third Conſulſhip. Moreover, Sex. Pompeius affirmeth, that the kindred Æmylia took name of Mamercus the ſon of Pythagoras the Philoſopher, who for his ſingular humanity, was ſurnamed Æmylius. But as he ſaith Æmylius is a name and not a ſurname. Now was this Æmylius the ſon of Mamercus, as witneſseth Dionyſius.

K. Fabius. Sp. Furius.

Dionyſius hath for this yeers Coſs. Marcus Fabius Vibulanus, and L. Valerius Potitus. Dionyſius, Livius, and Caſſiodorus, M. Fabius and L. Valerius The Greek records, Fabius and Volſcus: and finally Cuſpanians book Fabius and Potitus.

272

M. Fabius. Cn. Manlius.

Dionyſius matcheth together in the Conſulſhip this yeer, C. Julius and Q. Fabius. Livius and Caſſiodorus, Q. Fabius and Caius Julius. The Sicilian regiſters and Cuſpinian Julius and Fabius.

273

K. Fabius. T. Virginius.

Dionyſius writeth, that Caſo Fabius the ſecond time, and Sp. Furius Medullinus were Conſuls this year: but Livy and Caſſiodorus put in ſtead of them, Q. Fabius and C. Junius. The Sicilian regiſters, as alſo Cuſpinian, Julius and Fabius.

L. Æmylius. T. Servilius.

BY the teſtimony of Dionyſius, there followed Conſuls next after, M. Fabius the ſecond time, and C. Manlius. But Diodorus, Livius, and Coſſiodorus, deliver unto us M. Fabius and Cn. Manlius for Conſuls. The Greek records, name Fabius the ſecond time, and Cincinnatus, Cuſpinians book hath Vibulanus the ſecond time. The Capitoline ſtone ſheweth, Cn. Manlius the ſon of Publius.

C. Horatius. T. Menenius.

Flavius, Caſſiodorus, Diodorus and Dionyſius, make report of Caſo Fabius to have been Coſ. this year with T. Virginius: but the Sicilian regiſters, Fabius with Rutilus. Dionyſius noteth that Caſo the brother of the Coſ. who gave him his place, was a third Conſul this yeer. And Livy ſaith, that T. Virginius Rutilus died in time of the peſtilence the 290 yeer.

A. Virginius. Sp. Servilius.

ACcording to Livy, Dionyſius, and Caſſiodorus, the Conſuls this yeer were L. Æmylius and C. Servilius: but Diodorus nameth, Lu. Æmylius Mamercus with C. Cornelius Lentulus: the Sicilian regiſters, Æmylius with Eſquilinus. Another fragment of the Capitoline ſtone, only Structus Ahala: with Eſquilinus ſubſtituted in his room. Moreover, Mamercus (as Sex. Pompeius writeth) is an Oſcane fore-name; who alſo reporteth, that the Houſe Æmylia was ſo called of Mamercus the ſon of Pythagoras the Philoſopher, who for his paſſing courteſie was ſurnamed Æmylius.

Livius, Caſſiodorus, Dionyſius, and Diodorus, put down for Coſſ. T. Menenius and C. Horatius. As for Diodorus, he added unto Horatius the ſurname of Pulvillius: and the Capitoline ſtone ſurnameth Menenius, Lanatus. And even ſo both in Cuſpinians Kalender and the Sicilian regiſters, are to be ſeen Lanatus and Pulvillus. Of theſe Coſſ. Gellius maketh mention in the 17 book & 12 chap. but not without fault.

Livius, Caſſiodorus, and Dionyſius, ſet down for Coſſ. A. Virginius and Spurius Servilius. Diodorus, A. Virginius Tricoſtus, and C. Servilius Structus. In Cuſpinian his Kalender, Virginius, for his ſurname hath Rutilus: and the Capitol marbles, give Structus to Servilius: the Sicilian records have both.

L. Æmylius. Opiter Virginius, or, Vopiscus Iulius.

Livy and Cassiodorus nominat for this yeers Coss. P. Valerius and C. Nautius. Dionysius, P. Valerius Popicola and C. Nautius. Diodorus P. Valerius Poplicola, and C. Nautius Rufus. The Sicilian registers, thus Nautius and Poplicola. Cuspinian, Poplicola and Rufus. The Capitol stones, having for Rufus, Rutilus: like as Dionysius before in Lartius, for Rufus putteth down Flavus.

Diodorus this yeer nameth Consuls, L. Furius Medullinus and Manlius Volso. Livius and Cassiodorus record L. Furius and C. Manlius. Dionysius cometh with A. Manlius and Lu. Furius. Marlianus giveth warning to read Vulso, not Volso.

App. Claudius son of Appius. T. Quintius.

Dionysius would have L. Æmylius Mamercus to be Consul the third time this yeer, with Vopiscus Iulius: but Livy, L. Æmylius and Opiter Virginius. Howbeit he saith that in some Annals he found Vopiscus Iulius, in stead of Virginius. And them Diodorus, the Greek records, and the avouchers of the Consuls tables within the Capitol, have followed. In the fragments whereof is read Iulius, which is a surname of the Iulii. And therefore in the Sicilian registers, it is thus written, Æmylius and Julius: but in those of Cuspinian, Mamercus and Vopiscus. Cassiodorus hath followed Livy. Moreover, Appius is a peculiar name of the Claudii, which no citizen else of Rome used: because it was a strangers name.

Livius, Dionysius, and Cassiodorus, name for this yeer Consuls, L. Pinarius and Lu. Furius. Diodorus, L. Penarius Mamercinus, and P. Furius agree but faultily, as Sigonius and Onuphrius think. Of these Coss. M. Varo maketh mention. and Macrobius in the first book of the Saturnalia.

283

T. Numicius Priscus. A. Virginius.

Dionysius saith, the Consuls of this yeer were App. Claudius the son of Appius, surnamed also Sabinus, and T. Quintius Capitolinus. Livy leaveth out their surnames.

284

T. Quintius. P. Servilius.

Livy and Cassiodorus set down for Consuls this yeer, T. Æmylius and L. Valerius. Diodorus, L. Valerius Poplicola; and T. Æmylius Mamercus. Dionysius, L. Valerius the second time, and T. Æmylius. The Sicilian registers yeeld us nothing but the bare names, Æmylius and Valerius; but Cuspinian, Pottus and Mamercus.

285

T. Æmylius. Q. Fabius.

Dionysius, hath for Consuls this yeer, A. Virginius Montanus (whom the Greek records call Calimontanus) and T. Numitius Priscus. Diodorus, Livius, and Cassiodorus, conceal their surnames: and whom the Sicilian registers name Calimontanus, Cuspinian calleth Nomentanus.

286

Q. Servilius. Sp. Posthumius.

IN Dionysius we read for this yeers Consuls Quintius Capitolinus, and Q Servilius Priscus. Livius and Cassiodorus, are silent for the surnames: but in Diodorus there be T. Quintius & Q. Servilius Structus. In Cuspinians Kalender, Capitolinus and Priscus: in the Sicilian registers, Calimontanus and Priscus.

287

Q. Fabius. T. Quintius.

Livius, and Cassiodorus match together in Consulship for this yeer: T. Æmylius and Q. Fabius. Dionysius, T. Æmylius the II. time, and Q. Fabius. The Sicilian registers, Æmylius & Vibulanus, Cuspinian Mamercus and Vibulanus. Diodorus, Æmylius Mamercus and Q. Fabius Vibulanus. This is that Fabius who afterwards was four times Consul, and was the only Fabius that survived, when the Fabii were slain at Crèmera: not a child at the time of fourteen yeers of age, but a serviceable and an active man of his hands, (as Dionysius reporteth) and was the son of Marcus a man who had been Consul.

288

A. Posthumius Albus. Sp. Furius Fusus.

THis yeer had for Consuls, Q. Servilius and Sp. Posthumius, as Livy and Cassiodorus report: but Priscus and Albinus, as Cuspinian saith. And by Dionysius his testimony, Sp. Posthumius Albinus, and Servilius Priscus the second time; Diodorus nameth Q. Servilius Priscus the second time: but Diodorus nameth Q. Servilius & Sp. Posthumius Albinus. Howbeit, in the fragment of the Capitol marble, Sp. Posthumius is surnamed Albus Regillensis, and not Albius, and so Marlian thinketh it ought to be read.

289

Livius nameth T. Quintius and Q. Fabius Cassiodorus. T. Quintius the second time, and Q. Fabius the second time. Diodorus, Tit. Quintius Capitolinus and Q. Fabius. Dionysius Tit. Quintius Capitolinus the third time, and Q. Fabius Vibulanus the second time.

According to the Capitoline table, Aulus Posthumius; out of Livy, Dionysius, and Cassiodorus, Pub. Furius Fusus, are noted for Consuls this yeer. Diodorus putteth to Furius the only gentile surname Medullinus for Fusus. This A. Posthumius was the son of A. Posthumius the Dictator.

P. Volumnius. Serv. Sulpitius.

Livy and Cassiodorus write that there followed as Coss. this yeer, P. Servilius: but Dionysius nameth L. Æbutius and P. Servilius Priscus. Diodorus, Lu. Æbutius Elva and Pub. Servilius Structus. The Sicilian registers shew Priscus and Flavus: Cuspinian, Elva and Priscus. The Capitol stones exhibit unto us P. Servilius the son of Sp. P. N. i. the sons son of Publius, and surnamed Priscus.

C. Claudius, son of Appius. P. Valerius Poplicola.

Livy Cassiodore, and Denis, represent unto us as Consuls this yeer, L. Lucretius Tricipitinus, and T. Veturius [or Vetusius] Geminus: but Diodorus, L. Lucretius and T. Veturius Cicurinus. Cuspinian his Kalender, Geminus and Tricipitinus. The Sicilian Registers, Tricipitinus and Veturius: the Capitol monuments L. Lucretius Tricipitinus.

Q. Fabius Vibulanus III. L. Cornel. Malginēsis

Livius and Cassiodorus professe for Consuls this yeer, P. Volumnius and Serv. Sulpitius. Dionysius, P. Volumnius, and Serv. Sulpitius Camerinus. The Capitol marbles have P. Volumnius Amintinus Gallus. Of the same Consul Valerius speaketh, in his first book and sixt chapter.

Livy and Dionysius name, P. Valerius Publicola, and C. Claudius Sabinus Consuls for this yeer: Diodorus, P. Valerius Poplica, and C. Claudius Regillanus. The Sicilian registers & Cuspinian, call them Poplicola and Sabinus. The Capitoline marble hath this record, P. Valerius P. F. [son of P.] Volusi N. i. the sons son of Volusus, surnamed Poplicola, but Livy, Dionysius, Orosius & they that have ranged the Cos. in the capitol, have reported that P. Valerius the Consul was slain in the battel against the bondslaves who this yeer (under the leading of Ap. Herdonius the Sabine) held the Capitol by force, and that in his stead L. Quintius Cincinnatus was substituted.

Q. Minutius. C. Horatius Pulvillus.

Livius, together with Cassiodorus, declare for Consuls this yeer, Q. Fabius the third time and L. Cornelius Malginensis. Dionysius, Q. Fabius Vibulanus the third time, and L. Cornelius. Diodorus, Q. Fabius Vibulanus, and L. Cornelius κασσιανος. The Sicilian registers, and Cuspinian Vibulanus and Malginensis. The capitol marble C. Fabius Vibulanus the third time.

Both Livy and Cassiodore, deliver unto us for Consuls, L. Minutius and C. Nantius, Dionysius, L. Minutius and C. Nantius the second time. Diodorus Minutius καρσιανὸς, and C. Nantius Rutilius. The capitol stones C. Nantius Rutilius the second time. What this surname καρτιανὸς should mean, Sigonius and Onuphrius confesse they know not, and think in stead thereof I we should read ἀγυρτὸς, Valerius Maximus (5 book 2 chap. Of thankful persons) writeth these Consuls corruptly, Q. for Nantius, and Minutius.

T. Romulus. Sp. Veturius.

Livy and Cassiodorus name for Coss. this yeer Q. Minutius and M. Horatius Pulvillus: but herein they do amisse, as Sigonius and Onuphrius suppose: for the same Livy writeth, that Caius Horatius Pulvillus died being Augur in the yeer 302. Diodorus nameth L. Posthumius and M. Horatius. Dionysius Q. Horatius and Q. Minutius. The Capitol records, C. Horatius Pulvillus. And the Sicilian registers, Pulvillus and Angurinus.

Sp. Tarpeius. A. Atterius.

In Livy and Cassiodorus, and Dionysius, we find Coss. this yeer, Valerius with Sp. Virginius. But in the twelfth book of Diodorus M. Valerius Lactuca, and Sp. Virginius Tricostus. In Cuspinian Kalender Maximus and Calimontanus In the Sicilian, Maximus and Virginius. In that of the Capitol, M. Valerius Max. As for Lactucinus, Plinie sheweth, that it is a surname of the Valerii. Of these Consuls also, Censorinus maketh mention in his discourse of the plaies called Seculares.

P. Curiatius. Sext. Quintilius

According to Livy, Cassiodorus, and Dionysius, this yeer Veturius and T. Romulus entred upon the Consulship. Diodorus delivereth unto us C. Veturius Cicurinus, and T. Romulius Vaticanus. Cuspinians Kalender sheweth Geminus and Vaticanus. The Sicilian, Rocus and Veturius. The Capitol records, T. Romulius, son of T. nephew or sons son of T. Vaticanus. Of the same Romulius, Pliny also speaketh also 7 book, chapter 28.

Spurius Tarpeius ſon of M. and nephew of M. ſurnamed Montanus Capitolinus, the Kalender of Verrius Flaccus ſheweth unto us for one Conſuls this yeer. Of whom, Diodorus, Dionyſius, Livy, Pedianus upon Cicero his oration for Cornelius, and Caſſiodorus make mention ſave only the ſurnames. Cuſpinians book, and the Greek records, have Capitolinus. As for his colleague, they diſſent and diſagree. For Diodorus would have him to be Aulus Aſterius Fontinalis; but Dionyſius Aulus Termenius. Livy and Pliny, the ſeventh book, chapter ſeven and twenty, A. Æternius. Solinus chapter 4. Gell. 1 book, chapter 11. A. Thermus. Laſtly, Caſſiodorus, Au. Aterius. whom Sigonius and Onuphrius follow.

App. Claudius. T. Gentius.

Livy and Caſſiodorus likewiſe, report for this yeer Conſuls, Sext. Quintilius and P. Curiatius. Dionyſius, Sex. Quintilius and Horatius. Diodorus, Sex. Quintilius Tergeminus. The Capitol ſtones name him Sex. Quintilius, ſon of Sex. nephew of Pub. For this ſurname Tergeminus is common both to the Horatii and Curiatii. But Sigonius and Onuphrius allow Horatius rather.

Sex. Quintilius ſon of Sextus, nephew of Pub.

TO this Conſul the Greek records give the ſurname of Varus, and ſo the Capitoline tables of ſtone do repreſent him. But Diodorus, Dionyſius, Livy, and Caſſiodorus deliver the ſame man unto us without the ſurname. Who was his colleague, it is doubtfull. For by Dionyſius it is was P. Horatius: by Livy and Caſſiodorus, Pub. Curtatius: by Diodorus, Tergeminus; which is the ſurname as well of the Curiatii, as the Horatii. Onuphrius rather approveth of Curiatius.

Livy and Diodorus, together with the Capitoline regiſters (as far forth as may be gathered by the broken fragments of the tables ſhew that App. Claudius and T. Genutius were Coſſ. elect for this yeer, but they reſigned up the place, in regard of creating Decemvirs. Now at touching this Decemvirat, the law Terentia brought it into the commonweal: which law A. Terentius Arſa, a Tribune of the Commons promulged as touching five Quinquevirs to be created, who ſhould ſet down laws to gage the Coſſ. authority. For the Commons complained, that their government was too great and tolerable, and therefore requred that it might be abated and made more moderat. Which law, after he had been for ſix yeer together hotely canvaſſed by the Trib. to no effect in the end waxed cold again, by reaſon that the ſaid Trib. obtained a grant to double their own number. But afterwards upon the occaſion that Romulius and Veturius the Coſſ. bare themſelves too extream in rigor againſt the Com. refuſing warfare, the ſaid law was ſet on foot again, and ſuit followed more hotly then before. Whereupon when the LL. of the Senat were doubtfull what to do, at length they reſolved upon this point, whereof the principal adviſer was T. Romulius) to create certain lawgiver, who ſhould ſet down the rights and priviledges both of nobles and commons. And look what ordinances by them were decreed, the ſame ſhould bind both the one part and the other. The com. agreed to this determination: and ſo three Embaſſadors, Sp. Poſthumius Albus, Au Manlius Vulſo, and Serv. Sulpitius Camerinus, were ſent into Greece, to learn the ſtatuts, cuſtoms, rights, and laws of the Athenians and other Cities of Greece, and the ſame to bring to them to Rome. Theſe went their embaſſage when Atinius and Tarpeius were Conſul, and three yeers after returned with the ſaid laws, whiles Seſtius and Menenius were Conſuls. Now when the Tribuns were inſtant & called hard upon them, to begin once for to make theſe poſitive lawes; and now already Ap. Claudius and T. Genueius were elected coſſ. for this yeer; they paſſed an act of the Senat (according to the advice of App. Claudius) That other magiſtracies ſhould surceaſe, and 10 Decemvirs be created in conſular, nay roial authority abſolutly, without liberty of appealing from them to the people: who ſhonld chooſe as well out of their own cuſtoms and ordinances, as the forrain laws abovelaid, the beſt & moſt profitable to the common-weal, and ſet down the rights of the people of Rome: And look what they preſcribed and preſented (if the Senat and people of Rome allowed thereof) that ſhould ſtand in force & bind the whole body of the ſtate for ever. When this act was approved by the Commons, the Conſuls reſigned and gave over. In whoſe ſtead, were choſen Decemvirs conſular, namely, Ap. Claudius, T. Genutius, the ſame that gave up their Conſulſhip;) Spur. Poſthumius, Serv. Sulpitius, Au. Manlius, (thoſe that went in embaſſie from the Coſs. to Athens:) T. Romulius, C. Julius, P. Seſtius, Pub. Horatius, all men of conſular calling, and ſuch as had been Conſuls before. Beſides, Sp. Veturius, according to Livy, Diodorus, and Dionyſius: although Dionyſius called Poſthumius by the name of Publius and not Spurius as Livy, and Diodorus do. Likewiſe Livy forenameth Veturius, Lucius; Dionyſius Titus; but Diodorus and the Capiteline ſtones, Spurius. Theſe Decemvirs began their government in the 301 yeer after the foundation of the City, as Livy writeth, and after them Caſſiodorus goeth. But the avouchers of the Capitol records, ſay it was the yeer 302; & with them agreeth Solinus. But Varro (who Onuphrius followeth) accounteth the yeer 303. Theſe ſat in judgment and miniſtred juſtice to the people by turns every one his tenth day: on which day the ſaid chief juſtice bare the ſoveraign port, with his 12 Lictors before him; the other nine had but one ſergeant apeece to give attendance: and the ſingular concord among themſelves, which otherwhiles was an agreement profitable when they were private, proved exceeding great equity to others.

BY this time the Commons, beſides that they deteſted the name of Conſul, no leſs than KK. found no miſs of the Tribuns aſſiſtance, nor ſought once after it, ſeeing the Decemvirs yeeld one onto another in reciprocal appealing. With great affection therefore and endeavour, as well of nobles as commons, there were created for this year alſo Decemvirs in Conſuls authority abſolutly without appeal, Ap. Claudius the ſecond time, Q. Fabius who had been four times Conſul, M. Cornelius Maluginenſis brother of L. Cornelius, who had been Conſul in the year 295; M. Sergius, L. Minutius, T. Antonius Merenda, M. Rabuleius: and three likewiſe of the Commons, Q. Petilius, K. Duilius, and Sp. Oppius Cornicen, as witneſſeth Diodorus, Dionyſius, and Livy; although the gentile names for the moſt part are by Diodorus omitted.

305

WHen the more part of the former year was paſt, and that upon the adding of two other tables to the former ten, there remained no more to do, (in caſe the ſaid tables were once in the high court and aſſembly of the Centuries paſſed) why the common-weal ſhould have any need of the Decemvirs, inſomuch as the commons expected, that ſoon after, the ſolemn court and aſſembly aforeſaid for creation of Conſuls ſhould be publiſhed: then the Decemvirs without any word at all made of that election or aſſembly, came abroad guarded with whole troops of yong gentlemen Patritians, and demeaned themſelves more proudly and inſolently to every man. But before the year was fully expired, by occaſion of the lecherous luſt of Ap. Claudius, who challenged a maiden (one of the commons daughters) as a bond-ſervant, according as Livy more at large writeth; and alſo of the commons inſurrection and departing into the Aventine, the foreſaid Decemvirs gave over their Magiſtracy: and when Q. Furius the high Pontifex called a general aſſembly of the tribes, ten Tribuns of the Commons were again choſen: and ſo at length in another aſſembly of Centuries for the Conſuls, holden by the Interregent, created there were Conſuls,

THeſe Conſuls Onuphrius caſteth upon a third year of the Decemvirs (although Livy ſeemeth to diſſent) to the end that he might jump with the account of the Capitol, which he ſuppoſeth to be collected by Varro: for by their calculation, the triumphs of theſe Conſuls declared in the Capitol records, are engraven upon this very year, i. 304: ſo as it appeareth evidently, that part of this year was taken up by the Decemvirs, and part by the Conſuls. Tacitus and Rufus write, that the Decemvirs continued but two years.

Livius putteth down for Conſuls, Sp. Herminnus and T. Virginius Calimontanus. Caſſiodorus ſaith, L. Herminius and T. Virginius. Dionyſius writeth λεξον ἑρμιλιον, Τιτον ὐεργινιον: and Diodorus thus, λαξινον ἑρμιλιον, τ:ιον ὐεργινιον ϛρυκτον: the Greek records, Herminius, Tricoſtus: whereby Onuphrius feareth that it be corruptly written in Diodorus, Structus for Tricoſtus: for Structus was a ſurname of the Servilii and not of the Virginii. As for his colleague Herminius, that he is to be ſore-named Lars, beſides Diodorus and Dionyſius, Valerius alſo ſheweth in his tenth book, where he writeth thus: The ſore-name of Lars is derived from the Lares.

307

THeſe are recorded likewiſe to be the Conſuls this year. The ſurname Macerinus is ſuppreſſed by Caſſiodorus and Diodorus, who alſo nameth the other L. Julius. In Dionyſius certain pages be wanting in this place. Cuſpinian his Kalender hath for Macerinus, Macrinus.

Dionyſius and Livy both, name the Conſ. of this year, T. Quintius Capitolinus the fourth time, and Agrippa Furius. Diodorus and Caſſiodorus conceal the ſurname and the numeral note of four. The Greek records have Furius and Capitolinus. Onuphrius unto Furius addeth the ſurnames of the grandſire, to wit, Medullinus Fuſus.

M. Genutius. C. Curtius.

Livy delivereth unto us for Conſ. this year, M. Genutius, and P. Curiatius. Caſſiodorus likewiſe M. Genutius and P. Curiatius: but Dionyſius, M. Genutius and C. Quintius: and Diodorus hath, M. Genutius and Agrippa Curtius Chilo. But as Sigonius, and after him Onuphrius have noted, it is falſly read in Livy, Curiatius for Curtius; and that is proved by the authority of Varro de lingua latina: and therefore in the Sicilian regiſters written they are, Genutius and Curtius.

310

T. Clœlius.
L. Atilius.
} Military Tribuns in Conſular authority: upon whoſe reſignation Conſuls were choſen in their room.

WHen C. Canuleius a Tribune of the Commons, had the former year publiſhed a ſecond ſecond law, That one of the Conſuls ſhould be created out of the Commons, (whereby the dignity of the Patritii was empaired) the nobles fearing leſt the ſaid law would paſs in deed maugre their heads, drew to a point; whereof C. Claudius made the firſt motion and was the adviſer, That in ſtead of Conſuls there ſhould be created military Tribuns, three of the Patritii, and as many of the Commons; who being endued with Conſular authority, ſhould govern the common-weal. Alſo, that when their years government was expired, the advice both of Senat and alſo of people ſhould be once again required, Whether they would have Conſuls rather than Tribunes conſular? and look which pleaſed them, they ſhould be created. Theſe points being reſolved upon and decreed, three military Tribunes were created only, all Patritii: and well enough were the Commons content therewith, becauſe themſelves were eligible and capable of that dignity. Howbeit, this regiment of theirs newly ſet up, ſtood not firmly eſtabliſhed. For within 3 months after, by a decree of the Augurs, they reſigned up their honourable place, as if there had been ſome error committed in their election: and then T. Quintius Barbatus (nominated Interregent) created Conſuls, L. Papyrius Mugillanus, and L. Sempronius Atratinus. The Conſuls are leſt out in the Sicilian regiſters. Well ſaith Livy therefore, that theſe Conſuls are found neither in ancient annals and yearly records, nor yet in the Kalender of the Magiſtrats. But Cicero maketh mention of them in his Epiſtle to Papyrius Paetus.

M. Geganius Macerinus II. T. Quintius Capitolinus. V.

Dionyſius and Caſſiodorus avouch theſe for Conſuls this year. As for Dionyſius, he ſaith that they entred in the month of December. Caſſius concealeth both their ſurnames, and Diodorus the one, namely, Capitolinus. The Greek records have Macrinus the ſecond time, and Capitolinus the fifth time. Zonaras nameth them Macrinus and Barbatus.

M. Fab. Vibulanus. Poſtumus Ebutius Cornicen.

Livy ſaith, that Conſuls of this year, were ſo named. Diodorus and Caſſiodorus are ſilent in their ſurnames. The Greek records have Vibulanus and Helua. Diodorus attributeth to Ebutius the ſurname of Ἄλκων, but what manner of addition that might be, Sigonius knoweth not; and thinketh that it ſhould be read, ὁ Ἄλβας.

313

C. Furius Pacilus. M. Papyrius Craſſus.

Theſe Conſuls by Livy and Caſſodorus are in this wiſe repreſented unto us. But by Diodorus after this ſort, Q. Furius Fuſus, and Manius Papirius Craſſus. And by the Greek records thus, Pacilus and Craſſus.

Livius and Caſſiodordus, deliver theſe Conſuls thus fully named, Proculus Geganius Macerinus, and L. Menenius Lanatus. Diodorus, T. Menenius, and Proculus Geganius Macrinus. The Sicilian regiſters, Macerinus and Lanatus.

By Livy and Caſſiodorus, theſe were the Conſuls for this year: but after Diodorus, T. Quintius, and T. Menenius. According to the Sicilian rolls, Menenius and Capitolinus.

Mam. Æmylius. L. Quintius ſon of Cincinnatus. L. Iulius. } Mili. Tribu. in Conſ. authority.

The Tribuns of the Commons imported and prevailed, that there ſhould be an election holden for Tribuns military, rather than Conſuls; making no doubt, but in the chuſing of ſix (for ſo many now by law might be created) ſome of the commoners by making profeſſion that they would be revenged for the death of Melius, would ſtep into the place: howbeit the Commons created no more than three Tribuns with Conſular authority, and among them L. Quintius, the ſon of Cincinnatus. In which election, Mumerius Æmylius, a right honorable man and of great worth, was by their ſuffrages preferred before Quintius, and Julius they made the third. In like manner, Diodorus nameth three Tribuns military for this year; but in this ſort, M. Æmylius Mamercus, C. Inlius, and L. Quintius.

M. Geganius Macerinus III. L. Sergius Fidenas.

When the Commons, together with their Tribuns were quiet, and carefully regarded the main ſtate of the Common-weal, no queſtion there was nor controverſy, but that Coſſ. were choſen, to wit, M. Geganius Macerinus the third time, and L. Sergius, ſo ſaith Livius. Caſſiodorus doth the ſame, but that he ſetteth down the names of the Coſſ. only in this wiſe, M. Geganius the third time, and L. Sergius, without ſurnames. Diodorus likewiſe, M. Geganius and L. Sergius. Cuſpinians Kalender, and the Sicilian regiſters, Macerinus and Fidenas. For this Sergius was ſurnamed Fidenas (as Livy reporteth) by occaſion of the war which he made againſt the Fidenats.

M. Cornelius Maluginenſis. L. Papirius Craſſus.

Livy and Caſſiodorus report theſe above-named, for this year Conſuls. Diodorus nameth them, L. Papirius and A. Corn. Macerinus: but doubtleſs not without error, as Sigonius ſuppoſeth: for both in Cuſpinians Kalender and the rolls of Sicily, we find Maluginenſis and Craſſus.

C. Julius II. L. Virginius.

THeſe Conſuls are found for this yeer in Livy and Caſſiodorus; but in Diodorus C. Julius and Proculus Virginius Tricoſtus. In Cuſpinians Kalender and the Sicilian records, Julius and Virginius.

320

C. Julius III. } or { M. Manlius.
L. Virginius II. } or { Q. Martius.

I Find in Licinius Macer, that the ſame Coſſ. were choſen again for the yeer following, to wit, Julius the third time, and Virginius the ſecond. Valerius Antias and Quin. Tubero alledg for this yeers Conſuls, M. Manlius, and Q. Sulpitius. But in theſe ſo different records of theirs, Tubero and Macer both profeſſe to go by the linnen books; and neither of them diſſembleth but that the ancient writers report of military Tribuns that yeer created. As for Licinius, he doubteth not to follow thoſe linen records, and Tubero cannot reſolve of the truth. But among other things, which by continuance of time are unknown, this alſo is left uncertain. Thus much Livy. But Diodorus in ſtead of Conſuls, ſetteth down three military Tribunes, namely, M. Manlius, Q. Sulpitius Pretextatus, and Servius Cornelius Coſſus. The Greek records (following Antias and Tubero) have delivered to us Conſuls, Capitolinus and Camerinus.

321

M. Fabius Vibulanus. } Tribunes military in Conſuls authority.
Sergius Fedenas. }
Marcus Foſtius. }

THe Tribuns of the Commons in their orations continually forbad the the elections of Conſuls: and when they had brought it ſo about; that the goverment was at the point of interregency, they wan the maſtery in the end, that the military Tribuns might be choſen with Conſular authority. But reward of this victory which they ſhot at, namely, to have a commoner created, they obtained none: for out of the Patritii, namely M. Fabius Vibulanus, M. Feſtius, Ln. Sergius Fidenas. Thus much Livy. Diodorus likewiſe nameth three, but corruptly, to wit, M. Fabius. Μ φαλίνιος, and L. Servillius. As for Foſtius in ſome of the Capitol monuments, he is writen Flaccinator and not Folius, as in the common editions of Livy, whom Diodorus calleth φαλίνιος.

322

L. Panarius Mamercus. } Tribunes military in Conſuls authority.
L. Furius Medullinus. }
Sp. Poſthumius Albus. }

NO motion was made of Conſuls election. So Tribunes military were created in Conſuls authority theſe, Pinarius Mamercus, L. Furius Medullinus, and Spurius Poſthumius Albus; as Livy writeth. In Diodorus they are named thus, L. Furius Sp. . . . Pinarius Mamercus.

323

Julius Mento.

An act of the Senat paſſed, that an election of Coſſ. ſhould be holden, wherein T. Quintius, [ſon of Lucius] Cincinnatus, ſurnamed alſo Pennus, and C. Julius Mento, were made Conſuls, ſaith Livy. The ſame Coſſ. Caſſiodorus alſo avoucheth. The Greek records have Pennus and Mento: But Diodorus nameth them barely T. Quintius and Caius Julius.

THe Tribuns of the Commons made much ado, and kept a convaiſing in the City that Tribuns military in Conſuls authority ſhould be created, but could not prevail. So Conſuls were choſen, L. Papirius Craſſus and L. Junius. So ſay Livy and Caſſiodore: but Diodorus nameth them falſly, Caius Papirius and L. Junius: the Greek records, Craſſus and Julius.

L. Ser. Fadenas II. Hoſtus Lucretius Tricipitinus

THe Conſuls this yeer in Caſſiodorus, are L. Sergius and Hoſtus Lucretius: in Diodorus Opiter Lucretius and L. Sergius Fidenas: in Livy L. Sergius Fidenas the ſecond time, and Hoſtus Lucretius Tricipitinus. In the Sicilian regiſters, Tricipitinus and Fidenas. Of theſe Valerius maketh mention in his Epitome.

A. Cornelius Coſſus. T. Quintius Pennus II.

THeſe Conſuls are named by Livy and Caſſiodorus for this yeer. But Diodorus avoucheth L. Quintius and Sempronius; but corruptly, as Sigonius and Onuphrius ſuppoſe. For in the Sicilian records are writen, Coſſus and Pennus, the ſurnames of Cornelius and Quintius. Of theſe Conſuls Livy ſpake before, in the yeer 316.

327

C. Servilius Ahala. L. Papirius Mugillanus

Livy and Caſſiodorus, name Conſuls for this yeer, C. Servilius Ahala, and L. Papirius Mugillanus. Diodorus for Ahala putteth down Structus: for well it may be, that Structus was alſo called Ahala.

328

T. Quintius Pennus. } Tribunes military in Coſſ. authority.
M. Poſthumius. }
C. Furius. }
A. Cornelius Coſſus. }

THe Commons caried it cleer, that no Coss. this yeer were created: for four there were elected military Tribunes in Consuls authority, namely, T. Quintius Pennus immediately upon his Consulship, M. Posthumius, C. Furius, & An Cornelius, Cossi. Thus writeth Livy: and the same Diodorus nameth.

329

A. Sempronius Atratinus.
L. Quintius Cincinnatus. } Tribuns Military in L. Furius Medullinus. } Coss. authority.
L. Horatius Barbatus.

THese abovenamed (as Livy reporteth) were Tribuns military in Consuls authority this yeer. Diodorus leaveth out their surnames, and L. Horatius full and whole.

330

Ap. Claud. the Decemvirs son.
Sp. Nautius Rutilus. } Tribunes military in Consuls authority.
L. Sergius Fidenas.
Sext. Iulius Iulus.

These Tribunes military in Coss. authority Livy seteth down for this yeer. The same doth Diodorus also nominate, all but their surnames, and App. Claudius whom he called Titus. Livy moreover saith, that there were two Spurii Nautii Rutili, Tribunes in those daies: but no doubt, as Onuphrius thinketh, there is some error in the copies of the book) the one who is now the first time, and a second time shall be in the yeer 338; the other, who was first in the yeer 335, and once again in the yeer 350 of the Capitol monuments of stone have the same: but they shew that the one was but once, and the other thrice Tribune.

C. Sempronius Atratinus. Q. Fabius Vibulanus

THe Consuls this yeer created were according to Livius and Cassiodorus, C. Sempronius Atratinus and Q. Fabius Vibulanus [Diodorus overpasseth them] whom Livy reporteth to have entred into government, upon the Ides of December. Of C. Sempronius Atratinus Consul, Valerius writeth six book, cap. 5. whom he forenameth Lucius: but in the third book and second chapter, he speaketh of both, although untruely; for Q. Fabius, he nameth Q. Catulus.

L. Manlius Capitolinus.
Q. Antonius Merenda. } Tribunes military in L. Papyrius Mugillanus } Consuls authority.
L. Servillius Structus.

THe Senat being offended with the very name of Consuls for the hatred they bare to Sempronius, commanded Tribuns military to be created with Consuls authority. And these they were, L. Manlius Capitolinus, Q. Antonius Merenda, and Papyrius Mugillanus. Thus much Livy, in whose story the name is missing of the fourth, to wit, L. Servilius Structus, who in the yeer 337, is found engraven in the Capitol stones, Tribunes military the second time. Of these, Diodorus saith not a word. In a fragment of the Capitoline marble, there is to be seen the surname of Mugillanus, belonging to L. Papirius.

T. Quintius Capitolinus. N. Fabius Vibulanus

NOt only Livy, but Cassiodorus also recordeth that the Coss. this yeer were N. Fabius Vibulanus and T. Quintius Capitolanus, Diodorus over-passed them; but so do not the Sicilian registers. In a fragment of the Capitol marbles, we find engraven T. Quintius Capitolinus Barbatus and N. Fabius. This Fabius was the son of Q. Fabius the Decemvir, who after the 300 Fabii slain in Cremera, survived and was the first of all that kindred and family surnamed Numerius (as Valerius Maximus in his 10 book, and Sex. Pompeius do report. As for T. Quintius son he was (as Livy writeth) to that Capitolinus who was Consul six times.

An Interregency.

WHen the greater part of the yeer was spent in troubles and contentions, between the new Trib. of the Commons and certain Interregents, while the Tribuns one while would not suffer the Patritii to go together about the declaring of an interregent, and another while impeached the Interregent that he could not passe an act of the Senat for the election of Consuls: at length L. Papirius Mugillanus the Interregent, by rebuking as well the Senators as the Tribunes of the Commons, prevailed, that an assembly should be holden for chusing of Tribunes consular. So there were created Tribunes military with Consuls authority, and all Patritii, T. Quintius Cincinnatus the third time, L. Furius Medullinus, M. Manlius, L. Sempronius Atratinus. Thus much Livy.

A. Menenius Lanatus.
P. Lucretius Tricipitinus } Trib. military in Coss.
Sp. Nautius. } authority.
C. Servilius.

MIlitary Tribuns with Consuls authority for this yeer, are set down by Livy Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, P. Lucretius Tricipitinus, and P. Nautius: for the name of the fourth is wanting; and that was C. Servilius, son of Quintius and nephew of Caius, surnamed Axilla; who the yeer following, in the Capitol tables is numbered among the Tribunes consular, with the numerall note of II. So as it must needs be, that he was the first time in the yeer, for as much as no other fit void place left for him. Diodorus nameth Sp. Veturius.

L. Sergius Fidenas.
M. Papirius Mugillanus.
C. Servilius Priscus.
} Tribunes militarie in Consuls authority.

FOr Tribunes Consular this yeer, Livy nameth these. This C. Servilius, is by Verrius Flaccus named Axilla. Diodorus calleth them L. Sergius, M. Servilius, and M. Papirius. Now this M. Papirius was son to L. Papirius Mugillanus the Censor.

P. Lucretius Tricipitinus. Sp. Veturius Crassus.

ALl these are recorded by Livy, for Trib. military this yeer. Of these L. Servilius Structus was the first time in the 332 yeer, but left out in Livy through fault of those that wrote the copies. Diodorus hath the same Tribune besides the surnames, and L. Servilius, whom he called Caius. In a Capitoline table their names are thus cut P. Lucretius son of Hostus, Agrippa Menenius son of T. nephew of Agrippa.

338

A. Sempronius Atratinus. III
Sp. Nautius Rutilius II.
Papirius Mugillanus.

ONly these are by Livy recorded: but that the pen-men who wrote out the books, left out the fourth Tribun of this yeer Quintius Fabius son of Quintus nephew of Marcus, surnamed also Vibulanus) the Capitol stones and Diodorus do testifie. Livy himself also doth shew the same, who writeth, that Quintius Fabius was Tribune military the second time, in the yeer three hundred and forty: but in what yeer he was first, it appeareth not. Moreover, An. Sempronius is by Verrius Flaccus named the son of Lucius and nephew of Aulus. Diodorus reckoneth all four, but he concealeth their surnames.

339

P. Cornelius Cossus. | Q. Cincinnatus
C Valerius Potitus, | N. Fabius Vibulanus

THese doth Livy deliver unto us for Tribuns military in Consuls authority. Diodorus in this wise, P. Cornelius, Caius . . . Fabius. The table of the Capitol thus, P. Cornelius . . . F. nephew of P. C. Valerius, son of L. nephew of Volusus, the forename of Quintius is unknown.

340

Q. Fabius Vibulanus II. Posthumius Regillensis

THese declareth Livius for this yeer: but Diodorus, Titus Posthumius, Caius Cornelius, C. Valerius, and Caso Fabius. But Verrius Flaccus nameth P. Posthumius son of A. nephew also of Aulus; whom Livy writeth to have been stoned to death by his own army for his cruelty

341

Cn. Cornelius Cossus. C. Furius Medullinus.

THen the Nobles and LL. of the Senat imported, that there should be Consuls created in the Centuriat assembly, which Q. Fabius held. And the Consuls were M. Cornelius Cossus, and L. Furius Medullinus. The same are named by Diodorus, and Cassiodorus, but that they leave out their surnames. The Greek records have Cossus and Medullinus.

342

Q. Fabius Ambustus. C. Furius Pacilus.

Livy and Cassiodorus name these for Consuls: Diodorus, suppresseth their surnames.

343

M. Papyrius. C. Nautius Rutilus.

BOth Livy and Cassiodorus report for this yeer Consuls, M. Papyrius and C. Nautius Rutilus. Diodorus hath not a word of the surnames. Cuspinians book setteth them down by the surnames only Mugillanus and Rutilus.

M. Æmylius C. Valerius.

Livy and Cassiodorus call these Consuls, M Æmylius and C. Valerius. Diodorus in stead of M. hath M. i. Manius, This Æmylius in the table of the Capitol, is named in his first and third Tribunship, M. Æmylius son of Manius, nephew of M. and surname Mamercinus.

Livy putteth these down for the Consuls of this yeer. Cassiodorus passeth over their surnames and the numerall note of two. Diodorus hath L. Furius and Cn. Pompeius: but he is to be written Cn. Cornelius, out of the end of a broken fragment in the Capitol: and the other L. Furius, by his Tribuneship testified in the Capitol records.

346

C. Julius Julus
P. Cornelius Cossus
C. Servilius Ahala
} Tribunes militarie in Consuls authority.

THese are set down for Tribunes military this yeer by T. Livius. Diodorus saith nothing of their surnames, which the Capitoline tables exhibit unto us. C. Servilius is writen in the second Tribuneship (after the Capitol records) the son of Pub. and nephew of Q. surnamed Ahala.

347

N. Fabius Vibulanus II. C. Servilius Ahala II.

Livy reporteth, that the four Tribuns consular were all Patritii this yeer, & had born that dignity once before, to wit, L. Furius Medullinus, C. Valerius Potitus, N. Fabius Vibulanus and C. Servilius Ahala; and then this man last named was chosen again and continued in his place still this yeer with the former, as well in regard of other vertues as for the fresh favour and late grace gotten by his singular moderation and rare carriage in his government. Diodorus hath C. Furius. C. Servilius C. Valerius, and N. Fabius. In the Capitoline tables, two are written short, Potitus Volusus II and Medullinus, the other two at full; wherby it doth appear (as Onuphrius reporteth that Livy was deceived. For Medullinus was not this year Tribune the second time, but the first: who had been twice Consul before, and after this yeer, will be no lesse then seven times Tribune military.

348

| P. Cornelius Cossus. | N. Fabius Ambustus. |
| Cn. Cornelius Cossus. | L. Valerius Potitus. |

OF these four Tribuns military, L. Valerius Potitus and N. Fabius Ambustus stand upon record in the Capitol tables; the othe two, as appeareth by a fragment thereof, by Livy also and Cassiodorus, were Pub. Cornelius, son of Aulus, nephew of M. Rutilus Cossus, so written by his dictatorship. Diodorus reckoneth Terentius Maximus for the fourth Tribun.

| Q. Quintius Cincinnatus | L. Furius Medullinus III |

Diodorus saith, that this yeer six Tribunes were created, but he nameth but three, T. Quintius Capitolinus, C. Julius, and Au. Manlius. Livy rehearseth them all as here they be set down. The Capitoline stone hath Julus. II. Capitolinus Barbatus, Cincinnatus, and the other three. And this was the first yeer that had six Tribunes military, notwithstanding that the law permitted it before, at what time as first it was granted that Tribunes should be created: and in this yeer began the siege first before Veii.

| M. Sergius Fidenas. | K. Fabius Ambustus. |

THe same Tribunes that Livy nameth, Diodorus also rehearseth, but that he leaveth out the surnames, and corruptly calleth Cn. Cornelius by the name of Junius Lucullus. In the Capitoline stones they are written, Maluginensis, Cossus, II. Ambustus: and the other three fully out. Nautius Rutilus Livy nameth the second time, but Verrius Flaccus the third time.

| App. Claudius Crassus. | M. Posthumius. |
| M. Furius Camillus. | M. Posthumius Albinus. |

Livy writeth that the number of Tribunes military were by the Romans augmented, and eight of them created, which were more then ever any time before, whose names we have set down. In Diodorus they are thus named, Manius Claudius, Mar. Quintilius, Lu. Julius M. Furius, L. Valerius. And albeit there be wanting in him some Tribunes, yet Onuphrius thinketh, and so doth Sigonius, that himself by his own writing delivered not eight, but six: which Verrius Flaccus also observed in the Capitoline tables.

| C. Servilius Ahala. III. | Q. Sulpitius. |
| Q. Servilius. | A. Manlius. |
| L. Virginius. | M. Sergius. II. |

IN Livy the Tribunes military in Consuls authority are C. Servilius Ahala the third time Quin. Servilius, and Lu. Virginius: the rest as in the tables of the Capitol, but only the forenames. Livy nameth Qu. Servilius Fidenas in the other six Tribunships following which he shall bear. To Lucius Virginius, Onuphrius addeth Tricostus, a surname usually in that house. Diodorus squareth not out of this range, but as Sigonius noteth, he doth fault in the name. χλαύδιος μάρκος ἄγκος. In the fragment of the Capitol, they are thus named. Q. Sulpitius the son of Servius. N. Camerinus Coruntus, Au. Manlius, son of Aulus, nephew of C. Volso Capitolinus the second time, M. Sergius son of Lucius nephew of Lucius, surnamed Fidenas, the second time.

| M. Furius Camillus. | K. Fabius Ambustus. |
| M. Æmy. Mamercinus. III. | L. Iulius Julus |

Livy reckoneth all these Tribunes this yeer. Diodorus putteth down Lu. Julius. M. Furius, Æmylius Mamercus. Caius Cornelius, Caso Fabius παῦλος σέξτιος, but amisse. In the fragments of the Capitol, they are thus named, Lucius Julius son of Lucius, nephew of Vopiscus surnamed Julus. Marcus Æmylius, son of Manius, nephew of Mar. Mamercus. K. Fabius son of Marcus, nephew of Qu. Ambustus the second time. These were commanded to enter into government upon the first day of October (whereas the thirteenth of December was the usual day beforetime) by reason of an overthrow received the former yeer at Veii by M. Sergius. Camillus made an expedition in the Falisciens countrey, Cornelius to the Capenats, Valerius to the Volscians for the recovery of Anxur, Æmylius and Fabius to besiege Veii.

THese by T. Livius are this yeer named the Tribunes military. But Diodorus rehearseth only three, namely, P. Melius, Sp. Manius and L. Furius. But Onuphrius thinketh that he is to be read, not L. Furius but Sp Furius. The same author hath put to P. Licinius, the surname of Calvus, whom Livy writeth to have been the first man of the commonalty chosen Tribune military, only to take possession of the said right and interest.

355

M. Veturius. M. Pomponius.
C. Duilius. Volero Publilius.

THese Diodorus sheweth for Tribuns. But Livy setteth down Marcus Veturius to have been the only Patritian, and the rest commoners, namely, M. Pomponius, C. Duilius, Volero Publilius, Cn. Genutius, L. Atilius, Cuspinian his book, who every yeer delivereth the names only of two Tribunes, hath Augurinus and Longus, surnames of Genutius & Atilius.

356

L. Valerius Potitus. V. L. Furius Medullinus.
M. Valerius Max. Q. Servilius Fidennus. II.
M. Furius Camillus. II. Q. Sulpitius Camerinus.

ALl these Tribuns military for this yeer created were Patritii, as Livy writeth: neither differeth Diodorus although he recite two names corruptly, to wit, κλαυδιος ὕγων, καμάρι-ες ἄπιος. Plutarch in the life of Camillus maketh mention, of the said Camillus, the second time Tribune military; and the Capitoline stone of Medullinus the third time.

IN this wise Livy reckoneth them, but Diodorus L. Sergius, A. Posthumius, P. Cornelius σέξτον κέντιον, Q. Manlius ἀγήτιον καμιλὸν. But in those two Greek-written names, as Sigonius & Onuphrius, observeth there is a foul errour.

P. Licinius. P. F. Calvus. L. Titinius. II.
P. Menius II. P. Melius. II.
Cn. Genutius. II. L. Atilius. II.

IN this maner are these Tribunes military delivered us unto by Livy. But Diodorus names them tous, L. Titinius, P. Licinius, P. Malius, Q. Manius, Cn. Genutius, and L. Atilius. All these, but L. Licinius the son of Publius (as Livy saith) bare the dignity of Tribunship a little before: who writeth moreover, that Genutius was slain in a battel against the Falisc ins.

P. Cornelius Cossus. P. Cornelius Scipio.
L. Fabius Ambustus. IV. L. Furius Medullinus IV.
M. Valerius Max. II. Q. Servilius. III.

AFter the winning of Veii, this year had for Tribunes military in Consuls authority, those above-named. Diodorus calleth P. and Ser. Cornelius both, Cossi: in the rest, saving that he concealeth their surnames, he agreeth.

L. Valerius Poplicola. M. Furius Camillus.

Livy nameth these in this yeer. Diodorus, M. Furius Æmylius, κάτλον βήγον, but Camillus now is the third time. Sigonius and Onuphrius think, that by P. Cornelius we must understand Scipio, and not Cossus. This yeer Camillus Tribune military, by his just dealing reduced the Falisc ians to the obeisance of the people of Rome; in that he sent back unto them, that schoolmaster who betrayed their children: as Livy and Plutarch write. Valerius (not without some suspition of error) writeth in his first book, that Camillus did this being Consul: whereas Plutarch saith, he was never Consul.

L. Lucretius Flavus. Serv. Sulpitius Camerinus.

AFter fifteen yeers (saith Livy) Coss. were created again L. Lucretius Falvus, & Serv. Sulpitius Camerinus. Diodorus and Cassidorus passe over the surnames. The Sicilian registers do shew, Flavus, and Camerinus.

Veturius Valerius Potitus and M. Manlius surnamed afterwards Capitolinus, are by Livy reported Consuls this yeer. Dionysius in his first book maketh mention of these Consuls, naming them L. Valerius Potitus, and T. Manlius Capitolinus. Cassiodorus delivereth them by the names of I. Valerius and M. Manlius. Diodorus, of L. Valerius and A. Manlius: but the Sicilian registers, of Potitus and Capitolinus.

Serv. Sulpitius. Agrippa Furius.
M. Æmylius. C. Æmylius II.

BY occasion that the Coss. lay sick, though good it was, to renew the government by means of an interregency: therefore after they had deposed the Coss. by an act of the Senat, six Trib. military were created with Consular authority, by the Interregent: who upon the first day of July began their magistracy, as Livy saith. Diodorus mentioneth but four, namely, L. Lucretius, Serv. Sulpitius, C. Æmylius, and Lu. Furius. As for Sulpitius, Zonaras calleth him Rufus; which surname Onuphrius also hath put unto him.

Howbeit, there is wanting in Livy the name of the sixt Tribune, whom (out of Diodorus) Sigonius and Onuphrius have set to the rest, by the name of C. Cornelius. Diodorus also for Sergius hath Servilius, and Æmylius for Fabius.

| M. Furius Camillus V. | Ser. Sulpitius Rufus II. |
| C. Papirius Crassus. | T. Quint. Cincinnatus II. |

THese Tribunes military in Coss. authority, in this manner be delivered unto us by Livy: but Diodorus (as his manner is) putteth down four; Serv. Sulpitius, L. Papirius, Mar. Cornelius, and T. Quintius. In this year, M. Manlius attainted and condemned for aspiring to be K. was thrown down headlong from the rock Tarpeia: Liv. Plutarch. and Valer.

| L. Valerius IV. | L. Lucretius. |
| A. Manlius III. | L. Æmylius. |
| Ser. Sulpitius III. | M. Tribonius. |

Livy rangeth these in this year. Diodorus nameth four; L. Valerius, Crispus, (which is the name of Tribonius) Au. Manlius, and Serv. Sulpitius. Crispus, some call Flavus.

|---|---|
| Sp. Papirius. | Q. Servilius. |
| L. Papirius. | C. Sulpitius. |
| Ser. Cornelius IV. | L. Æmylius IV. |

ACcording to Livy, these were created Tribunes military in Consuls authority. The surname of Cornelius (as we saw before) was Maluginensis. Diodorus writeth four; Q. Servilius, Sp. Papirius, Cornelius, φάβι ϑ ἄλβϑ, but not truly.

| M. Furius Camillus VI. | L. Furius. |
| A. Posthumius Regillensis. | L. Lucretius. |
| L. Posthumius Regillensis. | M. Fabius Ambustus. |

Livy nameth these as we have placed them: but Diodorus in this wise: M. and L. both Furii, A. Posthumius, L. Lucretius, M. Fabius, and L. Posthumius. Plutarch also nameth Camillus Tribune military this year; wherein he vanquished the Prenestins, the Volscians, and the Tusculans also, against whom war was proclaimed, because they had served in the field under the Prenestins.

| L. Valerius V. | L. Menenius II. |
| L. Valerius III. | P. Papirius. |
| C. Sergius III. | Ser. Corn. Maluginensis. |

THese six are set down by Livy: but Diodorus reckoneth eight, namely, L. and P. both Valerii,

|---|---|
| P. Manlius. | C. Sextilius. |
| C. Manlius. | M. Albinus. |
| L. Julius. | L. Antiſtius. |

AFter this, was the generall aſſembly holden for the election of military Tribunes in Conſuls authority, wherein were as many created of the Commoners as of the Patritii; namely, P. and C. both Manlii, with L. Julius, Patritians: and out of the Commons, C. Sextilius, M. Albinus, and L. Antiſtius. But Diodorus exhibiteth eight, and to theſe above rehearſed, he addeth C. Herenucius, and P. Trebonius. Sextilius alſo he calleth Sextius.

|---|---|
| Sp. Furius. | P. Cœlius. |
| Q. Servilius II. | M. Horatius. |
| C. Licinius. | L. Geganius. |

Livy reporteth theſe for Tribunes military in Conſuls authority this year: but in Livy, for Lu. Menenius the third time, you muſt read C. Licinius, as Sigonius hath ſhewed in his Scholia upon Livy: which Onuphrius alſo in his Kalender approveth. But Diodorus ſpeaketh of no more than four; Q. Servilius, C. Licinius, L. Furius, P. Cœlius.

|---|---|
| L. Æmylius | Ser. Sulpitius. |
| P. Valerius IV. | L. Quintius Cincinnatus. |
| C. Veturius. | C. Quintius Cincinnatus. |

THeſe Tribunes military, the Conſuls (being forced by the might and ſtrong hand of the great men of the City) choſe all Patritians, as Livy witneſſeth. The ſame alſo are named by Diodorus excepting only C. Quintius, who is called by him C. Cornelius. As for Serv. Sulpitius he was ſurnamed Prætextatus. Zonaras nameth him Rufus.

| C. Licinius Stolo. | } Tribunes of the Commons five years. |
| L. Sextius. | |

IN this year hapned the fourth change of the Roman government: for the adminiſtration of the weal publike, fell from Tribunes military in conſuls authority, to the Tribunes of the commons. The authors that procured this mutation, were (as Livy reporteth) C. Licinius Stolo and L. Sextius, Tribunes of the commons, who in the former year having promulged three laws in favour of the commons and againſt the power of the Patritii, the firſt for redreſſing of debts; a ſecond for a ſtint of lands and poſſeſſions; & the third, that there ſhould be no more elections of Tribunes military, and that one of the conſuls ſhould neceſſarily be choſen a commoner: ſeeing they could not go through with theſe laws, by reaſon of their own fellows oppoſitions (whom of purpoſe the Nobles had made for themſelves) fell into an anger, and would ſuffer no other Magiſtrats of State to be created, nor any election to be holden, but only of Ædiles and Tribunes, both of commons. This deſolate eſtate and want of Magiſtrates (whiles the commons made the ſame Tribunes ſtill, who with inceſſant and invincible perſiſtance never gave over to croſs the election of Tribunes military) continued in the city for the ſpace of five years, as Livy ſaith. This want of Magiſtrates Diodorus calleth ἀναρχία, and calleth it upon the former year. But Sext. Rufus, Eutropius, Caſſiodorus, and Zonaras write that they ruled the ſtate not five years, but four only. Sigonius and Onuphrius in his Kalender, follow Livy, & his Annals it ſeemeth that the capitoline writers go by. Pliny alſo in the ſixteenth book, and four and fortieth chapter, maketh mention of the year three hundred ſeventy nine from the foundation of the city, in which year he ſaith that at Rome

| L. Furius. | Ser. Cornelius. |
| A. Manlius. | P. Valerius. |
| Ser. Sulpitius. | C. Valerius. |

WHen C. Licinius and L. Sextius the Tribunes gave over their oppoſition and the liberty of their negative voice, whereby the Interregent called and held an aſſembly for the election of Magiſtrates, the abovenamed Tribunes military, were (as Livy ſaith) created for this year. Diodorus nameth them thus, L. Papirius L. Menenius, Ser. Cornelius, and Ser. Sulpitius, who writeth alſo, that after them there was another Anarchy, and when that was overpaſt and gone, then were created A. Manlius, L. Furius, Serv. Sulpitius, and Serv. Cornelius. But in his ſtory, as well through his own default, as the negligence of the writers that copied out ſame, there is a confuſion of yearly Magiſtrates.

| Q. Servilius. | M. Cornelius. |
| C. Veturius. II. | Q. Quintius. |
| A. Cornelius. | M. Fabius. |

THis year alſo, as Livy writeth, had theſe for Tribunes military in Conſuls authority. But Diodorus hath Q. Servilius, C. Veturius, A. Cornelius, M. Cornelius, and M. Fabius: as for Quintius, Sigonius calleth him rather Cincinnatus than Capitolinus. The reſt have their warrant out of the Capitoline fragments, wherein it is thus found Coſſus . . . . . Maluginenſis . . . Cinninnatus . . . M. Fabius Ambuſtus. This is that M. Fabius Ambuſtus, who had beſtowed his two daughters in marriage, the one to C. Licinius Stolo, the other to Serv. Sulpitius Prætextatus, as Livy writeth.

Serv. Sulpitius. Sp. Servilius.
L. Papirius. L. Veturius.

Livy declareth these six for Tribunes military this year. Diodorus rehearseth but three, namely, T. Quintius, Servilius Cornelius, and Servius Sulpitius. What surnames all these carried, and with what numerall notes (signifying how often they had born the office) they are to be marked, the Capitoline fragments do shew; wherein they stand thus, Capitolinus .·.· Maluginensis. II. Prætextatus. IIII. Sp. Servilius Structus, L. Papirius Crassus, L. Veturius Crassus Cicurinus.

386

Two Dictators without any curule Magistrats of State besides.

PResently in the very beginning of the year, they proceeded to put it to the triall of a finall issue, what should become of the foresaid laws proposed by Licinius and Sextius. When the tribes were called to give their voices, and the publishers of the laws were not hindred by the negatives of their Colleagues coming between; the Nobles began then to quake for fear, and in all haste betook them to their two last helps and means of refuge, the soveraign and absolute government, and the principal Citizen and greatest man of all others. Resolve they did to nominate a Dictator, and Marcus Furius Camillus was the man; who took unto him for General of the horsemen L. Æmylius. But when the Captains and ring-leaders of the Commons dealt very bitterly and roughly against Camillus, he (as Livy writeth) resigned up his Dictatorship. Plutarch also testifieth the same: who likewise avoucheth the cause thereof, which Livy goeth about to disprove. But both Livy and Plutarch do affirm, that in the room of Camillus thus giving over his place, there was a second Dictator created. Livy saith, it was P. Manlius. Plutarch suppresseth his name: but they agree both, that C. Licinius was the Generall of the horse. Howbeit, they mean not both, one and the self-same man. For Livy saith and that truly, that it was he who had been Tribune military in Consuls authority before: But Plutarch nameth him, who was the author of the sedition and of the new laws: wherein he faulteth. For the Captain of the foresaid sedition, was this year also made Tribune of the Com. the ninth time: but Tribune of the Com. and Generall of the horse at one time he could not be. And therefore Onuphrius thinketh him to have been the son of P. Licinius Calvus military Tribune, and who had to his grandfather that Pub. Licinius, who of the Com. was the first Tribune military. Of this, see more in his Kalender.

Iulus P. Manlius. P. Valerius VI.

Livy exhibiteth these Trib. military before named for this year, whom Diodorus overpasseth. Their surnames, together with the notes signifying how often they had born this honourable dignity, are thus expressed in the Capitoline fragments. Cossus II. .·.· Maluginensis II. .·.· Macerinus. L. Veturius. Crassus Cicurinus II. .·.· P. Valerius Petitus Poplicola, VI. P. Manlius Capitolinus II.

WHen L. Sextius and C. Licinius, Trib. of the Com. now chosen the tenth time, were more and more eager and instant in the publishing of their laws, in the end the authority both of Dictator and Senat, was conquered by the strong hand of the Tribunes. For they prevailed, notwithstanding all the Nobility was against it, that there should be holden a solemn assembly for election of Consuls: and that, (by vertue of their laws which they carried clear before them) the one of the Consuls should be a Commoner. By which means, L. Sextius was the first Consul created from out of the Commons. But when the nobles denied flatly to approve the same by their assent, insomuch as the Commons were at the point of insurrection and ready to leave the City: the discord & dissention was at length taken up and appeased by the mediation of the Dictator: and as the nobility was content to yield unto the commonalty a Consul, so the Commons granted unto the nobles one Prætor or Lord chief Justice within the City, and him to be created from out of the Nobility. Granted also unto them now first it was, that two Ædiles Curule should be chosen out of the Patritii. The Commons conferred the Consulship upon L. Sextius (by whose law it was first obtained) and for companion in government he had L. Æmylius Mamercus. Thus much Livy and Plutarch: who altogether with Cassiodorus put down for Coss. L. Æmylius a Patritian, and L. Sextius a Commoner. The same, Diodorus nameth Lu. Æmylius Mamercus, and Lu. Lateranus. Now this Lateranus is the surname of Sextius, as appeareth in a table of record in the Capitoll, wherein the consuls are thus to be seen, Mamercinus & L. Sextius Sextinus Lateranus: as also in the Sicilian registers they are called Mamercinus and Lateranus. In the book entituled De viris Illustribus of famous men, we find written that it was not L. Sextius, but C. Licinius Stolo, who was the first consul chosen out of the commonalty.

Diodorus, Livy, and Cassiodorus shew unto us for consuls, L. Genutius, and Q. Servilius: Of whom Orosius also and Eutropius make mention. According to the records of the capitoll, the cos. in his first consulship, is thus written: Q. Servilius son of Q. nephew of Quintus Ahala; together with L.Genutius, but in the ſecond, the ſon of M. nephew of Cn. ſurnamed Amentinenſis. In the Sicilian regiſters they be written Genutius and Curtius, but corruptly, as Sigonius thinketh.

C.Sulpitius Peticus. C.Licinius Stolo.

THeſe be the Conſuls reported by Livy and Caſſiodorus. Diodorus concealeth their ſurnames. Valerius Max. in his ſecond book and firſt cha.maketh mention of them, and ſo doth Plutarch in his problems. But he whom all other writers name Stolo, the Capitoline records nominat Calvus: as alſo the Sicilian, which deliver their ſurnames Paticus and Calvus.

Livy and Caſſiodorus declare theſe for Conſuls: whom Diodorus in his ſixteenth book nameth Cn. Genutius nd L. Æmylius. In the Capitol tables in this manner they be ſet down ... Mamercinus II. and Cn. Genutius ſon of M. and nephew of M. Amentinenſis But in the Sicilian regiſters, Mamercinus and σίλλα.

Q.Servilius Ahala II. L.Genutius II.

Diodorus nameth the Conſuls of this year, Q.Servilius and Q.Genutius. The Sicilian regiſters, Ahala and Genutius. Livy and Caſſiodorus, Q.Servilius Hala and L.Genutius. Theſe are they who three years before were matched together in the ſame government.

C.Sulpitius. C.Licinius Calvus.

THeſe are by Livy recorded Conſuls this year. Caſſiodorus writeth them thus, C.Sulpitius II. and C.Licinius. Diodorus in this wiſe, C. Sulpitius and C. Licinius. Sigonius ſuppoſeth they be the ſame, who three years before were Collegues. The Sicilian regiſters give unto Licinius the ſurname, not of Calvus as before, but of Stolo: and Sulpitius they ſurname Paticus.

C.Pœtilius Libo. M. Favius Ambuſtus.

Livy, and Caſſiodorus write the Conſuls for this year were, C.Pœtelius Balbus: and M. Fabius Ambuſtus. But Diodorus M.Fabius and C. πόπλιος corruptly for ποιτέλιος. The Capitoline writers give them ſurnames divers from Livy: for they call Libo, Viſulus; but he, Balbus. And the Sicilian regiſters go with thoſe of the Capitoll.

M.Popilius Lænas. Cn. Manlius.

Livy and Caſſiodorus name this year Conſuls in this ſort: but Diodorus calleth them, M.Popilius Lanatus, and Cn.Manlius Imperioſus. This was the firſt man of the Popilii, ſurnamed Lænas. The reaſon of which name Cicero rendreth in his book Brutus, ſaying, M. Popilius being Conſul, and at the ſame time offering ſacrifice in his robe called Læna, for that he was Flamin to Carmenta, upon news brought unto him that the commons were up and riſen in a commotion againſt the Nobles, came in that attire and habit as he was into the aſſembly; and what with his authority of countenance, and what with his eloquence of ſpeech, appeaſed the ſedition.

396

C.Fabius. C. Plautius.

Livy and Caſſiodorus have theſe above-named for the Conſuls this year: but in Diodorus they are named M. Fabius and C. Plotius. In the Capitoline records ... Ambuſtus and C.Plautius Proculus.

397

C.Martius. Cn. Manlius.

Diodorus, Livy, and Caſſiodorus name the Conſuls of this year, C. Martius and Cn. Manlius. This Cn.Manlius was Conſul the firſt time, two years before. Cuſpinians book and the Greek records have Rutilius and Capitolinus.

398

M.Fabius Ambuſtus II. M.Popilius Lænas II.

THis years Conſuls are with theſe names entituled by Livy and Caſſiodorus. Diodorus leaveth out their ſurnames and the numerall notes. Cuſpinians book and the Greek records, ſet them thus down, Ambuſtus II. and Lanas.

C.Sulpitius Peticus III. M.Valerius Poplicola.

IN the four hundred year from the foundation of the City, and the thirty five after that it was by the Gauls won, the commons after eleven years did forgo their hold of the Conſulſhip, and upon an Interregency, both Coſſ. of the Patritii entred into government, to wit, C. Sulpitius Paticus III. M.Valerius Publicola, as Livy ſaith. The ſame Conſuls Diodorus, Caſſiodorus, and the Sicilian regiſters, do report. But why the account of time made by Livy, diſagreeth from this reckoning, Sigonius and Onuphrius in his Kalender do give a reaſon.

M.Fab. Ambuſtus III. T.Quint. or M.Popilius.

IN this year alſo, according to Livy, both Coſſ. were Patritii, namely, M.Fabius Ambuſtus the third time, with T.Quintius: although he writeth, that in ſome Annals inſtead of Titus Quintius, he found Marcus Popilius Conſul. With Livy accordeth Diodorus, and Caſſiodorus, Solinus alſo who in his forty one chapter out of Cornelius Nepos writeth, that Alexander was born when M. Fabius Ambuſtus, and T.Quin-

tius

tius Capitolinus were Consuls. Cuspinians book setteth forth Ambustus and Capitolinus. But these Consuls and those that follow are in the Sicilian registers concealed.

401
C.Sulpitius Peticus.IIII.M.Valer.Poplicola III.

BOth Consuls created this year were Patritii, and namely, those who are here set down, after Livy and Cassiodorus. Diodorus omitteth both their surnames, and also the numeral notes, and setteth after the former Consuls, M. Valerius and C. Sulpitius.

P.Valerius Poplicola. C.Martius Rutilus.

TO L. Valerius Poplicola was given in fellowship of government this year, C. Martius Rutilus of the commons, as Livy saith. These Cassiodorus calleth P. Valerius and C. Martius Rutilus the second time. Diodorus nameth them M. Fabius and P. Valerius. The Sicilian registers intermingle them confusedly with those of the next year, matching Rutilus and Pennus together.

C.Sulpit.Peticus..T.or K.or C. Quint.Pennus.*

THe Coss. for this year created were C. Sulpitius Peticus, and T. Quint. Pennus. Some put to Quintius the name Caso, others Caius. Livy, and Cassiodorus name them thus, C. Sulpitius Peticus and T. Quintius Pennus: but Diodorus C. Sulpitius and C. Quintius.

M.Popilius Lænas. L.Cornelius Scipio.

Livy writeth, that for Consuls this year the commons yielded M. Popilius Lænas, and the nobles L. Cornelius Scipio. Cassiodorus setteth them forth under the name of M. Popilius Lænas the third time, and L. Cornelius Scipio. Diodorus nameth them, C. Cornelius and M. Popilius: and the Sicilian registers barely Scipio and Lænas.

Lucius Furius Camillus the Dictator restored the nobles again to their former possession of the Consulship: and being himself for that good demerit created Consul, with the great love and hearty affection of the nobles, nominated for his Collegue, Publius Claudius Crassus. Thus saith Livy. The same Consuls are set down by Cassiodorus. But Diodorus, nameth them Æmylius and T. Quintius. The Sicilian registers, Camillus and Crassus. Cicero in Cato maketh mention of these Consuls, saying, that Plato came to Tarentum, when L. Camillus and P. Claudius were Consuls: Gellius likewise, 9 book 11 chapter.

M.Valerius Corvus.M.Popilius Lænas.IIII.

Marcus Manlius torquatus being Dictator, declared for Consul with the exceeding favour of the people, M. Valerius Corvus (for that was his surname afterwards) in his absence, and being but three and tweenty years old. This Corvus had joyned with him in the Consulship from out of the commons. M. Popilius Lænas the third time, as saith Livy and Cassiodorus. But Diodorus three years after nominateth M. Valerius and M. Popilius. In the fragment of the Capitoll thus only it is found, M. Valerius, M.F.M.N. Corvus Consul. In the Sicilian registers Corvinus and Lænas.

Livy and Cassiodorus nameth them for Consuls this year. Cuspinians Kalender and the Sicilian records, Torquatus and Venno. In a fragment of the Capitoll there is to be read the surname of Manlius, Imperiosus Torquatus.

M.Valerius Corvus II. C.Pœtelius.

THese are named Consuls by Livy, and Cassiodorus: but Cuspinians Kalender and the registers of Sicily shew for Consuls, Corvinus and Libo. As for the name C. Pœtelius, it is described by his Dictatorship, which (according to the Capitoll evidences) he bare in the year 440: for in a fragment (testifying his Consulship) there appeareth no more but one of his surnames, Visolus.

409
M.Fabius Dorso. Ser.Sulpitius Camerinus.

THese were the Consuls created for this year, as Livy and Cassiodorus write. Diodorus also (although not in the right place) alleageth M. Fabius and Ser. Sulpitius Consuls. The Sicilian registers, Dorso and Camerinus. Both these Consuls were Patritii, which Livy omitted.

C.Mart.Rutilus III. T.Manlius Torquatus II.

Livy and Cassiodorus avow these for Coss. this year. Diodorus likewise delivereth unto us, C. Martius and T. Manlius Torquatus. The Sicilian registers, Rutilus and Torquatus. Frontinus also in his second book of Stratagems speaketh of them.

M.Valerius Corvus III. A.Cornelius Cossus.

Livy and Cassiodore both together report, that these were chosen Coss. for this year. Diodorus, Cicero in his book of Divination, and Frontinus, name them, M. Valerius and A. Cornelius. The Sicilian registers, Valerius and Cossus: both of them are Patritii. But he that hath written of famous men, calleth them, Valerius Max. and Cornelius Cossus.

C.Martius Rutilus IV. Q.Servilius.

Livy and Cassiodorus declare Coss. for this year, C.Martius and Q.Servilius. Diodorus, Q.Servilius and Martius Rutilus. The Sicilian registers, Ahala and Rutilus. This is that Q.Servilius Ahala who was Master of the horse in the 403 year.

THe Consuls that followed, were C.Plautius the second time, and L.Æmylius Mamercus, as witness Livy and Cassiodorus: but L. Æmylius & C.Plotius as testifieth Diodorus: and as the Sicilian registers say, Venno and Mamercinus. Cuspinians Kalender set forth for this year, Venno the second time, and Mamercinus.

T.Manlius Torquatus III. P.Decius Mus.

Titus Manlius Torquatus the third time, and P.Decius Mus, bare the Consulship this year, as Livy and Cassiodorus report. Diodorus nameth them, T.Manlius Torquatus and P.Decius. The Sicilian registers, Torquatus and Mus. Zonoras, Torquatus the third time, and Decius. Of the same Consuls Pliny speaketh in his 22 book and 5 chap. Valerius also in his 1 book and 5 chap. besides others.

Titus Æmylius Mamercinus, and Q.Publilius Philo, are by Livy reckoned Coss. for this year. Diodorus passeth over their surnames. The Greek records shew unto us, Mamercinus and Philo. As for Philo, he is described out of the tables of the Capitoll.

THus say Livy and Cassiodorus. Diodorus hath L.Furius and μάνιον, but corruptly The Sicilian registers, Camillus and Menius. The Capitoll monuments of triumphs, L.Furius Camillus, and C.Menius. Pliny in his 34 book and 5 cha. maketh mention of Caius Menius, Consul.

417

Livy and Cassiodorus write, that these Coss. followed. Diodorus putteth down C.Sulpitius, and L.Papirius. The Sicilian registers, have Longus and Paetus.

Lucius Papirius Crassus, and K.Duntius, were this years Coss, as witness Livy, Cassiodorus, and Diodorus also, but for leaving out the surname Crassus. In the Sicilian registers they are named, Crassus and Duntius. As touching these Consuls, Cicero in his Epistle to Paetus, writeth thus, L.Papirius Crassus, four years after he was Dictator, was made Consul with K.Duntius.

M.Valerius Corvus IIII. M Attilius Regulus.

THis year, when the Ausones that inhabited the City Cales, took arms and combined with the Sidicins, M.Valerius Corvus, a right noble General, was created Consul the fourth time, having to his Collegue (as Livy writeth) M.Attilius Regulus. Cassiodorus likewise declareth the same for Consuls; and so doth Diodorus, but that he leaveth out their surnames: which appear extant in the Sicilian registers.

THe Dictator held an assembly for the election of Consuls, wherein were created (according to Livy) these above-named. So say Cassiodorus also and Diodorus. Zonaras nameth them Tiber.Calvinus, and Sp.Posthumius: and right well, as Sigonius thinketh: for Tiberius was the fore-name of the Veturii. The Greek records, and Cuspinians book, have Albinus and Calvinus.

Sigonius and Onuphrius insert this one year without Consuls, besides the account of the years, according to the Capitoll monuments, albeit they see neither in Livy, nor in any other, mention thereof; and all to make up the totall sum collected by Varro. And that the said year should at this time especially be interposed, the tables of the Capitoline records do shew. For whereas in them thus engraven it is, M.Valerius Corvus Consul the fourth time in the year of the City 419. and again L.Æmylius and C.Plautius, in the year 414: to the end that these records might agree one with another, of necessity there must be put a year between. For leave out that, then both L.Æmylius the Consul should fall upon the year 414, and the totall sum of the year in Varro and the Capitoline tables be overthrown. That this odd year was now above all other times to be cast between, Gregory Haloander (who left in writing a Chronology of the Consuls) saw long before them: for he over-passed this year wholly, noted without Consuls. But Sigonius and Onuphrius are of opinion, that this year there was an Anarchy, and the Common-weal without Consuls, or other Magistrats of state, by occasion of the pestilence, whereof Livy writeth.

422

Aulus Cornelius the second time Cos. with Cn.Domitius) is by Livy, and Cassiodorus set down down. Diodorus nameth them A. Cornelius and C. Domitius. The Sicilian registers, Calvinus and Cossus.

M. Claudius Marcellus. C. Valerius.

AFter this, were created Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus, and C. Valerius, as Livy and Cassiodorus report. In Diodorus also they be set down by the name of C. Valerius, and M. Clodius. Livy saith, that he findeth in the Annals, the surnames of Valerius diversly put down, namely, Flaccus and Potitus. Orosius calleth these Consuls, Claudius Marcellus, and Valerius Flaccus: The Sicilian registers, Potitus and Marcellus. Sigonius and Onuphrius retain their surnames, that it may seem, how to the old surname Potitus of the House Valeria, this new surname of Flaccus is a later addition.

THese Consuls are by Livy and Cassiodorus recited this year. Diodorus concealeth their surnames. The Sicilian registers, make them known by the names of Crassus and Venno.

NExt to them (according to Livy and Cassiodorus) were L. Æmylius Mamercus, and C. Plautius created Consuls. Diodorus nominateth L. Papyrius with L. Plotius. The Sicilian registers, Mamercinus and Decianus. How both these are to be described, their triumphs upon record in the Capitol do evidently shew. These Consuls entred upon their government the first day of July.

Livy and Cassiodorus put down [for Consuls] P. Plautius Proculus, and P. Cornelius Scapula. Diodorus, P. Cornelius and A. Posthumius. The Sicilian registers, Venno and Scipio. Onuphrius thinketh this Plautius ought to be forenamed not Publius but Caius: who in his Consulship which he bare afterwards with Appius Cæcus, was surnamed Venox (as Frontinus supposeth) for finding certain springs and veins of water within the earth.

C. Plautius Proculus. Q. Publilius Philo II.

Livy and Cassiodorus match together in the Consulship for this year, L. Cornelius Lentulus, and Q. Publilius Philo. Diodorus L. Cornelius and Q. Publilius. The Sicilian registers, Lentulus and Philo.

Caius Pœtelius and L. Papyrius are by Livy nominated consuls this year, C. Pœtilius the third time, and L. Papyrius Mugillanus, by Cassiodorus. Solinus maketh mention of these Consuls in his five and thirtieth chapter. As for Papyrius, Livy indeed surnameth him here Mugillanus, but he saith that he findeth him in other Annals by the name of Cursor. In the Greek records they be Libo and cursor. Now as touching C. Petilius, he is to be written with the numerall note II. and not III. as Sigonius and Onuphrius do admonish. For it is not the same man who was Consul in the 393 year, but his son.

Livy and Cassiodorus put down for consuls, Lu. Furius Camillus the second time, and Junius Brutus Scæva. Diodorus, L. Furius, and D. Junius. The Sicilian registers, Camillus and Brutus.

430

Lucius Furius, unto whom the charge of Samnium fell by lot, fortuned by occasion of sickness to forgo the war there, and was commanded to nominate for the managing of martiall affairs a Dictator: whereupon he pronounced L. Papirius Cursor, the bravest warrior in those daies; by whom Q. Fabius Rullianus was named great Master of the horse. Afterwards Cursor turned him out of that Mastership of horse, because without his warrant he had fought (although it were fortunately) against the Samnits when himself was out of the way and gone to Rome for to take the Auspices anew: and in his room he substituted L. Papyrius Crassus. Thus write Livy, Eutropius, and Valerius, in the second book.

C Sulpitius Longus II. Q. Æmylius [L. Aulus] Cerretanus.

Lucius Papyrius the Dictator, before he left his Magistracy, created Consuls, C. Sulpitius Longus II. and Q. Æmylius Cerretanus. Some Annals have Aulus. Thus much Livy. In like manner the Sicilian registers have Longus and Cerretanus. But Diodorus corruptly for Aulus hath Ælius.

Livy and Cassiodorus deliver unto us for Consuls this year, Q. Fabius and L. Fulvius: whom the Capitoll records of the triumphs name Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, and L. Fulvius Corvus. Marvell it is therefore, that in the Sicilian registers, they are put down, Cursor and Sylla.

THis year Livy and Cassiodorus set forth for Consuls, T. Veturius Calvinus and Sp. Posthumius: Cicero in his third book of Offices writeth, that they were twice Coss. Zonaras calleth calleth the one of them T. Calvinus, by a familiar forename unto that houſe and kindred of the Veturii. The Greek records exhibit unto us Calvinus and Albinus. Of theſe conſuls as alſo of the Caudine peace, Cicero in his book of old age; Pliny alſo in his book of famous men, Gellius in his 17 book and 21 chap. Florus in his 1 book and 16 chap. and Oroſius in his 3 book and 15 chap. do make mention.

Livy and Caſſiodorus ſhew for this years Conſuls, Q. Publilius Philo and L. Papyrius Curſor, the ſecond time. The Sicilian regiſters, Curſor and Philo. But that this Philo ſhould now be third time Conſul, his Conſulſhips do plainly ſhew.

L. Papyrius Curſor, or Mugillanus. Q. Aulius Cerretanus II.

Livy ſaith, there is ſome doubt, whether L. Papyrius Curſor were this year created Conſul the third time, with Q. Æmylius Cerretanus the ſecond time: and for his good ſervice in war at Luceria, continued ſtill in government: or rather L. Papyrius Mugillanus, and ſo the ſurname was miſtaken. Caſſiodorus delivereth unto us L. Papyrius and Q. Aulius Cerretanus. The Sicilian regiſters, Papyrius and Cerretanus. The monument of his triumph in the Capitoll, alloweth of Curſor and not Mugillanus. The author of that book which Cuſpinian hath ſet forth, following other Annals, letteth down Mugillanus.

SEeing that for twelve years next enſuing, we have the Capitoline tables whole and ſound, the leſs trouble we need to be at in reforming and redreſſing the names of the Magiſtrats. Both they, and alſo Livy with Caſſiodorus repreſent unto us for this years conſuls, M. Foſtius Flaccinator and L. Plantius Venno. Diodorus calleth them L. Plotius and μάνιος φάλβιος. The Sicilian regiſters, Venno and Flaccus.

437

C. Junius Bubulcus. Q. Æmylius Barbula.

Caſſiodorus putteth down C. Junius and Quintus Æmylius for Conſuls. Livy, C. Junius Bubulcus, and Quintus Æmylius Barbula. A ſtone in the Capitoll, Q. Æmylius Barbula, and C. Junius Bubulcus Brutus.

438

Sp. Nautius. M. Popilius.

NExt follow in order Sp. Nautius and M. Popilius Conſuls, according to Livy and Caſſiodorus. Rutilus and Lænas their ſurnames, are by Sigonius reſtored unto them: and the ſame alſo are to be ſeen in the Sicilian books of record.

THe Conſuls names of this year, through the default of the writers that copied forth Livies books, are there left out: namely, L. Papirius Curſor the fourth time, and Q. Publilius Philo likewiſe the fourth time: as it is written in Caſſiodorus, in the Capitoll tables, and in Cuſpinians book, wherein they are named Curſor and Philo. Howbeit, in the Sicilian regiſters they are called Curſor and Lænas.

M. Pœtelius. C. Sulpitius.

Livy and Caſſiodorus report for Conſuls this year C. Sulpitius and M. Pœtelius. But Diodorus hath C. Sulpitius and μάρκος πόπλιος corruptly for ποπτήλιος. The Capitoline writers, have M. Pœtelius Libo and C. Sulpitius Longus the third time. The Sicilian regiſters, Longus and σαμνήτης, but there is a fault, as Sigonius truly thinketh.

Diodorus putteth down for Conſuls this year L. Papirius fift time, and C. Junius. The Sicilian regiſters, Curſor and Bubulcus. But Livy and Caſſiodorus, L. Papirius Curſor V. and C. Junius Bubulcus II. Feſtus maketh mention alſo of theſe Coſſ. in his 18 book.

M. Valerius. C. Decius.

Livy writeth that there followed conſuls M. Valerius Max. and P. Decius: but Caſſiodorus, ſaith M. Valerius and P. Decius. Frontinus in his book of water-conduits, ſpeaketh of theſe Conſuls; whom he writeth to have been thirty years after the beginning of the Samnits war. As for P. Decius, Livy afterwards calleth Mus. The Sicilian regiſters have Max. and Mus.

C. Junius Bubulcus III. Q. Æmylius Barbula II.

WE find in Livy for Conſuls this year, C. Junius Bubulcus the third time, and Q. Æmylius Barbula the ſecond time: likewiſe in Caſſiodorus. But Diodorus nameth them C. Junius and Q. Æmylius. In the Sicilian regiſters, Bubulcus and Barbula. The ſame names are alſo in the Capitoll monuments, which be in Livy.

C. Martius Rutilius. Q. Fabius.

CAius Martius Rutilus and Q. Fabius be this years Conſuls in Livy. But in Caſſiodorus, C. Martius Rutilus and Q. Fabius the ſecond time. Diodorus hath C. Martius and Q. Fabius the ſecond time. The Sicilian regiſters ſhew Rutus and and Rutilus. The Capitol monuments, Q. Fabius, Max. Rutilanus the ſecond time, and C. Martius, who afterwards in his ſecond Cenſorſhip in the 498 year, is ſurnamed Cenſorinus.

A year without Conſuls. P. Papirius Dictator. II.

VErrius Flaccus interpoſeth this year alſo without Conſuls, wherein he reporteth L. Papirius Dictator the 2 time, with C. Junius Bubulcus Brutus the Maſter of the horſe. This year Diodorus, Livy, the Greek records, Cuſpinians book and Caſſiodorus do overleap. For Livy writeth that L. Papirius Curſor was nominated by the conſul Dictator, and by him C. Junius Bubulcus named Maſter of the horſe: upon occaſion that C. Martius the Coſ. had no good fortune in his conduct of the wars in Samnium. This inſerting of one year Onuphrius hath approved, that the computation of the years gathered by Varro might ſtand in force, which to the Capitoll tables putteth one year, whoſe judgment we alſo are willing to follow.

LIvy writeth that Fabius continued Conſul this year alſo, for his ſingular good ſervice in ſubduing and taming Hetruria: and that he had for his companion in government Decius. Caſſiodorus acknowledgeth for Coſſ. Q. Fabius the third time, and P. Decius the ſecond time. Diodorus, P. Decius and Q. Fabius. The Sicilian regiſters Mus and Rullus. The Capitoline tables, P. Decius Mus II. and Q. Fabius Max. Rullianus the third time.

LIvy ſaith, that immediatly there followed conſuls, App. Claudius and L. Volumnius. Caſſiodorus and Diodorus, Appius and Violens. The Sicilian regiſters, App. Claudius Cæcus, and L. Volumnius. The Capitoline monuments have Flamma and Violens. Now whether one of theſe Conſuls ſurnames be Violens or Violenſis, Onuphrius advertiſeth us to conſider. For the capitoll ſtone hath it alwaies written Violens. But the Greek words have Appius and βιολέντ&, as if the name were Violenſis.

448

LIvy and Caſſiodorus regiſter for the Conſuls of this year, Q. Martius Tremulus, with a Collegue adjoyned unto him. Diodorus ſaith Q. Martius and P. Cornelius. The Sicilian records, Tremulus and Arvina.

LUcius Poſthumius and T. Minutius are reported conſuls by Diodorus, Livy and Caſſiod. cuſpinians book ſheweth, Megellus and Auguſtinus. Theſe Coſſ. doth L. Piſo put down for to ſucceed Q. Fabius and P. Decius, leaving out thoſe two years wherein we have ſet down (as Livy writeth) that Claudius with Volumnius, and Cornelius with Martius were conſuls. Whether his memory failed him in digeſting of the annals, or of purpoſe he ſuppoſed that thoſe two couple of Conſuls were not truly recorded, and therefore overleapt them, I know not. A fragment there is of the Capitoline ſtone, which ſheweth for this year, Megellus to be the ſurname of Poſthumius, Tiberius the forename of Minutius, and M. of Fulvius. Now the ſurnames of Fulvius were Curvus and Petinus, as it appeareth written in his triumph.

THe Conſuls next following were P. Sulpitius Saverrio, and P. Sempronius Sophus, according to Livy and Caſſiodorus. In Diodorus they are written P. Sulpitius and P. Sempronius. In the Greek regiſters, they ſtand Sempronius and Saverrio. Pliny writeth of theſe Conſuls in his 33 book: but Sempronius he calleth Longus. Both of them are deſcribed thus by their triumphs, appearing upon record in the Capitoll, for in their Conſulſhip there is no more to be ſeen but Sophus and Publius.

DIodorus, Livy and Caſſiodorus report for Coſſ. this year, L. Genutius, and Servius Cornelius. The Sicilian regiſters have Aventinenſis and Lentulus. The Capitoline writers put unto Cornelius the ſurname of Lentulus.

M. Livius Denter. M. Æmylius.

LIvy nameth for Conſuls this year M. Livius and Æmylius. Caſſiodorus, M. Livius and L. Æmylius. Diodorus, M. Livius and M. Æmylius. As for the forename to Æmylius, Sigonius and Onuphrius do think that more credit is to given unto Diodorus, than others: eſpecially, ſeeing that in Livy there is mention made the year following of M. Æmylius Paulus Generall of the horſemen, whom they all think to be the ſame man that this Conſul. M. Livius is written Denter in the Capitoll records, which ſurname Livy in another place addeth to the Livii. Cuſpinians book in like manner ſetteth down Denter and Pantus as the ſurnames of theſe Conſuls. The Sicilian regiſters, Denter and Æmylius.

Two Dictators, and no Conſul.

THis year alſo of two Dictators without Conſuls, Onuphrius inſerteth in his Kalender, howbeit directed thereto by evidence of the Capitoll fragments: to the end that the calculation of Varro might agree in all reſpects; which, which, if this year were over-slipped should be wholly overthrown: although Diodore, Livy, and Cassiodore dissent therefrom, and leave out this year altogether. Whereof see Onuphrius more at large in his Kalender upon this year 453.

M. Valerius. Q. Apulcius Pansa.

IMmediatly after M. Livius and M. Æmylius, Livy, and Cassiodorus letteth pass the year of two Dictators without Consuls, bring in M. Valerius and Q. Apuleius Pansa for Consuls. The Greek records shew Corvinus and Pansa. It seemeth that Livy by Marcus Valerius meaneth Maximus, for that he saith that presently upon his Dictatorship he was made Cos. Now that M. Valerius Max. was Dictator the year before, he writeth plainly.

M. Fulvius Petus. T. Manlius Torquatus.

Livy and Cassiodorus declare for Consuls this year, M. Fulvius Petus and T. Manlius Torquatus. The Sicilian registers have Pœtinus and Torquatus. Livy saith that Q. Fabius refused the Consulship offered unto him without any suit of his. But T. Manlius the Consul, was by lot appointed to levy war against Hetruria, which took arms and prepared for war against the truce accorded upon. Now was he scarce well entred into the enemies confines, but as he exercised among men of arms, and chanced to turn about his horse upon a full carrier, he was cast from his back: whereupon (for the present) he lay for dead, and within three daies after the said fall ended his life. Then all the Centuries in general by their suffrages chose M. Valerius Cos. whom the Senat purposed to have made Dictator. Thus much Livy. By M. Valerius he meaneth Corvus, whom Cicero writeth in his book of old age, and Valerius Max. in his 7 book and 48 chap. to have been Cos. now the sixt time, and that between this and the first there were 46 years, although Plutarch in the life of C. Marius saith, they were but 45. Howbeit all of them call him Corvinus and not Corvus.

CNeus Fulvius and L. Cornelius Scipio are recorded Consuls by Livy and Cassiodorus: but Scipio and Centumalus, by Cuspinians book: Scipio and Maximus by the Greek records.

Q. Fabius Max. IV. P. Decius Mus III.

Livy and Cassiodorus alledge for Cos. this year, Q. Fabius Max. the fourth time, and P. Decius Mus thrice. The same Cos. Cuspinians book and the Greek records delivered unto us. The author that writeth of famous men, and Frontinus in his book of Stratagems, speak of P. Decius thrice Consul.

Lucinus Volumnius a Commoner, and Appius Claudius of noble bloud, were created Cos. this year: even the same men who in their former Consulship were matched together, as Livy and Cassiodorus write: but in the Sicilian registers they are found written, Claudius and Violens. Howbeit, Cicero in his book entituled Cato reporteth, that between the two Consulships of App. Cæcus were ten years.

Q. Fabius V. P. Decius IV.

Livy and Cassiodorus both witness, that the Cos. next following, were Q. Fabius the fift time, and P. Decius the 4 time, who had been companions together already in 2 Consulats and in one Censorship. The Sicilian registers have Rullus and Mus: of which Consuls Cicero speaketh very often; Valer. Max. likewise, Paterculus also, Plutarch, Frontinus in his book of Stratagems, the author of the book of famous men, Eutropius, Orosius, and others: who all report, that the Cos. P. Decius, following the example of his father, offered himself to die for the Roman legions, and by his death purchased a notable victory to the people of Rome.

THe Cos. next following, were L. Postumius Megellus, and M. Atilius Regulus, as Livy and Cassiodorus write. In the Sicilian records, their surnames are Megellus and Regulus.

AFter Livy and Cassiodorus, the Cos. this year were L. Papirius Cursor and Sp. Carvilius. After the Sicilian registers, Cursor & Max. A stone in the Capitol maketh mention of Papirius the son of L. nephew of P. surnamed Cursor, whom Livy writeth to be the son of Papirius 5 times Cos. Of these Cos. Pliny of Verona maketh mention in his 7 book and 60 chap. Val. Max. likewise in his 7 book and 1 chap. Vellius in his 2 book: and the same Livy in the year 456.

Q. Fabius Gurges Max. Decius Junius Brutus, son of Scævalini.

THe year following had Consuls, Q. Fabius Gurges and D. Junius Brutus Scæva, as witness Livy and Cassiodorus. Zonaras nameth them, Junius Brutus and Q. Fabius Max. Cuspinians Kalender, Maximus and Scæva. The Sicilian registers, Brutus and Maximus. Livy, Pliny in his 7 book, the Capitoll tables, and Zonaras, have delivered, that this Fabius was the son of Q. Max. Rullianus, who had been 5 times Cos. before. And here an end of the Consuls for the first 10 books.

L. Posthumius. C. Junius.

SInce that after this Consulship, ten books of Livy next ensuing be lost, whom hitherto we have had for the most sufficient witness of this story, so as now we are in manner destitute and deprived of the best helps of Annals, namely, Diodorus, Dionysius, and Livy: from hence forward we will use principally in digesting and reckoning the years by the Consuls, the authority and testimony of Cassiodorus, the Sicilian records, and Cuspinians book: yet will we not in the mean while reject what help soever shall be ministred unto us by others. For this year therefore Cassiodorus writeth, that L. Postumius and C. Junius, were created Coss. whose surnames, Megellus, and Brutus Bubulcus, have not been left out so much as in Cuspinians Kalender, nor in the Sicilian records. Livy also maketh mention of them in his 28 book, saying thus, Lu. Postumius Megellus the Interregent, was created Cos. with C. Bubulcus, by that very court and assembly which himself called and held.

P. Cornelius Rufinus. M'. Curius Dentatus

THe Coss. this year are recorded by Cassiodorus, Pub. Cornelius Rufinus, and M'. Curius Dentatus: for whom in the Sicilian registers appear Maximus the third time, and Mus the sixt time. But of those forenamed Coss. Cicero maketh mention in his book, entituled Cato; Paterculus in his first book, Valerius Max. in his sixt book, and 3 chap. Pliny also in his 7 book and 50 chap. Now this M'. Curius was called Dentatus, as Pliny writeth in his 6 book and 16 chap. for that he came into the world with teeth.

M. Valerius. Q. Caditius.

M Arcus Valerius and Q. Caditius were afterwards Coss. as saith Cassiodorus. The old book of Cuspinian putteth to them the surnames of Corvinus and Noctua: which in the Sicilian registers are overpassed. The Greek records shew unto us, Maximus and Mus: for Maximus was a surname also of the Valerii Corvini.

Cassiodorus this year delivereth for Consuls, Q. Martius and P. Cornelius, Cuspinians book and the Greek records add their surnames. Tremulus II. and Arvinus II. who had been Consuls together once before.

467

Cassiodorus avoucheth Consuls this year, M. Marcellus and Cn. Nautius. The Greek records and Cuspinians book, have Marcellus and Rutilus.

M. Valerius. C. Ælius.

M Arcus Valerius and C. Ælius are ranged in this year for Coss. by Cassiodorus. Cuspinians book putteth forth, Maximus and Patus: but the Greek records, Potitus and Patus. Now you must think, that both Maximus and Potitus are the surnames of the Valerii.

469
C. Claudius. M. Æmylius.

FOr this years Coss. Cassiodorus hath C. Claudius and M. Æmylius. The Greek records and Cuspinians book, Canina & Lepidus: whereof the former is the surname of Claudius, the latter of Æmylius.

BY Cassiodorus, C. Servilius and L. Cæcilius Metellus are placed Coss. in this year: for whereas in some copies of Cassiodorus, instead of Lu. Cæcilius, is written Cælius that is a fault; as Sigonius and Onuphrius have noted. To Servilius this Consul, the Greek records add the surname of Timan, whom they put down Cos. with Dento, they would say Denter, as both Sigonius and Onuphrius suppose. For Denter is a surname also given to the Cæcilii, as appeareth by Livy.

C Assiodorus inferreth P. Corn. Dolabella, and Cn. Domitius for Coss. Cuspinians Kalender hath Dolabella and Calvus. The Sicilian registers, Dolabella Maximus. And some think that Maximus was the surname of Dolabella, which he seemeth to have acquired by the honour that he had won in the war against the Gauls.

C. Fabricius. Q. Æmylius

C Assiodorus bringeth in for Coss. C. Fabricius and Q. Æmylius: but the Sicilian registers, Luscinus and Papus. Of them Cicero in his book Lelius, maketh mention in this manner: We see that Papus Æmylius was familiarly acquainted with C. Luscinus; for so we have heard our fathers say, that they were two Coss. together, and companions in the censorship. Moreover, Valerius in his chap. where he treateth of Poverty, maketh mention of C. Fabricius, and Q. Æmylius Papus. This Æmylius, Plutarch in his Parallels calleth corruptly by the name of Paulus.

THere followed Coss. as Cassiodorus sheweth, L. Æmylius & Q. Martius; unto whom Cuspinians book and the Greek records give also their surnames, Barbula and Philippus: and the same also is evident by the records in the Capitoll of their triumphs.

474

P. Valerius. T. Coruncanius.

Publ. Valerius and Tit. Coruncanius, are by Caſſiodorus placed in this year for Coſſ. The Greek records, Cuſpinians book, Florus, Oroſius, and Eutropius, give to Valerius the ſurname of Lavinus. And Plutarch hath ἀλγῖνον for λαβῖνον.

NExt after thoſe, Caſſiodorus putteth down P. Sulpitius Conſul with P. Decius. The Sicilian regiſters, have Savennio and Mus. Cicero in his 2 book, entituled De Fin. and in his Tuſculan diſputations, ſaith, That this Pub. Decius was the ſon of that P. Decius who vowed himſelf to death in the Samnits and Gauls war.

476
C. Fabricius. Q. Aemylius.

Caſſiodorus delivereth unto us for Conſuls C. Fabricius and Q. Aemilius: whom Cuſpinians book and the Greek records, call Luſcinus the ſecond time, and Papus. That theſe were fellows together once before in the Conſulat, Cicero writeth in his book Lælius, Plutarch in Pyrrhus, Gellius 3 book, chap. 8. Entropius, and Zonaras, make report of the ſame.

Publ. Cornelius, and C. Junius, are rehearſed for Conſuls this year by Caſſiodorus. Cuſpinians book hath Rufinus the ſecond time, and Brutus. The Greek records, Rufinus and Bubulcus. Zonaras hath Rufinus & Junius. Of P. Rufinus twice Coſ. Cic. in his 2. book Of a perfect Orator, Val. Max. in his 3. book, and 4. chap. Gellius in his 4 book, and 8 chap. in his 17 book likewiſe and 21 chap. and laſt of all, Frontinus in his book of Stratagems, make mention.

Q. Fabius. C. Genutius.

Caſſiodorus reporteth Q. Fabius and C. Genutius Conſuls. The Sicilians regiſters have Gurges and Clepſina. Of theſe Coſſ. Oroſius maketh mention in this wiſe: When Fabius Gurges was the ſecond time Coſ. with C. Genutius Clepſina, a grievous peſtilence reigned both in the City, and alſo in the territory about it.

Caſſiodorus and Eutropius deliver unto us for Coſſ. M'. Curius and L. Lentulus. The Sicilian regiſters, Dentatus and Lentulus. This is the third Conſulat of M'. Curius, which together with Lentulus Conſulſhip, is drawn out of the Capitoll records of triumph this year.

480
Serv. Cornelius. M'. Curius.

Caſſiodorus ſheweth for this years Coſſ. Servius Cornelius and M'. Curius, Cuſpinians book and the Greek records, Merenda, & Dentatus the third time. This M'. Curius is now Coſ. the fourth time, for, thrice he was before. Concerning this Serv. Cornelius Merenda, Pliny relateth and writeth, that he received a princely coronet of gold at the hands of L. Lentulus the Coſ. of the former year, for winning a town of the Samnits.

481
C. Fabricius. C. Claudius.

Caſſiodorus ſetteth down, C. Fabricius and C. Claudius Conſuls: the Sicilian records, Licinius and Canina: Cuſpinians Kalender, Licinius and Cinna. Eutropius, Fabius Licinius and C. Claudius Canina. Velleius, Fabius Dorſo and Claudius Canina. Whereby it may be underſtood, that theſe Conſuls were called, C. Fabius Dorſo Licinius, and Caius Claudius Canina: for Dorſo was an old name of the Fabii.

NExt after them, Caſſiodorus nominateth for Coſſ. Sp. Carvilius and Lu. Papirius Curſor. The records both of Sicily and Cuſpinian, have Curſor and Maximus. Both theſe were now Coſſ. the ſecond time, as appeareth by their triumphs upon record in the Capitoll. Frontinus ſpeaketh of them in his book Of water-conduits, and Livy in his 24 book.

IT is reported by Caſſiodore, that C. Quintius and L. Genutius were Conſuls. Cuſpinians book and the Greek records, ſet to their ſurnames, Claudius and Clepſina. Livy in his 7 book ſpeaketh of one Tit. Quintius lame of one leg, from whom haply this ſurname is drawn.

484

REported there are for Conſuls this year by Caſſiodorus, C. Genutius and Cn. Cornelius; whoſe ſurnames were Clepſina and Blaſio, as it appeareth in Cuſpinians book. This Caius Genutius is the ſame, who before-time was Conſul. As for C. Blaſio, he is deſcribed by his Cenſorſhip ſtanding upon record in the Capitoll. The Greek records over-paſs them both.

485
P. Sempronius. } or after ſome, { Q. Ogulphius. / Fabius Pictor.
App. Claudius. }

AFter Cornelius and Genutius Conſuls, Caſſiodorus bringeth in Pub. Sempronius, and App.

App. Claudius, and of purpoſe over-skippeth Q. Gulo and Fabius Pictor. Zonaras, Q. Gallus and C. Fabius. Of them ſpeaketh Eutropius, ſaying; When Q. Gulo and Fabius Pictor were Conſuls, the Picenats raiſed war; and by the Conſuls next following, to wit, P. Sempronius and App. Claudius, they were vanquiſhed. Pliny alſo in his 33 book and 3 chap. When Q. Fabius (quoth he) was Conſul, ſilver was coined and ſtamped for money, five years before the [ſecond] Punick war. Theſe Conſuls, Velleius alſo reckoneth in his firſt book. But Sigonius and Onuphrius adverti ſe us, that the book of Eutropius is very faulty in one of theſe Conſuls, and that in lieu of Quin. Gulo, it ſhould be read Q. Ogulphius; for of this Gulo, there is in no place beſides, any mention: ſo as they would have, that it ſhould be Q. Ogulvius, ſon of L. nephew of A. ſurnamed Gallus, who a little before was ſent in embaſſage to Ptolomeus. And it falleth out paſſing well, that they ſhould match Ogulvius a commoner, with Fabius a Patritian. Alſo Onuphrius teſtifieth, that in the moſt ancient hand-written books of Eutropius, the name is found of Ogulvius. And, as both the Greek records, and alſo Zonaras, together with the more ancient and perfect copies of Eutropius, agree to this his judgment: ſo Hubertus Goltzius likewiſe in his Catalogue of Conſuls, embraceth the ſame: and that which maketh moſt for the purpoſe, the old antiquities of coin witneſs as much. But in the mean while this is worth the obſervation, that oftentimes in the moſt ancient pieces of money, the letter C is written for G: as for example here, Ocul. Cal. for Ogul. Galba.

SEeing that we ſettle the Conſulſhip of the former year, in Ogulvius and Fabius Pictor, and that upon the authority of Eutropius, the Greek records, Cuſpinian, Zonaras, Onuphrius, and others; we will ſet down for this years Conſuls, P. Sempronius and App. Claudius, whom Velleius in his firſt book calleth, Sempronius Sophus, and Appius the ſon of Cæcus. The Greek records, Sempronius Rufus Sophus: and Cuſpinians book Rufus. Moreover, this alſo Goltzius giveth us to underſtand, that the ſurname of this Sempronius is in old peeces of coin found written without an aſpiration [Sopus;] which is no rare thing to be ſeen in ſuch antiquities: for we read in others of them, Philippus, Tampilus, Graccus, Pulcer, Triumpus, for Philippus, Tamphilus, Gracchus, Pulcher, Trimmphus, and ſuch like.

Eutropius putteth down for Conſuls, M. Attilius and L. Julius Libo. The Sicilian regiſters, Regulus and Libo. Caſſiodorus, M. Attilius and Lutulius. And both of them are taken forth of the records of capitol triumphs.

Caſſiodorus reporteth for Coſſ. this year, D. Junius and N. Fabius: the Sicilian regiſter, Pera and Pictor: the capitol records of triumphs, D. Junius ſon of D. nephew of D. ſurnamed Pera, and N. Fabius ſon of C. nephew of M. ſurnamed Pictor. Upon what occaſion theſe Fabii took the ſurname of Pictor, Pliny ſheweth in his 35 book chap. 4. Valer. Max. in his 4 book and 3 chap. ſeemeth to note and ſignify, that Fabius Gurges and N. Fab. Pictor, lived at one and the ſame time.

THis year alſo Caſſiodorus paſſeth over. The Greek records ſhew, Maximus and Vitulus. Zonaras, Q. Fabius, and Æmylius (no doubt) for Mamilius, by ſome error and fault of the copies. Cuſpinian out of ſome old books delivereth unto us for Conſuls, Q. Fab. Maximus and Lu. Mamilius. Onuphrius thinketh, that Q. Fab. Maximus Gurges was now thrice Conſul.

Ap. Claudius. M. Fulvius.

BEſides the capitol monuments, Polybius in his firſt book maketh mention of theſe Conſuls. Gellius alſo, who calleth them thus, App. Claudius brother of Cæcus ſurnamed Caudex, and Mar. Fulvius Flaccus. In like manner Livy, Paterculus, and Pliny in his book of famous men: as alſo Appianus, Florus, Frontinus in his 1 book of Stratagems, Eutropius, Oroſius, and Caſſiodorus.

M'. Valerius. M'. Otacilius.

Caſſiodorus and Eutropius ſhew unto us, that M'. Valerius and M'. Otacilius were Conſ. Zonaras nameth Valerius Max. and Otacilius Craſſus. Cuſpinians Kalender and the Sicilian records, Max. Meſſala and Craſſus. Of theſe Conſuls, Ver. Flaccus, Polybius, Caſſiodorus, Eutropius, and Macrobius out of Varro make report. As for Macrobius, he rendreth a reaſon, why M'. Valerius was in this government of his named Meſſala: and Pliny likewiſe, in his ſixt book and five and thirtieth chapter.

Caſſiodorus and Polybius put down for next Conſuls, L. Poſtumius and Q. Mamilius. Zonaras nameth them, Poſthumius Albinus and Quintus Mamilius. The Sicilian regiſters, Albinus and Vitulus: but the capitol monuments, L. Poſtumius ſon of Lucius, nephew of Lucius, ſurnamed Megellus, and Q. Mamilius ſon of Q. nephew of M. ſurnamed Vitulus.

Polybius and Cassiodorus match together in the Consulat for this year L. Valerius and T.Otacilius: the surname of Valerius is Flaccus, and of Otacilius, Crassus, as it appeareth upon the capitol and Sicilan records.

Cn. Cornelius. C. Duilius.

Cassiodorus and Zonaras bring in for Coss. Cn. Cornelius and C. Duilius. In like manner also Polybius, but only that in lieu of Βουλτ& he hath λβι&. The Sicilian Registers shew Scipio and Duilius. Cn. Cornelius Scipio is surnamed also Asina, by the capital writers Orosius, Eutropius, and Valerius in his sixt book chap. 10. of which surname Macrobius writeth thus in his first book of Saturnalia: The surname of Asina (qd. he) was given to the Cornelii, for that the first of the House Cornelia having either bought land, or given his daughter in marriage, when (after the solemn manner) he was required to put in good sureties for security, brought into the open market place a she ass laden with money, and pawned down that presently in stead of pledges.

THere are nominated by Cassiodorus for Consuls, C. Aquilius and L. Cornelius. The Sicilian registers, Florus and Scipio. Zonaras, C. Florus and L. Scipio. Eutropius and Orosius, L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Aquilius Florus. Polybius leaveth them out. The Capitoline monuments agree with the Annals of Eutropius and Orosius.

A. Atilius Calatinus, Q. Sulpitius.

Polybius avoucheth for this years Consuls, A. Atilius and C. Sulpitius. Cassiodorus, A. Atilius Calatinus, and C. Sulpitius. The Sicilian Registers and Cuspinians Kalender, Calatinus and Paterculus. The capitol monuments, A. Atilius Calatinus and C. Sulpitius Paterculus. Zonaras Atilius Calatinus, and Caius Sulpitius. Of these Consuls, Polybius Cicero, Valerius, Florus, Frontinus in his Stratagems, Pliny the yonger Gellius, Eutropius, and Cassiodorus make mention. But concerning the forename of Sulpitius Paterculus, the Capitoline tables disagree one from another; to wit, those that carry the records of the triumphs, from those that shew the Consulships and other magistracies; for in these latter monuments he is called Quintus in the former Caius. Whereby Goltzius doth conjecture that one man was not the author of both those records, namely, the Triumphal and the Consular.

Cassiodorus sheweth unto us, Cn. Cornelius, and C. Atilius Serranus, for Consuls: but Polybius, C. Atilius. The capitol tables, C. Atilius Regulus. Cuspinians Kalender and the Sicilian registers, have Regulus and Blasio the second time. But how Atilius should come by his surname Serranus, Pliny sheweth in his 18 book, saying; In these daies the fields were tilled by the very hands of L. Generals themselves and a man verily would believe thereby, that the ground joyed in a laureat plough-share and a triumphant plowman. Him they found a sowing, unto him they presented those honorable dignities, and so took he his surname Serranus. As concerning Blasio, all authors well neer besides, approve the judgment of Cuspinian: but Goltzius supposeth, that he was not the same man that was Consul before; and therefore he writeth him the son of C. nephew of L. without putting to the numeral note II.

THe next Consuls that succeeded, were (by Cassiodorus his saying) Q. Caditius and L. Manlius. The Sicilian registers name them Vulso and Caditius. Zonaras, M. Regulus and L. Manlius. Eutropius, M. Atilius Regulus and L. Manlius Vulso: and Polybius, M. Atilius and L. Manlius. Insenus in his 41 book maketh mention of these Consuls. But ye must understand, that Q. Caditius died whiles he was in office, and M. Atilius was substituted in his room and made Consul the second time; as appeareth evidently by the capitol tables, wherein it standeth thus upon record, Lu. Manlius Vulso Longus: and in stead of Q. Caditius, M. Atilius Regulus the second time: as also by Cuspinians book, wherein is written, Longus and Regulus.

M. Æmylius Paulus. Ser. Fulvius Nobilior.

Polybius sheweth for the Coss. this year, Ser. Fulvius, and M. Aemylius. Cuspinians Kalender, Nobilior and Paulus. The Sicilian registers, Patinus and Paulus. Cassiodorus and Eutropius, together with the Capitoline records have Ser. Fulvius Nobilior, and M. Æmylius Paulus.

Cassiodorus and Polybius report for this years Consuls, Cn. Cornelius and A. Atilius. The capitol authors write, A. Atilius Calatinus the second time, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio Asina likewise a second time. As touching Cn. Cornelius Asina twice Consul, thus writeth Valerius in his sixt book: Cn. Cornelius S. Asina, who being Consul was taken prisoner by the Carthaginians at Lipara when he had by the law law of arms lost whatsoever he had, recovered all again, and was made Consul the second time: so as, of a Consul he became a captive, and of a captive twice Consul.

Cn. Servilius. C. Sempronius.

Cassiodorus and Polybius put down for Consuls, Cn. Servilius and C. Sempronius. The Sicilian registers, Cæpio and Blæsus. Zonoras, Servilius Cæpio and C. Sempronius. Eutropius and Orosius, Cn. Servilius Cæpio, and Sempronius Blæsus. Of the same Consuls, Sabinus in his 30 book maketh mention, as also a stone of the Capitol.

Cassiodorus bringeth in as Coss. C. Aurelius Cotta, and P. Geminus. The Sicilian registers, Cotta and Geminus: but those of the Capitol, C. Aurelius Cotta, and P. Servilius Geminus. Zonaras, Pub. Servilius and C. Aurelius. Cicero in his book, entituled Lucullus, writeth, that C. Cotta, together with P. Servilius Geminus, was twice Consul. Frontinus also in his fourth book of Stratagems, and likewise Orosius, make mention of C. Cotta Consul in Sicily.

Polybius setteth down for Consuls, L. Cæcilius Metellus, and Cn. Furius. The Sicilian registers, Metellus and Pacilus. Zonaras, Cæcilius Metellus, and C. Furius. Cassiodorus, Lu. Cæcilius and C. Furius. Eutropius, Osorius, and a capitol stone, L. Cæcilius Metellus, and Cn. Furius Pacilus. This is that Lu. Metellus, twice Consul and high priest, of whom Pliny writeth in his seventh book and three and fortieth chapter.

Polybius placeth for this years Consuls, C. Atilius and L. Manlius. Cassiodorus, C. Atilius Regulus, and L. Manlius. Orosius and a capitol stone, have C. Atilius Regulus, and L. Manlius Vulso, both Coss. the second time. Zonaras, C. Atilius the brother of Regulus, and L. Manlius. The Sicilian records, Regulus and Vulso.

Cassiodorus and Polybius inser for Consuls the next year, Pub. Claudius and L. Junius. Zonaras, L. Junius and C. Pulcher. Florus and Suetonius in Tiberius, put to Claudius the surname of Pulcher; and Censorinus to Junius of Pullus: which also are upon record in the Sicilian and capitoline tables. This P. Claudius, Cicero (in his books of Divination, [illegible] of the nature of gods) calleth the son of App. Cæcus: but Pliny (in his seventh book and three and fortieth chapter) nameth him his nephew or sons son. The capitol writers take part with Cicero. Val. Maximus in his first book and fourth chapter, speaketh of the same Consuls.

506

P. Servilius. C. Aurelius

For Consuls this year, Cassiodorus putteth down P. Servilius and C. Aurelius. Cicero in his book Lucullus, saith that these were twice Consuls. Which also is apparant by the Capitoll and Sicilian tables: in which their surnames are to be seen, Geminus II. and Cotta II.

It is recorded by Cassiodorus, that the Consuls of this year, were L. Cæcilius and N. Fabius: but Zonaras nameth them, Cæcilius Metellus, and Numerius Fabius. Cuspinians Kalender and the Sicilian Registers, have them in this manner; Metellus II. and Buteo II. But the capitoline tables shew them thus, L. Cæcilius Metellus II. N. Fabius Buteo II. Pliny also reporteth in his seventh book, that Metellus was twice Consul.

M'. Fabius. M'. Cæcilius.

Cassiodorus setteth down as Consuls, M'. Fabius and M'. Cæcilius. The Sicilian Registers, Crassus and Licinius. Gellius in his tenth book and first chapter, hath P. Licinius and Cæcilius Crassus. The capitol marble stones, M. Fabius Licinius, and M'. Cæcilius Crassus. Besides, Gellius in the place before alledged, Florus likewise in his 19 Breviary upon Livius maketh mention of these Consuls; as also Suetonius in Tiberius.

509

M. Falius. C. Atilius.

Cassiodorus reckoneth M. Fabius, and C. Atilius, Consuls for this year. The Sicilian tables, Buteo and Bulbus. But those of the capitol, M. Fabius Buteo, and C. Atilius Bulbus. Of Fabius the Consuls shipwrack, Florus speaketh out of the nineteenth book of Livy.

510

A. Manlius. C. Sempronius.

For this years Consuls, Cassiodorus setteth forth unto us, A. Manlius and C. Sempronius. The Sicilian records, Torquatus and Blæsus. Cuspinians book hath Atticus and Blæsus. The capitoline tables shew A. Manlius Torquatus Atticus, and C. Sempronius Blæsus II.

511

C. Fundanius. C. Sulpitius.

Cassiodorus putteth down, C. Fundanius, and C. Sulpitius for Consuls. The Sicilian writers, Fundulus and Gallus. The Capitol monuments, C. Fundanius Fundulus, and C. Sulpitius Gallus. None beſides make mention of them.

C. Lutatius Catulus. A. Poſtumius.

C*Aſſiodorus* delivereth unto us for Conſuls this year, C. Lutatius and A. Poſtumius. The Sicilian records, Catulus and Albinus. Entropius, and the capitol marbles, C. Lutatius Catulus, and A. Poſtumius Albinus.

513

Q. Lutatius Cereo. A. Manlius.

C*Aſſiodorus*, Entropius, and Oroſius, ſhew for conſuls this year, Q. Lutatius and A. Manlius. The Sicilian records, Cereo and Torquatus. They of the capitol, Q Lutatius Cereo, and Au. Manlius Torquatus Atticus II. Indeed C. Lutatius Cereo, is named for an Embaſſador by Livy in his 42 book.

C. Claudius Centho. M. Sempronius.

FOr this year there were Conſuls, C. Claudius Centho, and M. Sempronius Tudstanus, according to Caſſiodorus and the capitol writers. The Sicilian records teſtify alſo the ſame ſurnames. Of theſe conſuls likewiſe, beſides the capitol Writers, Cicero ſpeaketh in his Cato and Brutus, where he calleth this year (according to the judgment of Atticus, whereto Varro alſo agreeth) the 514 year from the foundation of the city; as alſo in his firſt Tuſculan queſtion. So doth Gellius 17 book 21 chap. and Caſſiodorus.

C. Mamilius. Q. Valerius.

NExt there followed in conſuls place, as witneſſeth Caſſiodorus, C. Mamilius and Q. Valerius: but according to the Sicilian regiſters, Turrinus and Falco: and after the capitol records, C. Mamilius Turrinus, and Q. Valerius Falco. Beſides, Verrius Flaccus and Caſſiodorus, Gellius alſo maketh mention of theſe Coſſ. in his 17 book and 21 chapter. So doth Cicero in Brutus and the Tuſculan queſtions, in which year they ſay, that Ennius the Poet was born.

516

T. Sempronius. P. Valerius.

FOr the year following, Caſſiodorus hath conſuls, T. Sempronius and P. Valerius. Gracchus and Falco, in Cuſpinians Kalender and the Sicilian records. Zonaras avoucheth, Semp. Gracchus, and P. Valerius. The capitol writers, have T. Sempronius Gracchus, and P. Valerius Falco. Oroſius ſpeaketh of theſe conſuls.

NExt to them, Caſſiodorus reporteth for conſuls, L. Cornelius and Q. Fulvius. Zonaras, L. Lentulus and Q. Flaccus. Entropius, L. Cornelius Lentulus, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus. The capitol regiſters give to Lentulus, the ſurname Candenus: and therefore in Cuſpinians Kalender, they ſtand by the names of Candinus and Flaccus. As for the Sicilian regiſters, they leave them out clean.

518

C. Licinius. P. Cornelius.

C*Aſſiodorus* putteth down for conſuls, C. Licinius and P. Cornelius. Zonaras, P. Lentulus and Licinius Varus. The capitoline writers C. Licinius Varus, and P. Cornelius Lentulus Caudinus. In like manner Cenſorinus; who reckoneth this for the 518 year after the cities foundation; following herein the computation of Varro, Cicero, and Pliny. Cuſpinians Kalender and the Sicilian regiſters, name them Claudius and Varus.

T. Manlius Torquatus. C. Atilius.

THis year had for conſuls, as Caſſiodorus ſaith, T. Manlius Torquatus, and C. Atilius. The Sicilian records, ſhew Torquatus and Bulbus: but Entropius, Oroſius, and the capitoll Tables ſhew, T. Manlius Torquatus, and C. Atilius Bulbus: unto Bulbus The capitol records put to the numeral note II. When T. Manlius Torquatus and C. Atilius Bulbus the ſecond time were coſſ. according to Verrius Flaccus, Entropius, Oroſius, and Caſſiodorus, and that there was peace throughout all the empire of Rome, the Temple of Janus was ſhut the ſecond time, as Plutarch ſheweth in Numa; as Livy alſo, Velleius, Entropius, and Oroſius, do teſtify.

C*Aſſiodorus* nameth for conſuls this year, L. Poſtumius and Sp. Carvilius. The Sicilian Regiſters have Albinus and Ruga. Zonaras, Poſtumius Albinus, and Sp. Carvilius. The capitol writers have L. Poſthumius Albinus, and Sp. Carvilius Maximus. That Ruga was a ſurname to the Carvilii, appeareth out of Gellius, who maketh mention of Sp. Carvilius Ruga, who at this time was the firſt that divorced his wife.

Q. Fabius. M'. Pomponius.

C*Aſſiodorus* putteth down for conſuls, Q. Fabius and M'. Pomponius. The Sicilian records Maximus and Matho. The capitoline writers have Q. Fabius Maximus Verrucoſus, and M. Pomponius Matho. Zonaras hath Q. Fabius Max. and M. Pomponius. The ſurname of Maximus, this Fabius took of his grand-father, and was not himſelf the firſt of that name, whatſoever Polybius writeth in his third book.

Ver-

Verrucosus he was called besides of a wert upon his lip, at Plutarch witnesseth, and he that wrote the treatise of Famous men.

522

M. Lepidus. M. Poplicius.

Marcus Lepidus and M. Poplicius are reputed to be Consuls this year by Cassiodorus. The Sicilian registers have Lepidus and Malleolus. Zonaras hath M. Malleolus and M. Æmylius. The capitol tables shew M. Æmylius Lepidus and M. Poplicius.

523

C. Papirius. M. Pomponius.

NExt after this were created Consuls, C. Papirius and M. Pomponius according to Cassiodorus, Zonaras, and Dionysius in his second book. The Sicilian registers shew Maso and Matho. But the Capitol records have C. Papirius Maso and M. Pomponius Matho. Of C. Papirius, son of C. surnamed Maso, a Pontify or Bishop, Livy speaketh in the year 540.

524

M. Æmylius. M. Junius.

ZOnaras and Cassiodorus exhibit unto us for Consuls, M. Æmylius and M. Junius. The Sicilian registers, Barbula and Pera. The Capitol records, M. Æmylius Barbula and M. Junius Pera.

525

C*Assiodorus* setteth down L. Postumius and Cn. Fulvius as Consuls. The Sicilian records Albinus and Centumalus. But those of the Capitol, and Eutropius, present unto us L. Postumius Albinus and Cn. Fulvius Centumalus. Polybius nameth Cn. Fulvius and A. Postumius.

Q. Fabius II. Sp. Carvilius.

THere are by Cassiodorus nominated for Consuls this year; Qu. Fabius Maximus the second time, and Sp. Carvilius. The Sicilian registers Maximus and Ruga. The Capitol writers set also unto Carvilius Maximus the mark and numeral note of a double Consulship. Cicero in his book entituled Cato, likewise in his second book of Rhetorical invention, maketh mention of these Consuls, and so doth Valerius in his chapter, discoursing of the kindnes and affectionate duty of children to their parents.

527

P. Valerius. M. Atilius.

THese are set down by Cassiodorus for Coss. this year, P. Valerius and M. Atilius. The Sicilian registers, have Flaccus and Regulus. The Capitol records represent P. Valerius Flaccus, and M. Atilius Regulus. Gellius writeth of them in his 4 book and 3 chapter.

NExt after, Cassiodorus putteth L. Apustius and M. Valerius Consuls. The Sicilian tables Maximus and Apustius. The Capitol monuments L. Apustius Fullo, and M. Valer. Messala.

IMmediatly followed Consuls, C. Atilius and L. Æmylius, as Cassiodorus and Polybius do witness: whom the Capitol writers call, C. Atilius Regulus, and L. Æmylius Papus. The Sicilian registers, Regulus and Papus. Zonaras, Regulus and Æmylius. Of these Consuls also Orosius maketh mention: and Pliny in his third book and twentieth chapter, where untruly men read Paulus for Papus.

T. Manlius. Q. Fulvius II.

THe year following had Consuls T. Manlius and Q. Fulvius the second time, according to Cassiodorus and Polybius, and as Orosius saith, T. Manlius Torquatus and Q. Fulvius Flaccus. Cuspinians tables, together with the Capitoline, have Torquatus the second time, and Flaccus likewise the second time, shewing the surnames only of these Coss.

531

C*Assiodorus* setteth down for Coss. C. Flaminius and P. Furius. So doth Polybius. Zonaras nameth them Flaminius and Furius. Plutarch likewise in Marcellus. The Sicilian tables name them Flaminius and Philus. But the capitol records, C. Flaminius, and P. Furius Philus.

M. Marcellus. Cn. Cornelius.

C*Assiodorus* nameth for the next Consuls, M. Marcellus and Cn. Cornelius. Polybius, M. Claudius and Cn. Cornelius. The Sicilian registers Scipio and Marcellus. Zonaras, Claudius Marcellus and Cn. Scipio. Eutropius, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio. The Capitoll tables M. Claudius Marcellus and Cn. Cornelius Scipio Calvus. This is that Marcellus, who was five times Consul: and this is that Scipio, who afterwards with his brother Scipio was slain in Spain by Asdrubal the Carthaginian.

533

P. Cornelius. M. Minutius.

C*Assiodorus* sheweth for this years Consuls, Cornelius and M. Minutius. So doth Zonaras, rus. The Sicilian regiſters have Scipio and Rufus. Entropius hath P. Cornelius and M. Minutius Rufus. Cuſpinians book Aſina and Rufus. Sigonius and Onuphrius both, do think that this P. Cornelius Scipio Aſina was his ſon, who in the firſt Punick war was twice conſul. And verily Livy, in the year 543 maketh mention of P. Cornelius Aſina, an honorable Senator, and who had been conſul.

Caſſiodorus and Zonaras exhibit unto us for conſuls, L. Veturius and C. Lutatius. The Sicilian regiſters Philo and Catulus. Cuſpinians book Philo and Scævola.

THe conſuls next following were M. Livius and L. Æmylius, as Caſsiodorus witneſſeth. Cuſpinians book and the Greek records ſhew Salinator and Paulus. Zonaras, M. Livius and Æmylius Paulus. Pliny maketh mention of theſe conſuls in the 29 book and firſt chapt.

P. Cornelius Scipio. T. Sempronius Longus.

C*Aſſiodorus* and Polybius put down for conſuls P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius. Zonaras, Sempronius Longus and P. Scipio. The Sicilian records, Longus and Scipio. Livy, Entropius, Probus, Oroſius, and Pædianus, name them P. Cornelius Scipio, and T. Sempronius Longus. Whiles theſe were conſuls, the ſecond Punick war aroſe, as writers have delivered unto us in their chronicles.

THen followed conſuls, as Polybius, Caſſiodorus, and Livy write, Cn. Servilius, together with C. Flaminius. But the two laſt named, as alſo the Sicilian regiſters, have given to Servilius the ſurname of Geminus. C. Flaminius now ſecond time conſul, with like pride as heretofore, entered into his magiſtracy in the Ides of March not at Rome but at Ariminum. The ſame man, in neglect and contempt of the Auſpicia or ſigns of birds, at what time as he made head and went againſt Annibal coming into Italy, fought a battel at the lake Thraſymenus, where his army was wholly deſeated and himſelf loſt his life: into whoſe place M. Atilius Regulus, who had been conſul before, was ſubſtituted. Thus much out of Livy and Polybius.

NExt to them Polybius bringeth in L. Æmylius and C. Terentius for conſuls. The Sicilian regiſters, Paulus and Varro. Plutarch in Paulus, Terentius Varro, and Æmylius Paulus. Livy, Caſſiodorus, and others, C. Terentius Varro, and L. Æmylius Paulus. Goltzius noteth, that the father of C. Terentius Varro, was one Aulus, a thing by others paſſed over.

M. Claudius Marcellus. II.
Q. Fabius Maximus. III.
T. Sempronius Gracchus.

Livy reporteth that the conſuls elect for this year, when M. Junius the Dictator held the ſolemn aſſembly for the election, were Lucius Poſthumius Albinus the third time, who as then ruled the province of Gaul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus, who had been maſter of the horſemen: and that Poſthumius before that he entred into government, was by Annibal in France environed and ſlain, in whoſe ſtead M. Marcellus was ſubrogated conſul now the ſecond time: who upon information given by the Augurs, that his creation was not good, reſigned: and commonly the Nobles gave out and ſaid, That the Gods were not well pleaſed, that two commoners were then firſt choſen conſuls: whereupon in the room of Marcellus, Quintus Fabius Maximus was choſen conſul the third time. Thus write Livy and Plutarch. And for this cauſe it is that Caſſiodorus, Oroſius, and Entropius do put down for this years conſuls, T. Sempronius and Q. Fabius.

Q. Fabius. IV. M. Claudius Marcellus. III.

Livy, Plutarch, and Caſſiodorus, ſet out for conſuls this year, Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and M. Claudius Marcellus the third time. Moreover, Cicero oftentimes and Frontinus in his ſecond book of ſtratagems, make mention of theſe conſuls.

541

Q. Fabius Max. ſon of Verrucoſus.
T. Sempronius Gracchus. II.

AGainſt this year were both the conſuls created in their abſence, namely, Q. Fab. Max. the ſon of Verrucoſus, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the ſecond time: as Livy teſtifieth and Caſſiodorus, together with the Sicilian regiſters. This Fabius had been Prætor the former year: and Gracchus conſul two years before. Theſe conſuls Gellius nominateth out of Quadrigarius, the ſecond book and ſecond chapter. Likewiſe Cicero and Valerius.

542

App. Claudius Pulcher.
Q. Fulvius Flaccus. III.

THe conſuls created for this year by the Dictator, were Quintus Fulvius Flaccus the third time, who then was maſter of the horſemen, and Appius Claudius Pulcher, who in his his pretorſhip was L. deputy in Sicily, as Livy, Plutarch in Fabius, Caſſiodorus, and Feſtus in his 17 book do witneſs.

C. Sulpitius Galba. Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.

VPon the receit of certain letters, the Conſuls agreed together, that Claudius ſhould hold the election for magiſtrats and ſee it finiſhed, whiles Fulvius remained ſtill before Capua. Claudius created for conſuls, Cn. Fulvius Centumalus, and P. Sulpitius ſon of Servius, and ſurnamed Galba, who before time had born no ſtate-office of the chair. Thus writeth Livius. The ſame conſuls alſo Caſſiodorus doth deliver. Oroſius likewiſe and Feſtus in his 17 book. The Sicilian records declare Galba and Centumalus. As for S. Sulpitius, he is named in his ſecond conſulſhip, as it appeareth upon record in the capitol, the ſon of Ser. nephew of Publius ſurnamed Galba Maximus.

M. Val. Lævinus. II. M. Claudius Marcellus. IV.

L*Ivy*, Sextus Pompeius, Valerius Maximus, Plutarch, Florus, Eutropius, and Oroſius, do preſent for conſuls this year, M. Claudius Marcellus and M. Valerius Lævinus. Now this is Marcellus his fourth conſulſhip, as Plutarch and Livy write: but Caſſiodorus ſaith, that he was but the third time with M. Valerius Lævinus, leaving out that conſulſhip which he bare not through, becauſe of the errour in his creation: and yet is it one of the five that he is reported to have born. Livy in the nine and twentieth and thirtieth books, writeth that M. Valerius was twice conſul. In like manner, the book of Caſpinian hath for this year, Marcellus the fourth time, and Lævinus the ſecond time. And therefore Onuphrius ſuppoſeth that his firſt conſulat was in the year five hundred four-and-thirty: and his ſecond, now. Of him Polybius and Cicero make mention.

Q. Fulvius Flaccus. IV.

THe conſuls for this year created, were Q. Fabius the fift time, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus the fourth time, the ſame man who being Dictator, held the aſſembly for that election; as Livy and Caſſiodorus do witneſs. The Sicilian records ſet forth Fabius and Flaccus. Whiles theſe were conſuls, Cicero in his Oration againſt Rullus, ſaith that Capua was won: and yet Livy hath reported it two years before. Of theſe conſuls Valerius alſo, together with Plutarch, Eutropius, and Oroſius have made mention.

546

T. Quintius Criſpinus.

IN the eleventh year of the Punick war, there entred into their conſulſhip, M. Marcellus the fift time (ſo ye reckon that conſulſhip which upon an error in the creation he kept not) and T. Quintius Criſpinus. So ſaith Livy. Plutarch alſo nameth Marcellus the fift time and Criſpinus. But Caſſiodorus reckoneth Marcellus but the fourth time with Criſpinus, paſſing over that faulty conſulat of his. Moreover theſe conſuls are mentioned by Cicero Valerius, Plinius the yonger, Probus, Eutropius, and Oroſius: who alſo report that they both were forelaid and intrapped in ambuſh by Annibal: in ſo much as Marcellus was preſently ſlain in the place, and Quintius fled ſore wounded.

547

M. Livius Salinator.

VWHen the LL. of the Senat caſt about to ſee whom they ſhould create conſuls, behold, the moſt eminent and ſingular man above all others, was C. Claudius Nero: unto whom was joined as companion in government M. Livius, who many years before, upon a conſulat that he had born, was by the judgment of the people condemned; and almoſt eight years after his condemnation was by Marcus Marcellus, and Marcus Livius then conſuls, reduced into the city. In like manner, the Sicilian Regiſters name for conſuls, Nero and Salinator. The capitol records ſhew Caius Claudius Nero, with M. Livius Salinator.

548

L. Veturius Philo.

L*Ivy*, Caſſiodorus, and the records of the capitol, exhibit unto us for conſuls this year, L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Cæcilius Metellus. The Sicilian regiſters, Metellus and Philo. Over and beſides, of theſe conſuls Cicero many a time and often, Valerius, Plutarch in Africanus, Appianus in Iberica, Pliny in his 7 book 43 chap. do make mention.

P. Licinius Craſſus.

L*Ucius Veturius Philo* held the aſſembly for creation of Magiſtrats, wherein all the centuries in general, with exceeding great favour nominated Publius Scipio for conſul, and to him was joined in government, P. Licinius Craſſus, the ſupream pontify. Thus ſaith Livy. The Sicilian tables have Scipio with Craſſus. The capitol records ſhew P. Cornelius Scipio,

Scipio, ſurnamed afterwards Africanus, with P. Licinius Craſſus the rich, of whom Caſſiodorus likewiſe and Cicero in Brutus do ſpeak.

M. Cornelius Cethegus. P. Sempr. Tuditanus.

Livy, Caſſiodorus, and the capitol records do name for Conſuls this year, P. Sempronius Tuditanus, and M. Cornelius Cethegus. The Sicilian regiſters, Cethegus and Tuditanus, of whom Cicero in Brutus, Plutarch, Eutropius and Caſſiodorus do often times make mention. In this year P. Scipio Naſica, judged by the Senate the beſt man in the city, received dame Idaa.

Cn. Servilius Capio. C. Servilius.

Livy and Caſſiodorus together, with the Sicilian records and capitol monuments, put unto us for Conſuls Cn. Servilius Capio and C. Servilius. Of which twain Capio had been Pretor in the year 548, and Servilius in 547. This year died Q. Fabius Max: and Annibal with a ſad cheer and heavy heart departed out of Italy into Africk by commandment of certain delegate Embaſſadors, in the ſeventeenth year of the ſecond Punick war.

Tib. Claudius Nero. M. Servilius Geminus.

MArcus Servilius Geminus, and Tib. Claudius Nero were Coſſ. this year according to Livy, Caſſiodorus, and the capitol records, in which Servilius ſtandeth ſurnamed Pulex. Geminus. The Sicilian tables have Nero with Servilius. In theſe Conſuls year, Annibal was in Africk by Scipio overthrown, and a ſecond peace made with the Carthaginians, as Polybius, Livy, Plutarch, Appian, and Eutropius do report.

Cn. Cornelius Lentulus. P. Ælius Patus.

AGainſt this year were created Conſuls, as Livy writeth, Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Ælius Patus. So ſaith Caſſiodorus alſo and Pliny in his eighteenth book and eighteenth chapter. In a broken peece of marble in the Capitol, we find Lentulus and P. Aelius: in the Sicilian regiſters, Lentulus and Patus. Theſe two were Pretors both in the year 550.

P. Sulpitius Galba. C. Aurelius Cotta.

Livy and Caſſiodorus put down for Conſuls, P. Sulpitius Galba, and C. Aurelius Cotta. This P. Sulpitius in the year 542 was firſt Conſul; and C. Cotta two years before, Pretor. Theſe ſame Conſuls are to be ſeen in the capitoll tables, but Galba and Cotta in the Sicilian.

THis year had for Conſuls, L. Cornelius and P. Villius, as Caſſiodorus writeth: but according to Livy and the capitol monuments, Lentulus and Tappulus: after the Sicilian records, L. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Villius Tappulus. Of P. Villius Conſul, Plutarch maketh mention in Quintius.

T. Quintius Flaminius. Sex. Ælius Patus.

Livy, Caſſiodorus, the capitol records, together with Plutarch in Quintius, report unto us for conſuls this year, T. Quintius Flaminius and Sext. Ælius Patus. The Sicilian tables, Flaminius and Patus. Pliny in his book of famous men, ſaith (but not without ſome error) that this Flaminius was the ſon of that C. Flaminius who was ſlain at Thraſymenus. Whereas in deed this man was deſcended of the noble Patritian houſe of the Quintii, the other of the family of Flaminii, no better than commoners. Now this Sex. Ælius Patus is the man of whom Cicero giveth this report out of the poet Ennius:

Tbis Sextus Ælius in records, Catus ſurnam'd ys ſet,
A worthy wight for wiſedome rare, a diſcreet man wa bl

And therefore in the capitol tables he is called Patus Catus.

557
C. Cornelius Cethegus. Q. Minutius Rufus.

IN this year C. Cornelius Cethegus, and Q. Minutius were conſuls, after Livy, Caſſiodorus, and the capitol marbles. Their ſurnames only appear in the Sicilian regiſters. And Cicero ſpeaketh of them in Brutus.

THis year had for Conſuls, L. Furius Purpureo, and M. Claudius Marcellus, according to Livy, Caſſiodorus, and the capitol records. The Sicilian annals deliver unto us Porphyreo and Marcellus.

M. Portius Cato. L. Valerius Flaccus.

MArcus Portius Cato and L. Valerius are ranged Conſuls this year, by Verrius Flaccus, Cicero in many places, Livy, Plutarch, Pliny, Valerius, Probus, Eutropius, Oroſius, and Caſſiodorus.

560
T. Sempronius Longinus.

Livy, Caſſiodorus, the monuments both of the capitol and Sicily, match Conſuls together this year, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus the ſecond second time, and T. Sempronius Longus. Of them Cicero maketh mention in the oration of Cornelius accused of felony, appeareth in Pædianus.

Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol authors, write that the Consuls chosen to succeed in this year, were L. Cornelius Merula, and Q. Minutius Thermus. The said surnames are found in the Sicilian records. Probus speaketh of them in Annibal, and Frontius in his book of stratagems.

Lucius Quintius Flaminius, and Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus were this years Consuls, as Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records testify. The Sicilian registers also shew their surnames.

M. Acilius Glabrio. P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica.

THe Consuls created for this year, were P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, and M. Acilius Glabrio, son of Cn. as testify Livy, Cassiodorus, the capitol records, Plutarch in Quintus, and Appian in his Syriack history. In the Sicilian registers, named they are Glabrio and Nasica. In these Consuls year the same authors report that the war against Antiochus King of Syria, and against the Ætolians, was proclaimed: which in the capitol monuments, in Paterculus and Macrobius, is called the Antiochian, but by Florus and Pliny the yonger in Cato, the Syrian war. This was the 562 year from the cities foundation, as Macrobius writeth in his first book of Saturnals.

CAssiodorus, Livius, and the capitol tables put down for Consuls this year, L. Cornelius Scipio and C. Lælius. The Sicilian registers have Scipio and Lelius. The same men Gellius in his sixteenth book and fourth chapter nameth C. Lælius son of C. and L. Scipio, son of P. To Lælius Cassiodore only addeth the surname Africanus. This L. Scipio surnamed Asiaticus, was brother to Africanus.

565
C. Manlius Vulso. M. Fulvius Nobilior.

CNeus Manlius Vulso, and M. Fulvius Nobilior, are nominated Consuls for this year by Livy, Cassiodore, and the tables both of the capitol and Sicily. Manlius was Pretor in the year 557 and Fulvius anno 560.

566
C. Livius Salinator. M. Valerius Messala.

THe Consuls next following, were M. Valerius Messala, and C. Livius Salinator, as Livy and Cassiodorus testify, together with the Sicilian and capitol tables.

M. Æmylius Lepidus. C. Flaminius.

THe next Consuls, were M. Æmylius Lepidus and C. Flaminius, as witnes Livy, Cassiodorus, Zonaras, Strabo in his fist book, the Sicilian and capitol tables. Of them Valerius maketh mention in his sixth book. This is that M. Lepidus who was the Arch-bishop, twice Consul, Censor, and President of the Senat six times chosen by the Censors. And this is that C. Flaminius, who afterward by Cato the Censor was displaced out of the Senat and disrobed.

Sp. Posthumius Albinus. Q. Martius Philippus.

Livy, Cassiodorus, Eutropius, and the capitol tables report Consuls for this year, Sp. Posthumius Albinus, and Q. Martius Philippus. The Sicilian Registers name them barely, Albinus and Philippus. Valerius maketh mention of them in his sixt book and third chapter. Likewise Pliny in his 33 book and tenth chapter.

569
Ap. Claudius Pulcher. M. Sempronius Tuditanus.

FOr this years Consuls were Appius Claudius Pulcher, & M. Sempronius Tuditanus, as Livy, Cassiodorus and the capitol records do testify. They stand in the Sicilian records by the names of Pulcher and Tuditanus.

THe Consuls that followed for this year, were L. Portius Licinius & P. Claudius Pulcher witness Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol tables. Pulcher and Licinius they be called in the Sicilian records.

Q. Fabius Labeo. M. Claudius Marcellus.

AGainst this year were created Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus and Q. Fabius Labeo, according to Livy, Cassiodorus & the capitol marble stones. Their surnames be found also in the Sicilian tables. Whiles these were consuls, Atticus wrote that Annibal died, as Probus maketh report in Annibal.

CNeus Bœbius Tamphilus and L. Æmylius Paulus were created Consuls for this year, as Livy, Cassiodorus, the capitol, yea and the Sicilian tables do testify, although these last have regard only of their surnames. This L. Æmylius is the son of that L. Æmylius, who was slain at Canna, as Plutarch and Velleius do witness.

573

Scipio, ſurnamed afterwards Africanus, with P. Licinius Craſſus the rich, of whom Caſſiodorus likewiſe and Cicero in Brutus do ſpeak.

Livy, Caſſiodorus, and the capitol records do name for Conſuls this year, P. Sempronius Tudstanus, and M. Cornelius Cethegus. The Sicilian regiſters, Cethegus and Tuditanus, of whom Cicero in Brutus, Plutarch, Eutropius and Caſſiodorus do often times make mention. In this year P. Scipio Naſica, judged by the Senate the beſt man in the city, received dame Idæa.

Cn. Servilius Capio. C. Servilius.

Livy and Caſſiodorus together, with the Sicilian records and capitol monuments, put unto us for Conſuls Cn. Servilius Capio and C. Servilius. Of which twain Capio had been Pretor in the year 548, and Servilius in 547. This year died Q. Fabius Max: and Annibal with a ſad cheer and heavy heart departed out of Italy into Africk by commandment of certain delegate Embaſſadors, in the ſeventeenth year of the ſecond Punick war.

Tib. Claudius Nero. M. Servilius Geminus.

M*Arcus Servilius Geminus*, and Tib. Claudius Nero were Coſſ. this year according to Livy, Caſſiodorus, and the capitol records, in which Servilius ſtandeth ſurnamed Pulex. Geminus. The Sicilian tables have Nero with Servilius. In theſe Conſuls year, Annibal was in Africk by Scipio overthrown, and a ſecond peace made with the Carthaginians, as Polybius, Livy, Plutarch, Appian, and Eutropius do report.

AGainſt this year were created Conſuls, as Livy writeth, Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Ælius Patus. So ſaith Caſſiodorus alſo and Pliny in his eighteenth book and eighteenth chapter. In a broken peece of marble in the Capitol, we find Lentulus and P. Aelius: in the Sicilian regiſters, Lentulus and Patus. Theſe two were Pretors both in the year 550.

P. Sulpitius Galba. C. Aurelius Cotta.

Livy and Caſſiodorus put down for Conſuls, P. Sulpitius Galba, and C. Aurelius Cotta. This P. Sulpitius in the year 542 was firſt Conſul; and C. Cotta two years before, Pretor. Theſe ſame Conſuls are to be ſeen in the capitoll tables, but Galba and Cotta in the Sicilian.

THis year had for Conſuls, L. Cornelius and P. Villius, as Caſſiodorus writeth: but according to Livy and the capitol monuments, Lentulus and Tappulus: after the Sicilian records, L. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Villius Tappulus. Of P. Villius Conſul, Plutarch maketh mention in Quintius.

T. Quintius Flaminius. Sex. Ælius Patus.

Livy, Caſſiodorus, the capitol records, together with Plutarch in Quintius, report unto us for conſuls this year, T. Quintius Flamininus and Sext. Ælius Patus. The Sicilian tables, Flaminius and Patus. Pliny in his book of famous men, ſaith (but not without ſome error) that this Flaminius was the ſon of that C. Flaminius who was ſlain at Thraſymenus. Whereas in deed this man was deſcended of the noble Patritian houſe of the Quintii, the other of the family of Flaminii, no better than commoners. Now this Sex. Ælius Patus is the man of whom Cicero giveth this report out of the poet Ennius:

Tho Sextus Ælius in records, Catus ſurnam'd ye ſet,
A worthy wight for wiſedome rare, a diſcreet man was he.

And therefore in the capitol tables he is called Patus Catus.

IN this year C. Cornelius Cethegus, and Q. Minutius were conſuls, after Livy, Caſſiodorus, and the capitol marbles. Their ſurnames only appear in the Sicilian regiſters. And Cicero ſpeaketh of them in Brutus.

THis year had for Conſuls, L. Furius Purpureo, and M. Claudius Marcellus, according to Livy, Caſſiodorus, and the capitol records. The Sicilian annals deliver unto us Porphyreo and Marcellus.

560

T. Sempronius Longinus.

Livy, Caſſiodorus, the monuments both of the capitol and Sicily, match Conſuls together this year, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus the ſecond second time, and T. Sempronius Longus. Of them Cicero maketh mention in the oration of Cornelius accused of felony, appeareth in Pædianus.

Lucius Quintius Flaminius, and Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus were this years Consuls, as Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records testify. The Sicilian registers also shew their surnames.

M. Acilius Glabrio. P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica.

THe Consuls created for this year, were P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, and M. Acilius Glabrio, son of Cn. as testify Livy, Cassiodorus, the capitol records, Plutarch in Quintius, and Appian in his Syriack history. In the Sicilian registers, named they are Glabrio and Nasica. In these Consuls year the same authors report that the war against Antiochus King of Syria, and against the Ætolians, was proclaimed: which in the capitol monuments, in Paterculus and Macrobius, is called the Antiochian, but by Florus and Pliny the yonger in Cato, the Syrian war. This was the 562 year from the cities foundation, as Macrobius writeth in his first book of Saturnals.

Cassiodorus, Livius, and the capitol tables put down for Consuls this year, L. Cornelius Scipio and C. Lælius. The Sicilian registers have Scipio and Lælius. The same men Gellius in his sixteenth book and fourth chapter nameth C. Lælius son of C. and L. Scipio, son of P. To Lælius Cassiodore only addeth the surname Africanus. This L. Scipio surnamed Asiaticus, was brother to Africanus.

C. Manlius Vulso. M. Fulvius Nobilior.

CNeus Manlius Vulso, and M. Fulvius Nobilior, are nominated Consuls for this year by Livy, Cassiodore, and the tables both of the capitol and Sicily. Manlius was Pretor in the year 557 and Fulvius anno 560.

566

C. Livius Salinator. M. Valerius Messala.

THe Consuls next following, were M. Valerius Messala, and C. Livius Salinator, as Livy and Cassiodorus testify, together with the Sicilian and capitol tables.

M. Æmylius Lepidus. C. Flaminius.

THe next Consuls, were M. Æmylius Lepidus and C. Flaminius, as witnes Livy, Cassiodorus, Zonaras, Strabo in his fist book, the Sicilian and capitol tables. Of them Valerius maketh mention in his sixth book. This is that M. Lepidus who was the Arch-bishop, twice Consul, Censor, and President of the Senat six times chosen by the Censors. And this is that C. Flaminius who afterward by Cato the Censor was displaced out of the Senat and disrobed.

Sp. Posthumius Albinus. Q. Martius Philippus.

569

Ap. Claudius Pulcher. M. Sempronius Tuditanus.

FOr this years Consuls were Appius Claudius Pulcher, & M. Sempronius Tuditanus, as Livy, Cassiodorus and the capitol records do testify. They stand in the Sicilian records by the names of Pulcher and Tuditanus.

THe Consuls that followed for this year, were L. Portius Licinius & P. Claudius Pulcher witness Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol tables. Pulcher and Licinius they be called in the Sicilian records.

Q. Fabius Labeo. M. Claudius Marcellus.

AGainst this year were created Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus and Q. Fabius Labeo, according to Livy, Cassiodorus & the capitol marble stones. Their surnames be found also in the Sicilian tables. Whiles these were consuls, Atticus wrote that Annibal died, as Probus maketh report in Annibal.

CNeus Bœbius Tamphilus and L. Æmylius Paulus were created Consuls for this year, as Livy, Cassiodorus, the capitol, yea and the Sicilian tables do testify, although these last have regard only of their surnames. This L. Æmylius is the son of that L. Æmylius, who was slain at Canna, as Plutarch and Velleius do witness.

P. Cornelius Cethegus. M. Bœbius Tamphilus.

PUblius Cornelius Cethegus and M. Bœbius Tamphilus, ſucceeded Conſuls this year, after Livy, Caſſiodore and the capitol tables. Cethegus and Tamphilus they be called in the Sicilian records. Of P. Cornelius and M. Bœbius conſ, Plutarch made mention in Numa. Of P. Cornelius and M. Bœbius Tamphilus, Valerius ſpeaketh in his firſt book and firſt chapter. Of P. Cornelius Lentulus, and M. Bœbius Tamphilus in 11 book and firſt chapter. But Pliny in his 13 book and 13 chapter calleth the one P. Cornelius Cethegus, ſon of Lucius: and the other M. Bœbius ſon of Q. ſurnamed Tamphilus.

574
A. Poſthumius Albinus. C. Calpurnius Piſo.

LIvy, Caſſiodorus, and the capitol monuments exhibit unto us for this years Conſuls, A. Poſthumius Albinus, and C. Calpurnius Piſo. The Sicilian tables, Albinus and Piſo. Piſo was Pretor in the year 567. And Albinus anno 568. But when as a peſtilence had reigned now three years, ſo as it diſpeopled the City of Rome and all Italy, it hapned that C. Calpurnius died, not without ſuſpition that he was murdered by Q. Hoſtilia: in whoſe room Q. Fulvius Flaccus his father in law or mothers husband, was declared Conſul.

575
L. Manlius Acidinus. Q. Fulvius Flaccus.

LIvy, Caſſiodore, and the capitol records ſhew for Conſuls this year, L. Manlius Acidinus and Q. Fulvius Flaccus. The Sicilian tables, Acidinus with Fluccus. Cicero maketh mention of Acidinus a Conſul, in his ſecond book of a perfect orator. Alſo obſerved it is in the capitol monuments, that theſe Conſuls were german brethren: and the ſame hath Velleius in his ſecond book reported. And thereby it cometh to paſs, that in the capitol tables L. Manlius Acidinus, is ſurnamed alſo Fulvianus after the manner of thoſe that are adopted.

M. Iunius Brutus. A. Manlius Vulſo.

NExt Conſuls created, were M. Iunius Brutus and A. Manlius Vulſo: as Livy, Caſſiodore, and the capitol records do teſtify. Brutus and Vulſo they be named in the Sicilian monuments. This Brutus was Pretor in the year 562, and Vulſo in 571.

577
C. Claudius Pulcher. Tib. Sempronius Gracchus.

CAius Claudius Pulcher and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, are matched Conſuls this year by Val. Flaccus, Livy, and Caſſiodorus. Of this Tib. Gracchus Cicero ſpeaketh in his firſt book of divination, and Frontinus in his firſt of ſtratagems.

578
C. Cornelius Scipio Hiſpalus.
Q. Petilius Spurinus.
C. Valerius Lavinus.

LIvy, Caſſiodore, and the capitol records exhibit unto us for Conſuls, C. Cornelius Scipio Hiſpalus, and Q. Petilius Spurinus. The Sicilian Regiſters, Scipio and Petilius. But when as Scipio returning out of the mount Albanus, fell into a fit of Apoplexy, and ſo into a dead palſey, whereupon he went to the bath at Cumes, where, by reaſon that his diſeaſe grew upon him, he departed this life; Q. Petilius the other Conſul, created for his companion to enter preſently upon the government, C. Valerius Lavinus. Thus ſaith Livy.

579
P. Mutius Scævola. M. Aemilius Lepidus II.

OSius putteth down for Conſuls Lepidus and Mutius, Caſſiodorus and Obſequens, M. Lepidus and P. Mutius. The Sicilian tables, Lepidus and Scævola. The capitol monuments, P. Mutius Scævola and M. Æmylius Lepidus II. The election of the Conſuls this year is loſt in Livy. Cicero likewiſe writeth in his diſcourſe of Provinces; Valerius alſo in his ſixt book and ſixt chapter, that this M. Æmylius Lepidus was twice Conſul.

Sp. Poſthumius Albinus. Q. Mutius Scævola.

CAſſiodorus ſetteth down for Conſuls, Sp. Poſthumius and Q. Mutius. The capitol records, Sp. Poſthumius Albinus Paulus, and Q. Mutius Scævola. Cuſpinians book hath Paulus and Scævola. Pliny maketh mention of theſe in his ſecond book and 31 chapter. The election of the Conſuls this year is loſt in Livy.

581
L. Poſthumius Albinus. M. Popilius Lanas.

THe Coſſ. for this year created, were L. Poſthumius Albinus and M. Popilius Lanas, as Livy, Caſſiodorus, and the capitol monuments do teſtify. Albinus and Lanas are put down in the Sicilian records. Whiles theſe were conſuls, the feaſt Floralia was inſtituted firſt, as Ovid ſheweth in his fift book of his Kalender.

C. Popilius Lanas. P. Ælius Ligur.

THis year had for conſuls, C. Popilius Lanas, and P. Ælius Ligur, as Livy, Caſſiodorus, and the capitol records do teſtify. The Sicilian regiſters name them Lanas and Ælius. To this day had no Coſſ. in one year been matched together, both commoners: and this was the firſt time, that both conſuls were created out of the commons, as is obſerved in the capitol monuments. After this, you ſhall never find the conſuls both Patritii: commoners ye ſhall have them both twain, many a time and often: but moſt of all, a commoner and a Patrician, one with another.

P. Licinius Craſſus. C. Caſſius Longinus.

THe Conſuls next enſuing for this year, were P. Licinius Craſſus, and C. Caſſius Longinus, as it appeareth in Livy, Caſſiodorus, Oroſius, and the capitol tables. For in the Sicilian records, they are named no otherwiſe than Craſſus and Longus. Of the very ſame Conſuls Pliny maketh mention in his ſeventh book. Gellius alſo in his ninth book and fourth chapter. Whiles theſe were Conſuls the people of Rome began war againſt Perſeus King of the Macedonians, ſon of Philip: which Florus and Eutropius, together with Oroſius, call the ſecond Macedonian war: whereof Livy and Plutarch write more at large.

A. Hoſtilius Mancinus. A. Atilius Serranus.

C*Aſſiodorus* ſetteth next after for Conſuls, C. Hoſtilius Mancinus, and C. Atilius. The Sicilian regiſters, Mancinus and Serranus. The capitol monuments, A. Atilius Mancinus, and Au. Atilius Serranus. As well the election of theſe Conſuls as their acts, are miſſing in the Annals of Livy.

Q. Martius Philippus. II. Cn. Servilius Capio.

L*Ivy*, Caſſiodorus, and the capitol tables match together in the Conſulſhip of this year Q. Martius Philippus the ſecond time, and Cn. Servilius Capio. The Sicilian catalogue hath barely Philip and Capio. Cicero in his books entituled Brutus and Cato, writeth that Ennius the Poet died in their Conſulat.

THe Conſuls that next ſucceeded were Lu. Æmylius Paulus the ſecond time (ſeventeen years after his firſt Conſulſhip) and Caius Licinius Craſſus: witneſs Livy, Caſſiodorus, and the capitol monuments. In like manner they are named in the Sicilian regiſters Paulus and Craſſus. As touching this ſecond Conſulat of L. Paulus, Plutarch, Velleius, Oroſius, Eutropius, Florus, and Juſtinus in his 33 book do write. Plutarch addeth thus much and ſaith, That Paulus was threeſcore years of age, when he was choſen Conſul the ſecond time.

Q. Ælius Patus. M. Junius.

L*Ivy* bringeth in for Conſuls next after, Qu. Æmylius and M. Junius. The Sicilian records Patus and Pennus. Obſequens and Caſſiodorus Q. Ælius Petus, and M. Junius Pennus. Cicero likewiſe in Brutus ſpeaketh of Mar. Junius Pennus Conſul with Q. Ælius. Now from this year forward, we want the compleat ſtory penned by Livy.

588

M. Marcellus. C. Sulpitius.

L*Ivy* and the capitol monuments ſhew for this years Conſuls, M. Claudius Marcellus, and C. Sulpitius Gallus. Obſequens, and the title prefixed before the comedy Andria in Terence, exhibit Mar. Marcellus and C. Sulpitius. This is that Marcellus, who after he had been thrice Conſul, periſhed in the ſea. Nephew he was of that M. Marcellus, who had been five times Conſul, as Pædianus reporteth. Of theſe Conſuls, Juſtine, Pliny in his ſecond book, and many other have made mention.

C*Aſſiodorus* and Obſequens infer Conſuls this year, Cn. Octavius and T. Manlius. The Sicilian tables, Octavius and Torquatus. The capitol ſtones Cr. Octavius and T. Manlius Torquatus. Mention there is made of theſe conſuls in the title ſet before Hecyra in Terence. Cicero in his firſt book of Final ends, and likewiſe in many other places, ſpeaketh of T. Torquatus, Conſul with Cn. Octavius.

A. Manlius. Q. C. ſſius.

C*Aſſiodorus* matcheth together conſuls in this year, A. Manlius and Q. C. ſſius. The Sicilian catalogue hath Torquatus and Longinus. The capitol records A. Manlius Torquatus and Qu. Caſſius Longinus, who died in his conſulſhip. Theſe alſo had been companions together in their Pretorſhip, anno 586, as Livy beareth witneſs.

T. Sempronius. M. Iuventius.

C*Aſſiodorus* ſaith, that the conſuls this year were T. Sempronius and M. Iuventius. Obſequens nameth them, T. Gracchus, and M. Iuventius. The capitol monuments ſhew T. Sempronius Gracchus the ſecond time, and M. Iuventius Thalva. In the Sicilian regiſters, Dolabella and Thalva, but not well as it is to be doubted. Cicero, Valerius, and Plutarch have made mention of Tib. Gracchus twice conſul. And that M. Iuventius died whiles he was conſul, Pliny in his ſeventh book, and Valerius alſo do report.

P. Cornelius Scipio Naſica. C. Martius.

C*Icero* in his firſt and ſecond book of the nature of Gods, Verrius Flaccus, Obſequens and Caſſiodorus, report for conſuls P. Cornel. Scipio Naſica and C. Martius Figulus. But for that there was an error committed in their creation, and thereupon they reſigned up their place, as the foreſaid authors witneſs together with Valerius Plutarch, and Pliny: P. Corn. Lentulus, and Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus, entred in their ſtead.

M. Meſſala. C. Fannius.

CAſſiodorus putteth down for Conſuls, M. Meſſala and C. Fannius. The Sicilian Catalogue Meſſala and Strabo. The capitol records, and the title before Phormio in Terence repreſent unto us, M. Valerius Meſſala, and Caius Fannius Strabo. Of theſe Conſuls Suetonius maketh mention in his book of excellent Rhetoricians. Likewiſe in Cicero in Brutus, Pliny in his ninth book and fiftieth chapter, and Gellius in his ſecond book.

L. Anicius. M. Cornelius Cethegus.

CAſſiodorus and the title ſet before the Comedy Adelphi in Terence avouch for Coſſ. L. Anicius and M. Cornelius. The Sicilian and capitol records put ſurnames unto them, Gallus and Cethegus. Of Anicius the Conſul, Cicero ſpeaketh in Brutus: and of Cethegus, the ſix and fortieth Epitome or Breviary of Florus. In their year, it is for certain held, that L. Paulus who conquered Perſeus, died.

595

Cn. Cornelius Dolabella. M. Fulvius.

THe year next following had Conſuls, as witneſſeth Caſſiodorus, Cn. Cornelius Dolabella and M. Fulvius. The Sicilian regiſters ſhew Dolobella and Fulvius. The capitol monuments, Cn. Cornelius Dolobella and Mar. Fulvius Nobilior. The ſame is to be ſeen in the life of Terence the poet, for there it is written, that in their year he died.

596

N. Æmylius. C. Popilius.

THe Conſuls next ſucceeding, were Marcus Æmylius and C. Popilius, as Caſſiodorus ſaith. The Sicilian catalogue ſheweth Lepidus and Lænas. The capitol records have M. Æmylius Lepidus and C. Popilius Lænas the ſecond time. Of the ſame Cenſorinus maketh mention in his chapter of diſtinction of ages.

597

Sex. Julius. L. Aurelius.

CAſſiodorus reporteth, that the next Conſuls were Sex. Julius and L. Aurelius. The Sicilian and capitol tables yeeld ſurnames unto them, Cæſar to Julius, and Oreſtes to Aurelius. Pliny writeth of them in his 33 book.

598

OBſequens and Caſſiodorus record for this years Conſuls L. Lentulus and C. Martius. The Sicilian catalogue Lentulus and Figulus. The capitol monuments, L. Cornelius Lentulus Lupus, and C. Martius Figulus the ſecond time. Cicero in Brutus ſpeaketh of them both. And as touching Figulus twice Conſul, Valerius writeth in his chapter of Wrath.

P. Scipio Naſica. M. Claudius.

PUblius Scipio and M. Claudius are by Caſſiodorus ſet down for Coſſ. The Sicilian regiſters have Naſica and Marcellus. The capitol records, P. Cornelius Scipio Naſica the ſecond time, and M. Claudius Marcellus likewiſe the ſecond time. Padianus writeth, that this Marcellus was thrice Conſul. And that Pub. Scipio Naſica, ſurnamed alſo Corculum, was twice Conſul and Cenſor beſides, Cicero writeth in his Brutus.

600

L. Poſthumius. Q. Opimius.

THis year had Conſuls, Lu. Poſtumius and Qu. Opimius, as Caſſiodorus and Obſequens do witneſs. The Sicilian tables ſhew Opimius and Albinus. But the capitol records Q. Opimius, and Lu. Poſtumius Albinus. Mention there is made of this Q. Opimius, Conſul, by Cicero in his Brutus; alſo in the Epitome of the ſeven and fortieth book. Moreover, that Poſtumius died in his magiſtracy, beſides Verrius Flaccus, Obſequens alſo ſheweth: in whoſe ſtead Man. Acilius Glabrio was choſen.

Q. Fulvius. T. Annius.

THe Conſuls next following, as Caſſiodorus writeth, were Qu. Fulvius and T. Annius. In the capitol fragments they are named Nobilior and T. Annius. In the Sicilian regiſters, Nobilior and Luſcus. Cicero in his Brutus ſaith, that Q. Nobilior ſon of Marcus, and T. Annius Luſcus were Conſuls. The Greek records and Cuſpinians book ſhew Nobilior and Luſcus.

602

M. Marcellus. L. Valerius.

THis year had for Conſuls, M. Marcellus and L. Valerius as Caſſiodorus witneſſeth. The Sicilian catalogue repreſenteth Marcellus and Flaccus. Obſequens exhibiteth unto us M. Claudius Marcellus and L. Valerius Flaccus. This Marcellus was thrice Conſul, as Padian ſaith upon the Oration for Scaurus, and Cicero in his book of divination and deſtiny.

603

L. Licinius Lucullus. A. Poſtumius Albinus.

CAſſiodorus putteth down for Conſuls, L. Lucullus and A. Poſtumius. The Sicilian tables, Lucullus and Albinus. The broken marbles of the capitol, Lucullus and Au. Poſtumius ſon of Aulus, Oroſius and the Epitome 48. ſhew L. Licinius Lucullus and A. Poſt. Albinus. Cicero in his Brutus, and Lucullus both, maketh mention of the ſame.

604

T. Quintius. M'. Acilius.

THis year had for Conſuls, L. Quintius and M'. Acilius, as Caſſiodorus teſtifieth [whom Pliny in his 7 book & 36 chap. calleth C. Quintius and M'. Acilius. Cicero in his book Cato, and the 12 book of his Epiſtles to Atticus nameth T. Flaminius and M'. Acilius, and ſaith that they were created Conſuls in the 19 year after the death of Ennius. The Sicilian tables have Flaminius and Balbus. The Capitol fragments, Flaminius and M. Acilius Balbus.

Caſſiodorus avoucheth for the Conſuls of this year, L. Martius and M'. Manilius: likewiſe the 49 Epitome. Cicero in Lucullus maketh mention of Cenſorinus and M'. Manilius: of Cenſorinus and Manilius in his twelfth book of epiſtles to Atticus. The ſame Conſuls, Appianus in Libyca nameth L. Martius Cenſorinus and M'. Manilius. In like ſort Cenſorinus in his treatiſe of Nativity or Birth-day. The Sicilian tables have Cenſorinus and Manilius. The capitol fragments ſhew Cenſorinus and M'. Manilius, ſon of Publius, nephew of Pub. Whiles theſe were Conſuls, there aroſe a third war between the State of Rome and the Carthaginians, as Florus in the 49 Epitome, beſides Verrius Flaccus do teſtify: likewiſe Solinus, but that he ſaith with Verrius Flaccus, that it was the year 64. Cicero alſo in his eleventh Philippick, and laſtly Entropius, with Oroſius.

THen were Conſuls created, Sp. Poſtumius and L. Piſo, according to Caſſiodorus and Obſequens. In the capitol fragments they are named A. Magnus, and Lu. Calpurnius, ſon of Caius, nephew of Caius, ſurnamed Piſo Caſonius. In Cuſpinians Kalender, Magnus and Caſonius, in the Sicilian catalogue Albinus and Piſo. As for Magnus and Albinus, they be the ſurnames of Poſtumius; like as Caſonius and Piſo, of Calpurnius. In this year the people of Rome, entred into arms againſt Andriſcus, otherwiſe termed Pſeudo-Philippus, which they call the third Macedonian war, after Florus and Entropius.

P. Africanus. C. Livius.

Obſequens and Caſſiodorus ſet forth for conſuls this year P. Africanus and C. Livius. In the Sicilian catalogue they are regiſtred Scipio and Druſus: in the capitol fragments Africanus Æmylianus, and C. Livius; the one ſon of M. Æmylianus, nephew of Marcus, the other ſurnamed Druſus. This Pub. Cornelius was the natural ſon of that Paulus that vanquiſhed Perſeus King of the Macedonians, and adopted by P. Cornelius the ſon of Scipio Africanus. Whereupon he was called Pub. Cornelius, ſon of Publius, nephew of P. Scipio Africanus the yonger, and Æmylianus, as Velleius and others do witneſs. His two laſt ſurnames are in the capitol records, out of which, the complete name of M. Livius Druſus, with his addition, was framed. Of theſe Conſuls Cicero ſpeaketh after: likewiſe Valerius, Pergenius, Appian, Plutarch, Florus, both Plinies, Eutropius and Oroſius.

NExt conſuls following, were Cn. Cornelius and L. Mummius, as witneſſeth Caſſiodorus: and according to Oroſius, Velleius, Cenſorinus, and Cicero in the thirteenth book of epiſtles to Atticus, Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Mummius they are named. In the Sicilian regiſters Lentulus and Mummius. In the fragments of the capitol, Lentulus and L. Mummius, nephew of Lucius. Lu. Mummius in this magiſtracy acquired the ſurname of Achaicus, upon a victory atchieved by him in Achaia, as Plutarch in Marius, and Velleius do teſtify.

Caſſiodorus this year delivereth unto us for Conſuls, Q. Fabius Maximus, together with L. Hoſtilius. Cicero in Lælius, and Pliny in his five and thirtieth book and fourth chapter, nameth them Qu. Maximus, brother of Scipio, and L. Mancinus. Of this Q. Fabius Maximus Æmylianus, Valerius writeth in his ſecond book and firſt chapter. This Q. Fabius was the ſon of P. Æmylius, adopted by Q. Fab. Max. the ſon of Verrucoſus, as Appianus writeth in Hiſpanenſis: and therefore in the fragment of a capitol table there is to be ſeen the ſecond ſurname Æmylianus. Pliny was deceived, who in his 31 book 11 chapter calleth him Qu. Allobrogicus, brother of Scipio, who was the ſon of this Fabius.

THis year had for Conſuls, Ser. Galba and Lu. Aurelius, according to Caſſiodorus: thoſe, Valerius in his ſixt book nameth S. Sulpitius Galba, and Lu. Aurelius Cotta, whom the Sicilian catalogue ſheweth under the bare names of Galba and Cotta. But the capitol fragments have Galba and L. Valerius Cotta. This is that Sulp. Galba, who being Pretor, as Suetonius writeth, ſtirred up the war before againſt Viriatus, for he was a vehement Orator, of whom Cicero ſpeaketh many times. And as for L. Cotta, he it was whom afterwards being accuſed by Africanus, Qu. Metellus Macedonicus defended. Cicero in Brutus, for Murena and againſt Verres, maketh mention of him. Likewiſe Frontinus of them both, in his firſt book of water-conduits.

Ap. Claudius. Q. Metellus.

Caſſiodorus nameth for this years Conſuls Appius Claudius and Q. Metellus. Oroſius, App. Claudius and Qu. Cæcilius Metellus. The Sicilian regiſters have Claudius and Metellus. The capitol fragments ſhew Pulcher and Q. Cæcilius Macedonicus. Of the ſame, Frontinus ſpeaketh in his book of water-conduits, and Valerius in his ſeventh book. Now this Metellus is he who being Pretor, ſubdued the Macedonians and Achæans, wereupon he was ſurnamed Macedonicus: whom Plinies 7 book ſheweth to be the ſon of Lu. and nephew of Quin.

Caſſiodorus putteth down for Conſuls, Lu. Metellus and Q. Maximus. The Sicilian records Metellus and Maximus. Oroſius, L. Cæcilius Metellus and Q. Fabius Maximus Servilianus. In like maner the capitol fragments Calvus and Servilianus. This Servilianus is the brother german of Q. Servilius Cæpio, the Conſul two years after (as witneſſeth Appian) and the adopted ſon of Q. Fabius Æmylianus; for they were both adopted by Q. Fabius Max. the ſon of Verrucoſus, the one out of the houſe Æmylia, the other of Servilia. L. Metellus is the brother of Q. Metellus Macedonicus, as writeth Valerius in his treatiſe of Witneſſes.

Cn. Cæpio. Q. Pompeius.

Cneus Cæpio and Q. Pompeius are recounted Conſuls by Caſſiodorus. Velleius in his ſecond book ſaith thus: Whether there were two or three houſes of the Pompeies, the firſt of that name was Conſul with Cn. Servilius. Of this Q. Pompeius, Cicero maketh mention often-times, writing that he was of baſe and obſcure parentage. Him Valerius in his chapter of witneſſes nameth Anſidus, but corruptly through the fault of the copiers, in ſtead of Au. F. i. the ſon of Aulus. In the ſame ſort Appianus in Hiſpanenſis nameth him Qu. Pompeius Aulus for A. Filius. Cicero in his Orations againſt Verres, and in that for Fonteius, Valerius alſo in his chapter of Witneſſes, ſheweth that there were two brethren named Cneus and Quintus, both Servilii Capiones.

Q. Cæpio. C. Lælius.

After this were Conſuls made, Qu. Cæpio and C. Lælius, my authors are Caſſiodorus and Obſequens together with the Sicilian tables, and Frontinus in his treatiſe of water-conduits. This Lælius as Cicero in his eleventh Philippick, and Velleius do report, was the ſon of Lælius the the Conſul, anno 564, whom as Cicero in his ſecond book of Duties and in Lælius, was the firſt that was ſurnamed Wiſe, whereof Plutarch in Gracchi yeeldeth a reaſon.

Cn. Piſo. M. Popilius.

Caſſiodorus ſheweth for this years Conſuls, Cn. Piſo with M. Popilius. Appianus and the Epitomiſt have M. Popilius Lænas: but they be named M. Popilius Lænas and L. Calpurnius by Valerius in his firſt book, writing thus, That Cornelius Hiſpalus, Lord chief juſtice for ſtrangers, when M. Popilius Lænas and L. Calpurnius were Conſuls, by an edict commanded all the Chaldæan [Aſtrologers] to depart out of Rome and Italy within ten daies next enſuing.

P. Scipio. D. Brutus.

Publius Scipio and D. Brutus are named for this years Coſſ. by Caſſiodorus. Florus in his 55 Epitome; P. Cornelius Naſica (ſurnamed Serapion in mockery by C. Curiatius a Trib. of the Com.) and D. Junius Brutus Coſſ. levied and muſtered ſouldiers, &c. This Scipio was ſon of that Naſica who was ſurnamed Corculum, and twice was he Conſul and Cenſor alſo, nephew to that Naſica, who by the Senat was deemed the beſt man in the City, and father to him that warred upon Iugurtha, as Velleius ſaith. This Decius Brutus, Cicero in his Brutus calleth the ſon of Marcus, who bare the Conſulſhip in the year five hundred ninety ſeven, and in the capitol tables is called Pennus. Moreover, of theſe Conſuls Cicero ſpeaketh very oft. Valerius alſo in his 3 book, chap. 7. 5 book, chap. 3. 9 book, chap. 15: Likewiſe, Pliny in his 21 book, and laſtly, Frontinus.

M. Æmylius. C. Hoſtilius Mancinus.

Caſſiodorus and Obſequens match together in the conſulſhip this year, M. Æmylius, and C. Hoſtilius Mancinus. The Sicilian regiſters Lepidus and Mancinus. Oroſius and Appian, M. Æmylius Lepidus and C. Hoſtilius Mancinus. Of this Conſul Mancinus there remain yet ſome tokens to be ſeen in broken marbles of the capitol. Cicero maketh mention often-times of Lepidus, as well in other places as in Brutus. Likewiſe, Valerius, Florus, Paterculus, and Pliny in his treatiſe of Famous men.

P. Furius. Sex. Attilius Serranus.

Caſſiodorus putteth down for Conſuls, P. Furius and Sex. Atilius Serranus. Cicero in his third book of Duties, L. Furius and Sex. Atilius. Obſequens, L. Furius and Atilius Serranus. The Sicilian regiſters Philus and Serranus. Of this Furius, Cicero writeth thus in his Brutus; Lu. Furius Philus, was reputed for a man of very good language, and to have ſpoken more learnedly than others. In the capitol fragments there appeareth yet ſome ſhew of Serranus the Conſul.

619

Ser. Fulvius. C. Calpurnius.

THe next conſuls are ſet down by Caſſiodorus and Obſequens, Ser. Fulvius and Q. Calpurnius. The Sicilian catalogue hath Flaccus and Piſo. Oroſius nameth S. Fulvius Flaccus and Q. Calpurnius Piſo. The capitol fragments ſhew Piſo: as for Fulvius Flaccus the Conſul, mention there is made of him in the Epitome 36. Appian alſo in his Illyrica ſpeaks of him, and in Hiſpanenſis of Calp. Piſo.

P. Africanus. C. Fulvius Flaccus.

THe year following had P. Africanus and C. Fulvius Flaccus for Coſſ. as it is written in Caſſiodorus and Obſequens; But Scipio and Flaccus, in the Sicilian catalogue. The ſame Flaccus the Capitol fragments do ſhew. Of this C. Fulvius, mention there is made alſo in the 56 Epitome; and of Africanus twice conſul, by Appian in Hiſpanenſis, by Oroſius, Florus, and Valerius in his eight book.

P. Mucius. L. Calpurnius.

THis year had conſuls, P. Mucius, and Lu. Calpurnius, as witneſſeth Caſſiodorus. The Sicilian regiſters ſhew Scævola and Calpurnius. Velleius nameth P. Mucius Scævola and L. Calpurnius. Of theſe Conſuls Aſcanius upon the Orations againſt Verres, maketh mention in theſe words: Scævola a right learned man in the Laws, was conſul with L. Piſo, that yeat wherein Tib. Oracchus was killed. In the broken marbles of the capitol he ſtandeth by the name of L. Calpurnius Piſo, ſurnamed alſo Frugi, and that truly. For Cicero in one Oration againſt Verres and in another for Fonteius writeth, that he was the firſt of the Piſones, called Frugi. This man, when he was Tribune or Provoſt of the Commons, made a law againſt the extortion of magiſtrats, when Martius and Manilius were conſuls: he wrote alſo the annals of Rome, as Cicero teſtifieth in his book Brutus.

AGainſt this year were conſuls created, as Caſſiodorus writeth, P. Popilius and P. Rupilius: after the Sicilian records Lænas and Rupilius. Cicero maketh mention of them in his 13 book of Epiſtles to Atticus, and againſt Verres. Alſo in the capitol fragments we read of P. Popilius, ſon of Caius, and P. Rupilius ſon of P. and nephew of Publius. Velleius in his ſecond book, nameth the conſuls Rupilius and Popilius. Cicero in Lælius ſpeaketh of Rupilius and Lænas. And of P Rupilius there is mention made in the Epitome or Breviary 59.

P. Craſſus. L. Valerius.

Caſſiodorus putteth down for conſuls this year, Pub. Craſſus and Lu. Valerius. Craſſus and Flaccus the Sicilian catalogue. L. Valerius Flaccus and Pub. Licinius Craſſus, according to Cicero in his eleventh Philippick againſt Antony. Of this conſul Pu. Licinius Craſſus, all they have ſpoken, who wrote of the war of Ariſtonicus. This P. Craſſus ſurnamed Dives, by Cicero in his books of a perfect Orator, and in Brutus is called the brother of Scævola: whereupon Velleius in his ſecond book nameth him Mutianus, betokening thereby that he was adopted out of the houſe of Mutis into the family of the Craſſi. This man Gellius writeth in his firſt book and 23 chapt. to have been of all others the richeſt man, the nobleſt perſonage, and the moſt eloquent Orator, the deepeſt lawyer, and the ſupream Biſhop withal.

C. Claudius. M. Perpenna.

APpius Claudius and M. Perpenna are matched in the Conſulat together this year by Obſequens and Caſſiodorus. Cuſpinians book and the Greek records, ſhew Lentulus and Perpenna. This Claudius haply was adopted into the family of the Cornelii. Moreover, Cicero in his third book of Laws, and in the Oration for Plancius, calleth this man C. Claudius. This alſo is confirmed by an old table of ſtone commonly known, wherin is to be ſeen this inſcription, C. Claudius and M. Perpenna Coſſ. Which evidence Sigonius and Onuphrius following, named him C. Claudius and not Appius. Of this M. Perpenna as many as wrote the war of Ariſtonicus, have made mention, and namely, Valerius in his 3 book and 4 chapt. Velleius, Strabo, Oroſius, and Eutropius.

C. Sempronius. M. Aquilius.

THis year had conſuls, M. Aquilius and C. Sempronius, as witneſſeth Caſſiodorus. But Aquilius and Tuditanus according to the Sicilian regiſters. C. Sempronius Tuditanus, and M. Aquilius, after Oroſius. Cicero ſpeaketh of them in his book of the nature of gods, and to his brother Quintus. Paterculus alſo in his ſecond book. Strabo in his 14 book. Appian in his firſt book. And both of them are taken out of the triumph records in the capitol.

Cn. Octavius. T. Annius.

NExt followed as conſuls Cn. Octavius and T. Annius, ar Caſſiodorus teſtifieth and none but he. For Cuſpinians book and the Sicilian catalogue have Octavius and Rufus. Plutarch alſo writeth, that one T. Annius contended with Tib. Gracchus in a ſedition. As for this C. Octa- vius, ſon he was to that Cneus who was Conſul in the year five hundred eighty nine.

L. Caſſius. L. Cinna.

CAſſiodorus nameth for this years Conſuls, L. Caſsius and L. Cinna. The Sicilian records Longinus and Cinna. Cuſpinians books ſet out Rulla, corruptly for Ravilla, and Cinna. This L. Caſsius was his ſon who bare the conſulſhip in the year 590, and he was afterwards Cenſor in the year 629 ſurnamed Ravilla by Frontinus.

628
M. Æmylius. L. Aurelius.

C*Aſſiodorus* and Obſequens reckon for Coſſ. this year, Mar. Æmylius and Lu. Aurelius. The Sicilian catalogue ſheweth Lepidus and Oreſtes. Cenſorinus hath M. Æmylius Lepidus, and L. Aurelius Oreſtes. Cicero in Brutus, Mar. Lepidus, and L. Oreſtes.

629
M. Plautius. M. Fulvius.

C*Aſſiodorus* and Obſequens avouch Conſuls this year, M. Plautius and M. Fulvius. The Sicilian regiſters, Hypſeus and Flaccus. Oroſius and Frontinus in his treatiſe of water-conduits, M. Plautius Hypſeus and Mar. Fulvius Flaccus. Valerius alſo in his diſcourſe of Pride maketh mention of them.

C. Caſsius Longinus. C. Sextius.

C*Aſiodorus* and Obſequens report, that the conſuls following were C. Caſsius Longinus, and C. Sextius. The Sicilian catalogue ſheweth Longinus and Calvinus. Vellems writeth, that the colony Fabrateria was planted by Caſsius and Calvinus. Cicero in Brutus ſpeaketh of C. Sextius Calvinus. Eutropius declareth for conſuls, C. Caſſius Longinus, and S. Domitius Calvinus, not without ſuſpition of a fault or errour.

631

C*Aſſiodorus* nominateth for conſuls this year, Q. Cæcilius and T. Quintius. The Sicilian records Metellus and Flaminius. Eutropius and Oroſius, Q. Cæcilius Metellus and T. Quintius Flaminius. Cicero in his Oration pleading for his houſe, calleth them T. Flaminius and Q. Metellus. This Q. Metellus was the eldeſt of the four ſons of Macedonicus, whom Plutarch in his treatiſe of the Romans fortune, calleth Q. Metellus Balearicus, of the Baleares whom in this magiſtracy he conquered.

Cn. Domitius. C. Fannius.

C*Aſsiodorus* and Obſequens join in fellowſhip of the conſulate this year, Cn. Domitius and C. Fannius. The Sicilian records, Ænobarbus and Fannius. Cicero writeth of them in his Brutus, and Pliny in his ſecond book and 32 chapter. Three moons (qd. he) appeared when Cn. Domitius and C. Fannius were Coſſ. which moſt men called the night-ſtars.

THis year had for conſuls, Lu. Opimius and Q. Maximus, as witneſſeth Ceſſiodorus. The Sicilian catalogue ſheweth Opimius and Maximus. But Obſequens, L. Opimius and Qu. Fabius Maximus. Pliny ſpeaketh of them in his ſecond book, ſaying, About the ſun there appeared an arch or bow, when L. Opimius and Q. Fabius were conſuls. This Qu. Fabius Maximus is by Cicero in Brutus, Florus in his Epitome, Velleius in his 2 book, and Pædianus upon the Orations againſt Verres, rightly named the nephew of Paulus, and ſon of F. Æmylianus. And ſo may Strabo, Appian, and Pliny be well reproved, for making him and his father Æmylianus, all one. The ſame man, as Cicero and Pliny teſtify, was ſurnamed Allobrogicus, upon a victory over the Allobroges. Of this L. Opimius conſul, after whoſe name there was a wine called Opimianum, Pliny maketh mention in his 14 book and 4 chap. Plutarch alſo in C. Gracchus, and Velleius in his ſecond book.

C*Aſſiodorus* inferreth for this years conſuls, P. Manlius and C. Papyrius. The Sicilian records Manlius and Carbo. This is that Caius Papyrius Carbo, who being a Tribune of the commons when Claudius and Perpenna were Coſſ. was afterwards by C. Gracchus appointed for one of the Triumvirs to divide lands: who firſt took part with the commons, but afterwards ranged with the nobility: of whom Cicero in many other places, and namely, in his ſecond book of a perfect Orator, maketh mention.

L. Cæcilius. L. Aurelius.

C*Aſsiodorus* and Obſequens put down for conſuls, Lu. Cæcilius and Lu. Aurelius. The Sicilian catalogue, Metellus and Cotta. Plutarch in Marius ſpeaketh of C. Metellus and Cotta, conſuls. Which Marius he writeth to have born the Tribunſhip of the commons, when theſe were conſuls, and to have caſt Metellus the conſul into priſon. This is that Cotta, in whoſe conſular room Velleius reporteth, that C. Cæſar Flamin of Jupiter, was created.

M Cato. Q. Martius.

THis year had for conſuls Mar. Cato and Q. Martius: witneſs Caſſiodorus and Obſequens. Cato and Martius, according to the Sicilian regiſters. But Eutropius nameth them M. Porcius Cato and Q. Martius. Valerius ſpeaketh of of them in his fift book, and Pliny in his ſecond book 31 chap. Gellius alſo in his 13 book and 19 chapt.

CONſuls next enſuing by Caſſiodorus his ſaying, were L. Cacilius and Q. Mutius. After the Sicilian regiſters, Metellus and Scævola, if ye go by Eutropius, L. Cacilius Metellus and Q. Mutius Scævola. Now is this that L. Cacilius Metellus, who afterwards upon ſubduing the Dalmatians, was ſurnamed Dalmaticus, whom Plutarch in Coriolanus and in his book of the Roman fortune, nameth Diadematus, for that a long time he bound up his forehead with a frontlet or wreath which they cal a diadem, to hide an ulcer that he had there. Hereupon, when Pompeius bound up his leg with a white band or garter, It makes no matter, qd. Favonius, in what part of the body a man weareth the diadem: upbraiding and reproching him for his Kinglike power. in terming a ſmall clout or peece of cloth by that name. This is that Q. Mutius Scævola the Augur, of whom Cicero in his book Lælius, and in the fift book of an Orator maketh mention.

C. Licinius Geta. Q. Maximus.

Caſſiodorus coupleth together in ſociety of Conſulſhip this year, C. Licinius and Qu. Maximus. The Sicilian regiſters name them Geta and Eburinus. Of this Q. Maximus Cicero ſpeaketh in his Oration for Murena. That this man was of the houſe of the Fabii, his ſurnamed Eburinus ſheweth, of whom writeth Feſtus in this manner: Qu. Fabius was called Pullus Jovis, ſurnamed Eburinus, of whiteneſs, for that his buttock was blaſted with lightning. Quintilian in his third Declamation reporteth, that this Fab. Eburinus had a ſon unchaſt of his body, whom he examined at home in his houſe, and thereupon put him to death. The ſame man Valerius calleth Q. Fabius Serviliānus. As for the name of this Licinius his father, obſcure and unknown heretofore, Goltzius out of an old antiquity of coin hath reſtored it, wherein, as he ſaith, was written plainly, C. Licinius Geta, ſon of Publius.

M. Metellus. M. Scaurus.

THe conſuls next following by Caſſiodorus his report, were M. Metellus and M. Scaurus. As for Metellus, the third ſon he was of Macedonicus. But as touching M. Scaurus, whom the writer of the book entituled of famous perſons, calleth M. Æmylius Scaurus thus writeth Padianus, M. Scaurus (qd. he) was a Patritian indeed and of noble blood, but ſo, as the gentry of his houſe, for thoſe diſcents before him lay obſcure. for neither father, nor grandſire, by reaſon of their poor eſtate, and for want of putting forth themſelves in the world, attained to dignity in weal publick. Moreover, of him Cicero maketh mention oftentimes in his Oration for Murena and in Brutus. Valerius alſo in his 5 book and 8 chapt. and Pliny likewiſe in his 2 book and 36 chapt.

M'. Acilius Balbus. C. Cato.

Caſſiodorus ſetteth down for conſuls this year, M. Atilius Balbus, and C. Cat. The Sicilian catalogue Balbus and Cato. Obſequens M. Acilius and C. Portius. Of the ſame conſuls Pliny ſpeaketh in the 2 book, chap. 29. and 58. Plutarch in Marius giveth to Acilius the forename Manius. This C. Cato is the brother of that M. Cato, who four years before was Conſul, nephew to M. Cato Cenſorinus, and Africanus ſiſters ſon, as ſaith Velleius, Cicero againſt Verres, and in Brutus.

641

C. Cacilius. Cn. Papyrius.

Caſſiodorus and Obſequens ſet down for next Conſuls, C. Cacilius and Cn. Papyrius. The Sicilian regiſters Metellus and Carbo. Eutropius, C. Cacilius Metellus, and Cn. Carbo. The ſame men Tacitus in his book of the manners of Germans reported to have born the Conſulſhip, anno 640 after the foundation of Rome: in which year, both he and Obſequens do report, that the people of Rome began firſt to war with the Cimbrians and the Teutones. This C. Metellus was the fourth ſon of C. Metellus the ſon of Macedonicus: whom, when he died, he left a man of Prætors calling, and in ſuit and election for to be Conſul. This man got a ſurname by way of reproach, as Cicero teſtifieth in his ſecond book of a perfect Orator. Now ſurnamed was he Capriarus, as Plutarch ſaith in the Life of the Romans.

Caſſiodorus exhibiteth unto us for this years Conſuls, M. Livius Druſus and L. Piſo. The Sicilian catalogue Druſus and Piſo. L. Piſo ſurnamed Cæſonius a man of Conſular degree, was ſlain after by the Tigurins, when Ln. Caſſius was Conſul, as Oroſius teſtifieth.

Caſſiodorus nameth this year for Conſuls, P. Scipio and L. Calpurnius Beſtia. The Sicilian records Naſica and Beſtia. Obſequens, Pub. Scipio and L. Calpurnius. Saluſt, Eutropius and Oroſius, P. Scipio Naſica and L. Calpurnius Beſtia. Of theſe Conſuls, P. Naſica Scipio and L. Beſtia, Valerius likewiſe maketh report lib. 1. chap. 6. Moreover, Cicero in his Brutus writeth that P. Scipio the ſon of Pub. Scipio ſurnamed Serapion and fellow Conſul to L. Beſtia, died in his Conſulſhip. Of this Beſtia there is ſome mention to be ſeen in a capitol fragment.

Sp. Posthumius. M. Minutius.

C*Assiodorus* setteth down for Consuls, Sp. Posthumius and M. Minutius. The Sicilian registers Albinus and Rufus. Salust, Sp. Albinus and Q. Minutius Rufus. Of M. Minutius, Velleius and the threescore and seventh Epitome make mention.

Q. Metellus. M. Silanus.

C*Assiodorus* saith that the Consuls next following were Q. Metellus and M. Silanus. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Metellus and Silanus. Padianus and Eutropius, Q. Cæcilius Metellus Numidicus, and M. Junius Silanus. Of them also Cicero speaketh in Brutus. This Metellus was surnamed Numidicus for the conquest of Numidia, as witnesseth Velleius.

Ser. Galba. M. Scaurus.

C*Assiodorus* and Obsequens deliver for the Consuls of this year, Servius Galba and M. Scaurus. The Sicilian evidences, Sulpitius and Scaurus. Cicero in the Oration for Rabirius, saith that S. Galba was a man of Consular degree, when Marius was the sixt time Consul. Of M. Scaurus the Consul, Velleius and Tacitus make mention. This is that M. Aurelius Scaurus, who being afterwards in embassage was by the Cimbrians murdered, as appeareth in the threescore and seventh Epitome.

647

C*Assiodorus* joineth in the consulship this year, L. Cassius and C. Marius. Cuspinians book and the Sicilian records, Longinus and and Marius, Pliny also maketh mention of them in his 10 book and 13 chap. Cicero in his oration for Plancius: Plutarch in Marius; and Cicero again in his third book of Duties, writeth, that C. Marius having taken the repulse twice for the office of Ædileship, was created consul.

648

Q. Servilius Cæpio. C. Atilius.

O*Bsequens* and Cassiodorus match consuls together this year, Q. Servilius Cæpio and C. Atilius Serranus. The Sicilian monuments Cæpio and Serranus. In this year upon the third day of January, M. Tullius Cicero was born, as Gellius in his fifteenth book and eight and twentieth chapt. hath left written. Much mention there is made of these consuls in Cicero and other ancient writers.

P. Rutilius Rufus. C. Manilius.

P*ublius Rutilius Rufus* and C. Manilius, are put down by Obsequens and Cassiodorus for this years consuls. This P. Rutilius, Cicero in Brutus, calleth the son of Marcus. About the other consul the Annals do vary and disagree: some forename him C. others Cneus. Some name him M. Manlius, others Mallius or Manilius. But all this controversy is decided by an old antiquity in stone at Puteoli: the inscription whereof testifieth that P. Rutilius and Cn. Mallius were Consuls; as also the evidence of the Sicilian registers, wherein written it is Rufus and Mallius. Of this Mallius mention there is made in Cicero's Orations for Plancius and Murena: likewise in Valerius, Salust, Tacitus, Florus, Eutropius and Orosius. That he was not only a base man and of low birth but also without all vertue and wit, in the course of his life also vile and contemptible, Cicero writeth in his Oration for Plancius. Whereby it easily appeareth, that the Mallii were a kinred different from the Manlii. For of Cn. Manlius a Patritian, and that of a most noble house, Cicero would never have spoken in such terms.

C. Marius II. C. Flavius Fimbria.

THe next Consuls are set down by Cassiodorus, C. Martius the second time, and C. Flavius Fimbria: by Obsequens, C. Marius and C. Flavius. By the Sicilian registers Marius and Fimbria: by Padianus upon the Oration for Cornelius, C. Marius the second time, and C. Fimbria; Item, C. Marius and Caius Flavius. Besides, Cicero, Velleius, Valerius, Plutarch, and others speak often of these Coss.

C*Assiodorus* reporteth for this years Consuls, C. Marius the third time, and L. Aurelius Orestes. The Sicilian catalogue Marius and Orestes. Moreover, Marius even in his absence was elected Consul the third time, for fear of the Cimbrian war which was defeated, as Velleius, Eutropius, the Breviary, and Cicero in his Oration concerning Provinces, do testify.

C. Marius IV. Q. Lutatius.

NExt after them are put down for Consuls by Cassiodorus and Obsequens, C. Martius the fourth time, and Q. Lutatius. The Sicilian registers exhibit unto us Marius and Catulus. Plutarch and Eutropius, Caius Marius the fourth time, and Q. Lutatius Catulus. Of these Consuls, Cicero and Pliny oftentimes make mention.

653

C. Marius V. M'. Aquilius.

THen ſucceeded in the Conſulſhip by the teſtimony of Caſſiodorus, C. Marius the fift time and M'. Aquilius. Of this C. Marius five times now Conſul, Plutarch and Florus give report. And Cicero in his ſecond book of a perfect Orator, nameth M'. Aquilius for the companion of C. Marius in his fift conſulſhip. Of whom Plutarch in Marius ſpeaketh and calleth him μάνιον ἀνάλιον as alſo Appian in Mithridatica. Now this Manius Aquilius a Conſular man is the ſame who afterwards being an Embaſſador, was by King Mithridates taken priſoner and moſt villanouſly tormented and mangled.

Caſſiodorus and Obſequens ſhew unto us for this years conſuls, C. Marius the ſixt time, and Lu. Valerius Flaccus. The Sicilian records, Marius and Flaccus. This L. Flaccus (afterwards Cenſor) was Preſident of the Senat and maiſter of the horſemen under Syll. Dictator. Of theſe conſuls Cicero ſpeaketh very often and namely, in his Brutus. in his oration for Rabirius, againſt Catiline and Antonie: and alſo in the defence of Plancius. Pliny likewiſe in his ſecond book Vallius, and Padianus upon the oration againſt Piſo. Moreover, Plutarch, and many authors beſides. In this year (upon the twelfth day of July, then called Quintilis, as Macrobius witneſſeth) was Cæſar born, who afterwards was ſurnamed Dictator.

M. Antonius. A. Poſtumius.

REported it is by Caſſiodorus and Obſequens, that M. Antonius and A. Poſtumius were Conſuls this year. The Sicilian regiſters ſhew Albinus and Antonius. In a fragment alſo of the capitol marbles, mention there is of An. Poſtumius. Cuſpinians book and the Greek records, have Antonius and Albinus. Of theſe Conſuls, Cicero ſpeaketh in his oration to the citizens of Rome, after his return out of exile. Likewiſe, Pliny in his 8 book and 7 chap. where he noteth this the 655 year. Alſo Gellius in his 4 book and 6 chapt.

Q. Metellus. T. Didius.

Quintus Metellus and T. Didius ſucceeded Conſuls next in this year, as Caſſiodorus and Obſequens do write. And Padianus upon the oration for Cornelius, nameth them: Curio (ſaith he) accuſed Q. Metellus Nepos, ſon of Balearicus, and nephew of Macedonicus who was Conſul with T. Didius. Cicero ſpeaketh of the ſame man in his oration after his return.

NOt only Caſſiodorus, but the Sicilian regiſters alſo, do teſtify, that Cn. Lentulus and P. Craſſus were Conſuls this year: and Obſequens nameth them, Cn. Cornelius and P. Lacinius. Pliny writeth of them in his tenth book and firſt chapt. alſo in his 33 book and ſecond chapter.

658

Cn. Domitius. C. Caſſius.

THis year had for Conſuls, Cn. Domitius and C. Caſſius, as Caſſiodorus and Obſequens do witneſs. Cuſpinians annals and the Greek regiſters ſhew Ænobarbus and Longinus. A fragment of Ver. Flaccus his marbles Ænobarbus and C. Caſſius ſon of Lucius. Padianus ſpeaketh of them upon the oration for Cornelius.

Lucius Craſſus and Q. Scævola were conſuls next following according to Caſſiodorus and Obſequens. In a fragment of the capitol records as touching Conſuls, is to be ſeen Craſſus and Mutius. In Cenſorinus, we find Lu. Lacinius ſon of Lucius. Cicero in his Brutus writeth, that Craſſus the orator bare all dignities of magiſtracy, together with Scævola the high-prieſt, except the Tribunat of commons and the Cenſorſhip: alſo that whiles they two were Conſuls, Q. Hortenſius pleaded the firſt cauſe that ever he undertook at the bar. Padianus upon the oration of Cicero for Cornelius, maketh mention of L. Licinius Craſſus the Orator, and Q. Mutius Scævola the arch-biſhop an orator beſides and a profeſſed lawyer, both Conſuls together.

Caſſiodorus and Obſequens declare for this years Conſuls, C. Calius and L. Domitius. The Sicilian regiſters, Caldus and Ænobarbus. In a capitol fragment, they are Caldus and Lu. Domitius ſon of Cn. As for Caldus it is the ſurname of Calius. For Velleius maketh mention of one C. Caldus under Auguſtus. In like manner Cicero in his book entituled, The ſuing for a Conſulſhip and in his oration for Murena. Alſo Padianus upon the Oration for Cornelius. Again, Cicero in his Brutus, nameth them next before Herennius.

C. Valerius Flaccus. M. Herennius.

THere are matched by Caſſiodorus and Obſequens for conſuls this year C. Valerius Flaccus and M. Herennius. The Sicilian records, Flaccus and Herennius. A broken ſtone of the capitol hath Flaccus and M. Herennius. Plinius in his 29 book and 3 chapt. Cicero alſo in his Oration for Murena, and in Brutus, ſpeaketh of them.

662

C. Claudius Pulcher. M. Perpenna.

CONsuls this year, were C. Claudius Pulcher, and M. Perpenna, as witneis Caſsiodorus and Obſequens. Likewiſe in a capitol broken monument and in the Sicilian regiſter it is Pulcher and M. Perpenna. Cicero maketh mention of this Claudius as Pretor of Sicily in the fourth Oration againſt Verres: and as Ædile Curule in his ſecond book of Offices. So doth Pliny in his 8 book.

Caſſiodorus and Obſequens name for conſuls this year, L. Martius and Sext. Julius. The Sicilian records, Philip and Cæſar. Eutropius and Oroſius Sex. Julius Cæſar, and L. Martius Philippus. A capitol fragment, Philip and Sex. Julius, ſon of Caius. Pliny ſpeaketh of them in his 2 book 8 chapt. alſo in the 33 book and 3 chapt. In like manner Cicero many times, and Valerius.

ACcording to Caſſiodorus and Obſequens the Conſuls this year were L. Julius Cæſar, and P. Rutilius Lupus. And ſo it is in Padianus, Velleius, and the 73 Epitome: as alſo in other authors who have written of the Marſian war. In a fragment of the capitol, they are ſeen written, Cæſar, and P. Rutilius ſon of Rufus. In the Sicilian records Cæſar and Lupus. Cicero in his book of Divination, ſpeaketh of them both: and in his oration for Plancius he writeth, that L. Cæſar miſſing of an Ædileſhip became a Conſul.

Caſſiodorus ſetteth down for Conſuls this year L. Portius and Cn. Pompeius. Padianus upon the Oration for Cornelius, ſurnamed Cn. Pompeius Strabo; and L. Porcius Cato. The Capitol fragment ſhew no more but Strabo and Cato. Appius hath made mention of theſe conſuls: ſo have Oroſius and others that have penned the Marſian war. This Cn. Pompeius was father to that Cn. Pompeius the Great: as Appianus witneſſeth, and Padian upon the Oration againſt Piſo.

Caſſiodorus ſheweth for this years Conſuls, L. Sylla and Q. Pompeius: and the ſame is written in Obſequens, Velleius, Eutropius, Oroſius, Appian, Plutarch, and others. The Sicilian records have Sylla and Rutilius. Sylla, after his victory in the civil war, would needs have himſelf ſurnamed Fœlix: and therefore Padian and the avouchers of the capitol monuments, in reporting this conſulat, write thus; L. Sulla, who afterwards was called Fœlix. The ſame man in his ſecond Conſulſhip, (which appeareth upon record in the capitol) is named the ſon of Lucius, and nephew of Publius. Moreover, of Q. Pompeius Rufus, Cicero maketh mention in his Brutus.

REported there are by Caſſiodorus and the Sicilian regiſters for Conſuls this year L. Cinna and Cn. Octavius. Appian, Velleius, and the reſt, who have recorded the hiſtory of this time, name them L. Cornelius Cinna, and Cn. Octavius. Plutarch writeth, that L. Cinna being of the adverſe faction to L. Sulla, was by him made conſul, upon condition that he ſhould not croſs nor ſtand againſt the proceeding of the ſaid Lu. Sulla: and ſo ſoon as he was entred into place of government, he began to trouble and diſquiet the preſent ſtate of the common-weal, yea, and intended an action againſt Sulla, by the means of Virginius a Tribune of the commons. Howbeit Sulla contemning Virginius, made an expedition againſt Mithridates.

AFter this were Conſuls, C. Marius the ſeventh time, and L. Cinna the ſecond time, according to the records of Sicily, Caſſiodorus, and thoſe that wrote of the civil war. Plutarch ſaith, that Marius was the firſt man that was ſeven times conſul of Rome. Moreover as it is to be read in Appian, and in the Breviaries L. Cinna and C. Marius, without any lawful aſſembly for Election, declared themſelves Conſuls againſt this year, and the very ſame day that they entred into their magiſtracy Marius commanded Sext. Licinius a Senator, to be thrown down from the rock Tarpeia: who, after he had committed many hainous crimes and outrages, ended his daies upon the Ides of January: in whoſe room was ſubordained, L. Val. Flaccus, even he (as men think) who before-time was colleague to C. Marius in his ſixt Conſulſhip: of whom Cicero maketh mention in his Oration for his ſon Flaccus.

Caſſiodorus witneſſeth that the Conſuls ſucceeding in this year were L. Cinna the third time, and Cn. Papirius. The Sicilian records, have Cinna and Carbo. In the 83 Breviary it is written, that Lu. Cinna and Cn. Papirius Carbo, for two years together uſurped the Conſulate. Alſo in the book entituled, Of famous perſons, we read that Cinna made himſelf Conſul a ſecond and third time. Of theſe Conſuls Plutarch ſpeaketh in Sulla, Appian in Mithridatica, and in the firſt book of civil wars.

NExt were Conſuls, after Caſſiodorus and the Epitomiſt, Lu. Cinna the fourth time, and and Cn. Papirius the ſecond time. Cicero in his Tuſculan queſtions mentioneth Cinna four times Conſul: ſo doth Suetonius in Cæſar. And of Cn. Papirius Carbo twice Conſul, the capitol tables do yeeld teſtimony. As for the Sicilian records, they put down for conſul, (not without ſuſpition of error) Carbo and Scribonius.

BEſides the Sicilian tables, Caſſiodorus, Obſequens, Appius, Eutropius, Florus, and Tacitus in his ninteenth book do witneſs, that Lu. Scipio, and C. Norbanus were Conſuls. In the capitol fragments it is written, Lu. Cornelius ſon of Lucius, nephew of L. Scipio Aſiaticus.

M. Carius. Cn. Carbo III.

I Find in Caſſiodorus, Appianus, Velleius, and others, the next conſuls to have been, C. Marius and Cn. Carbo the third time. This C. Marius was the brothers ſon of C. Marius ſeven times conſul, according to Appian: but Velleius, Paterculus, Plutarch, Eutropius, and others, ſay, that he was the ſon of that C. Marius: and haply indeed he was adopted by C. Marius. Certainly, in the capitol tables, he is called C. Marius, ſon of C. and nephew of Caius. Cicero ſpeaketh of theſe Coſſ. againſt Rullus: Pliny alſo in his 17 book, and they who have ſet down in writing the civil wars of Sylla.

673

M'. Tullius. Cn. Dolabella.

NExt to thoſe, Caſſiodorus bringeth in for conſuls, M'. Tullius and Cn. Dolabella. The Sicilian records, have Decula and Dolabella. Appian alſo reporteth, that Sylla Dictator, to the end that the ſtate and common-weal might ſeem to retain ſome ſhew yet of her ancient dignity, permitted M'. Tullius and Cornelius Dolabella to be created conſuls, whiles himſelf after the manner of K. ſate aloft in a throne above them. Cicero in his oration againſt Rullus, and Gellius in his 15 book and 33 chap. maketh mention of M'. Tullius and Cn. Cornelius conſuls. In a capitol fragment, this M'. Tullius, ſon of M. nephew of A. is ſurnamed Decula.

Caſſiodorus and the Sicilian regiſters, ſet down for Conſuls, Lu. Sylla the ſecond time, and Q. Metellus. Appius ſaith moreover, that Sylla, Dictator though he was, yet ſtood content and willing to be declared conſul with Q. Metellus Pius, to the end that the common-weal might ſeem to have ſome likeneſs yet of a free ſtate. Of theſe conſuls, Cicero maketh mention in his Orations againſt Verres, and elſewhere. Gellius likewiſe in his 15 book and 28 chapter, together with Caſſiodorus. This Metellus was ſurnamed Pius. He it is, who was by lot appointed to manage the wars in Spain and againſt Sertorius; and ſon he was to Numidicus.

P. Servilius. App. Claudius.

THe next conſuls, were P. Servilius and Ap. Claudius, as witneſſeth Caſſiodorus. In the Sicilian tables, it appeareth that their ſurnames were, Vatia and Pulcher: of whom Appianus writeth thus; The people of Rome in obſequious manner to court Sylla the Dictator, requeſted of him that he would continue conſul ſtill another year: But Sylla would none of that: and took order, that Ser. Iſauricus and Claudius Pulcher, ſhould be declared Coſſ. In a fragment of the capitol he is thus written; Pub. Servilius Vatia, called afterwards Iſauricus: which ſurname he took of the Iſaurians, a nation in Cilicia whom he ſubdued. My authors are, Padianus upon the Orations of Cicero againſt Verres; Strabo in his 14 book; Marcellinus likewiſe in his 14 book, with others.

M. Lepidus. Q. Catulus.

Mar. Lepidus and Q. Catulus, are by Caſſiodorus named Conſuls for this year. Plutarch reporteth, that when L. Sylla had given up his Dictatorſhip, and reſtored again to the people of Rome the free liberty to diſpoſe of conſular dignities in their ſolemn aſſemblies for elections; M. Lepidus an enemy to Sylla, and an audacious perſon, was declared Conſul before Catulus, and had the preheminence above him, by the earneſt endeavour of Cn. Pompeius. Of theſe Conſuls, Pliny maketh mention in his 36 book, wherein he ſaith, that they governed in the year 676. Likewiſe, Cicero in his Oration for Cornelius: Florus out of Livy: Valerius 2 book 3 chap. and Eutropius.

M. Æmylius. D. Brutus.

THis year had for Conſuls, by the teſtimony of Caſſiodorus and Obſequens, M. Æmylius and D. Brutus. Macer, a Tribune of the commons, ſpeaketh of them in Saluſt, complaining that the commons were by the nobles oppreſſed. In like ſort, Cicero in Brutus, and in his ſecond book of Duties, as alſo Valerius in the 7 book and 7 chap. This M. Æmylius was ſurnamed Lepidus and Livianus: for out of the family of Livies he was adopted by M. Lepidus, and therefore right well he is called, ſon of Mamercus.

678

Verrius Flaccus ſetteth down for Conſuls, Cn. Octavius ſon of M. nephew of C. and C. Scribonius Curio. The ſame doth Cicero report in Brutus. So do Saluſt. Obſequens, Lactantius in his firſt book, and Pliny in his ſecond book

and

and 35 chapter. Cic. in his Brutus, and Pliny in his 7 book and 41 chapt. make report of three Cais Curions, all Orators to wit, the father, the ſon, and the ſons ſon or nephew.

Caſſiodorus putteth down for conſuls this year, L. Octavius and C. Cotta. Obſequens, C. Aurelius and L. Octavius. Pliny in his ſecond book and 35 chapt. Cicero likewiſe in his third and fifth Orations againſt Verres, maketh mention of L. Octavius, and C. Aurelius conſuls. Upon the broken marbles of the capitol, they ſtand to be ſeen, L. Octavius ſon of Cn. nephew of Cn. and C. Aurelius. This year the Sicilian regiſters over-skip. Padianus writeth, that there were at this time three Cotta's brethren, and all of conſular degree, namely, Caius, Marcus, and Lucius.

FOr this years conſuls, Caſsiodorus regiſtreth L. Lucullus, and M. Cotta. The Sicilian records, Lucullus and Cotta, Eutropius, Appianus in Mithridatica, and Plutarch in Lucullus, nameth them, L. Licinius Lucullus, and M'. Aurelius Cotta. Mention there is made of them by Cicero againſt Verres; and by Florus in the 93 and 94 Epitomes. This L. Lucullus had for his grand-father that Lucullus, who was conſul with A. Albinus, as Cicero and Plutarch do teſtify.

M. Lucullus. C. Caſſius.

THis year (by the teſtimony of Caſsiodorus,) had for conſuls, M. Lucullus, and C. Caſſius: but the Sicilian records, nominate Marcellus and Caſſius: whom Cicero in an oration againſt Verres, nameth M. Terentius and C. Caſſius: ſaying that the laws Terentia and Caſſia, were by them promulged. For, ſo far forth as we may conjecture by the capitol fragments, M. Licinius Lucullus, was adopted by M. Terentius Varro, and therefore called M. Terentius Varro Lucullus. Cicero in Lucullus, and Plutarch, call L. Lucullus and M. Lucullus brethren, whom Eutropius nameth coſin germans by two ſiſters. That the ſurname of Caſſius was Varus, appeareth both by a conduit pipe or waterſpout of lead found in Rome, and alſo for that Appian in his fourth book, writeth that C. Caſſius Varus, a man who had been Conſul, was condemned and outlawed by the Triumvirs.

THe conſuls next following, by the report of Caſſiodorus, were L. Gellius and Cn. Lentulus. In like ſort Cicero maketh mention of them in his oration for Balbus, and elſewhere. Plutarch alſo in Craſſus, with Eutropius and Oroſius. Cuſpinians book ſheweth Poplicola and Lentulus. Now the ſurname of L. Gellius was Poplicola, as witneſſeth Onuphrius.

Caſſiodorus ſetteth down for conſuls this year, Cn. Auſidius, and P. Lentulus. The Sicilian regiſters have Lentulus and Oreſtes. Eutropius, C. Lentulus and Cn. Auſidius Oreſtes. This Cn. Auſidius Oreſtes, when he went beſide a Tribunſhip of the commons, was choſen conſul, as Cicero writeth in his oration for Plancius. This is that P. Lentulus ſurnamed Sura, who afterwards, being a man of conſular calling, and who had been twice Pretor, was hanged and ſtrangled to death when Cicero was conſul, for that he had conſpired with Catilin: whoſe grand-father was P. Lentulus Preſident of the Senat, as Cicero ſaith, pleading for his houſe, and inveighing againſt Catilin: as alſo Padianus.

M. Craſſus. Cn. Pompeius.

NExt to them were Coſſ. M. Craſſus and Cn. Pompeius, according to Caſſiodore, Plutarch, Appian, and the Sicilian records. Their ſurnames for certain, were Dives and Magnus. All the old writers ſpeak much of this their firſt Conſulſhip. Plutarch reporteth that L. Craſſus attained to the Conſular dignity, by the means of Pompeius the conſul. Beſides, Cicero, Saluſt, Padian writing upon the oration for Cornelius, and all other authors ſpeak of theſe conſuls.

685

Q. Metellus. Q. Hortenſius.

THen followed conſuls, Q. Metellus and Q. Hortenſius, as Caſſiodore and the Sicilian catalogue do teſtify. Padianus matcheth Q. Metellus Creticus with Q. Hortenſius that great Orator! Likewiſe, Joſephus in his fourteenth book of Jewiſh antiquities. Cicero in Brutus calleth this Q. Hortenſius, the ſon of Lucius. Q. Metellus afterwards upon the conqueſt made of Crete ſurnamed Creticus, was the ſon of L. Dalmaticus, as may be gathered out of Padianus upon the Oration of Tully [called Divinatio] againſt Verres.

L. Metellus. Q. Marcius.

PÆdianus writing upon Tulli's Oration againſt Piſo; Dio likewiſe and Caſſiodorus, join together in the conſulſhip this year, L. Cæcilius Metellus, and Q. Marcius. The Greek records, Marcius Rex, and Metellus. This Metellus, Dio writeth to have died in the very beginning of his magiſtracy: that he alſo who was ſubſtituted in his room, left this life before he entred into the government: and theruponit was not thought good to ſubelect any more: and by that means Q. Marcius bare that dignity alone: and him Saluſt entituleth with the ſurname of Rex. This L. Metellus was brother to Q. Creticus, as Padian witneſſeth.

687

C. Piſo. M'. Glabrio.

THere ſucceeded Conſuls, C. Piſo and M'. Glabrio, witneſs Caſſiodore and the Sicilian records. And in Dio they follow immediatly by the name of Manius Acilius and C. Piſo. Cicero in his twelfth book of Epiſtles to Atticus, ſpeaketh of C. Piſo and M'. Acilius Glabrio, men of Conſular place and calling. Pædian in his comentaries upon the oration for Cornelius maketh mention of C. Piſo and the law Calpurna by him made, as touching inordinate and indirect ſuite after dignities of ſtate. Moreover, of them Valerius in his fourth book writeth.

M'. Lepidus. L. Volcatius.

Caſſiodore putteth down for Conſuls, Manius Lepidus, and with him L. Torquatus, but untruly, The Greek records have Volcatius Tullus. Dio Lu. Tullus, and Æmylius Lepidus. Saluſt in Catiline, L. Tullus and M'. Lepidus. Pædian upon the oration for Cornelius, M'. Lepidus and L. Volcatius. Cicero in his oration for Sulla hath L. Volcatius Tullus: ſo as it appeareth it ſhould be, M'. Æmylius Lepidus, and L. Volcatius Tullus.

THe Conſuls elect, were L. Antronius Patus (as it appeareth upon a monument of a triumph in the capitol, and not Antronius, as commonly it is read) and P. Cornelius Sulla: who being condemned for ambitious ſeeking after that office, and having therefore ſuffered condign puniſhment, their accuſers ſtept into their place of government, namely, L. Aurelius ſon of Marcus, ſurnamed Cotta; and L. Manlius ſon of Lucius, ſurnamed alſo Torquatus: as teſtify Saluſt, Dio, Pædian upon the oration for Cornelius, and that which he made in his white robe: and laſtly, Tranquillus in Cæſar.

THe year next enſuing had for Conſuls, by the teſtimony of Caſſiodore, Pædianus, and the Sicilian records, L. Cæſar and C. Figulus, whom Dio calleth Lucius Cæſar, and Lucius Martius ſon of Caius, ſurnamed Figulus. Cicero in his oration for Sulla, nameth them L. Julius and C. Figulus: ſo doth Saluſt in Catilina. This L. Julius Cæſar is his ſon who was Conſul in the Marſian war.

691

M. Cicero. C. Antonius.

THe Conſuls this year, were M. Tullius ſon of M. ſurnamed Cicero, and C. Antonius ſon of M. as teſtify Dio in his ſeven and thirtieth book, Caſſiodore, Saluſt in his Catilinary oration, Velleius in his ſecond book, Joſeph in his Jewiſh antiquities 14 book 8 chapter. Pliny in his eight book and three and fiftieth chapter, Tranquillus in the life of Auguſtus, Appian, Eutropius, Pædian, and others.

THere followed conſuls next, D. Silanus, and L. Murana, as Caſſiodorus, Saluſt, and the Sicilian records do witneſs. Dio calleth them D. Junius ſon of M. ſurnamed Silanus: and L. Licinius ſon of L. ſurnamed Murana. Eutropius nameth them D. Junius Silanus, and L. Licinius, ſon of that L. Murana who in quality of Pro-pretor triumphed over Mithridates (as Cicero ſaith) pleading for Murana himſelf, being accuſed and in trouble for unlawful ſeeking to be Coſ. In this aſſembly for election of Coſ. L. Sergius Catilina ſuffered the ſecond repulſe: for anger whereof, in a melancholy he brake out into a conſpiracy, and practiſed againſt the ſtate; and likewiſe Servius Sulpitius Rufus the lawyer, who afterwards accuſed Murana for the crime aforeſaid.

M. Pupius. M. Valerius.

C*Aſſiodorus* ſetteth down for Conſuls this year, M. Pupius and M. Valerius. The Sicilian regiſters, Piſo and Meſſala. Dio, M. Pupius, ſon of M. ſurnamed Piſo: and M. Valerius ſon of M. ſurnamed Meſſala Niger. Of this Meſſala Niger, there is alſo mention made by Pædian upon the oration for Scaurus. Alſo of M. Meſſala and M. Piſo, in Plinies ſeventh book, and ſix and twentieth chapter, ſeven and thirtieth book, cap. ſecond, and the eight book, chap. ſix and twenty. And in Cæſars firſt book of the Gauls war. Of M. Piſo Pædian likewiſe ſpeaketh writing upon the oration againſt Piſo.

694

Q. Metellus. Q. Afranius.

C*Aſſiodorus* and the Sicilian regiſters nominate for this years Conſuls, Q. Metellus and L. Africanus. The like doth Obſequens and Cicero in his firſt book of Epiſtles to Atticus. Dio nameth them L. Afranius ſon of L. and Q. Cæcilius, ſon of Q. ſurnamed Metellus Celer. Both of them were advanced to the Conſulate (as Dio witneſleth) by the means of Pompeius, for they had been both twain his Lieutenants ſerving under him in Aſia.

695

C. Cæſar. M. Bibulus.

C*Aſſiodorus*, Suetonius, together with the Sicilian tables and the Breviaries, do match together for conſuls this year, C. Cæſar and M. Bibulus. Dio, C. Julius ſon of C. Cæſar, and M. Calpurnius. Plutarch and Appian, C. Julius Cæſar, and C. Bibulus. Albeit Appian as alſo Eutropius and Oroſius give Bibulus the forename of Lucius. Of Cæſar and Bibulus, Cicero ſpeaketh in his firſt book of Epiſtles, writing to Lentulus.

696

Caſſiodorus and the Sicilian records ſhew for Conſuls this year, L. Piſo and A. Gabinius. Dio, L. Calpurnius ſon of L. Piſo: and A. Gabinius ſon of Aulus. Caſar, Cicero, Plutarch, and Caſſiodorus, L. Piſo, and A. Gabinius. Caſar writeth of them in his firſt book of the Gauls war, and Plutarch in the life of Cato the yonger. Cicero alſo in his oration againſt Piſo and for Sextius. This Piſo the Conſul Cicero and Pedian ſurnamed Caſonius, for ſo his grand-father before him was called as appeareth in the capitol records for the year 606.

P. Lentulus. Q. Metellus.

THe Conſuls following for this year, were by Caſſiodorus and the Sicilian records, P. Lentulus and Q. Metellus. By Dio, Pub. Cornelius ſon of Publius, Lentulus Spinther: and Q. Cæcilius ſon of Qu. Metellus Nepos. Of them ſpeaketh Valerius in his ninth book. Lentulus (qd. he) and Metellus companions in the conſulſhip were beheld and ſeen both upon the ſtage like plaiers: but the one of them took the ſurname of Spinther * one of the ſecond ſort of actors: the other, but that he had gotten the name of * Nepos already for his lewd behaviour, ſhould have been called Pamphilus, after the name of * one of a third ſort, whom for all the world he reſembled. Of the ſame men, Cicero in his firſt book of Epiſtles, and in very many of his orations. Pliny alſo in his ſeventh book and ſecond chapter, Plutarch in the life of Cicero, and all other writers make much mention.

* Secundarum.

* A ruffian.
* Tertiarum.

Caſſiodorus putteth down for Conſuls, Cn. Lentulus and L. Philippus. The Sicilian records, Marcellus and Philippus. Dio, Cn. Cornelius ſon of Publius, Lentulus Marcellus: and L. Martius ſon of Lucius Philippus. Of Lentulus and M. Marcellus Conſuls, Cicero ſpeaketh in his Epiſtles to Lentulus. Plutarch alſo in the life of Cato maketh mention of Martius Philippus now Conſul. This Cn. Lentulus was the ſon of that P. Lentulus, as Cicero ſaith in his Brutus. And ſurnamed he was Marcellus, and not Claudius, that it might be known of what family of the Claudii he was deſcended.

696

Cn. Pompeius. M. Craſſus.

WHen as by the obſtinate perſiſtance of C. Cato Tribun of the commons, (who ever interpoſed his negative) there could be no ordinary aſſembly holden for the creation of magiſtrats, the whole degree of the Senators changed their weed in token of grief: ſo as upon an Interregency between, Cn. Pompeius was choſen Conſul, and with him M. Craſſus the ſecond time, as Plutarch, Dio, and Appian do witneſs. Lucius Domitius Ænobarbus, whom Cato and all good men accompanied and preſented, was in the common place by violence throughly beaten, and Cato himſelf wounded. Theſe Coſſ. Dio calleth Cn. Pompeius, ſon of Cn. Magnus the ſecond time: and M. Licinius ſon of Publius Craſſus, the ſecond time. Of them Pedianus, Eutropius, the Sicilian regiſters and others make mention.

Dio in his nine and thirtieth book, for the year after the cities foundation 700. following the computation of Varro, avoucheth Conſuls, Appius Claudius, ſon of Appius Pulcher: and L. Domitius ſon of Cneus, Ænobarbus. Caſſiodore and Obſequens, name them, Ap. Claudius and L. Domitius, whom the Sicilian records call Pulcher and Ænobarbus: and Pedian upon the Oration for Scaurus, L. Domitius Ænobarbus, and Appius Claudius Pulcher. Of this L. Domitius, ſon of Cneus Ænobarbus, Cœlius ſpeaketh in the eight book of Ciceros Epiſtles.

Cn. Domitius. M. Meſſala.

AGainſt this year there ſtood in election and laboured with much earneſtnes and ambitious deſire to be Conſuls, Caius Memmius, Cn. Domitius. M. Meſſala and M. Scaurus, as Cicero writeth to his brother Quintus. But at the laſt, even in the ſeventh month of this year there were created by means of an Interregency, M. Meſſala and Cn. Domitius. Neither had they been choſen then; but that Q. Pompeius Rufus a Tribun of the commons, who ſtill oppoſed himſelf to hinder and debar all election, was by order from the Senate committed: and the Senate made countenance to do the like by the reſt, as many as went about to croſs the ſaid election. Thus much Dio. But Appian ſaith, that the common-weal continued for eight months ſpace in Anarchy without any ſoveraign magiſtrats of ſtate. Plutarch writeth, that in this ſo great extremity of danger, Lucilius a Tribun of the commons, preferred a bill for the creating of Cneus Pompeius Dictator, who ſhould redreſs all enormities and ſet upright the ſtate again: but Cato gainſaid it, and ſo nothing was effected. Dio ſaith moreover, that the Tribuns of the commons moved for the chuſing not of a Dictator only, but alſo of military Tribuns in conſuls authority: but through the earneſt labour of Pompeius, Conſuls were created, Meſſala and Calvinus, which ſurnames ſtand to be ſeen upon the Sicilian records. Alſo in the capitol monuments, written it is thus. Cn. Domitius Calvinus ſon of M. nephew of Marcus, anno 708 and 717.

702
Cn. Pompeius. Q. Metellus.

WHen by reaſon of the contentions among ſo mighty competitors, the Conſuls could not be created by the Calends of January: there paſſed an Act of the Senat, according to the mind and advice of Bibulus, by vertue whereof Cn. Pompeius was by the Interregent Serv. Sulpitius created Conſul the third time, upon the five and twentieth of February, without a Collegue firſt, and preſently entred upon the government. But afterwards to avoid the envy that might ariſe thereupon, he took unto him as companion in the Conſulſhip for the five laſt months of the year behind, Q. Cæcilius Pius Metellus Scipio, his wives father. Thus writeth Pedian upon the Oration of Cicero in defence of Milo: Plutarch likewiſe, Appianus and Dio. This Metellus Pius Scipio was alſo called P. Cornelius Scipio Naſica, ſon of Naſica Scipio, who being adopted by Q. Metellus Pius, is called by Cælius in the familiar Epiſtles of Cicero, Q. Cæcilius ſon of Q. nephew of Q. Metellus Pius Scipio.

M. Marcellus. Ser. Sulpitius.

AGainſt this year were Conſuls created, M. Marcellus, and Serv. Sulpitius, as Caſſiodorus, Plutarch, and Appian witneſs. The Sicilian records call them Rufus and Marcellus. Dio nameth them Servius Sulpitius ſon of Q. ſurnamed Rufus, and M. Claudius ſon of M. ſurnamed alſo Marcellus. Of theſe Conſuls Suetonius alſo maketh mention in Cæſar: likewiſe Cicero in his Epiſtles, and the Epitome 118. This Marcellus was the coſin german of that Marcellus who the year next following was Conſul: and brother german to him who two years after bare the Conſulſhip, as may be collected out of Verrius Flaccus, Dio, and Suetonius.

L. Paulus. C. Marcellus.

THere ſucceeded Conſuls, L. Paulus, and C. Marcellus: witneſs Caſſiodore, Dio, Suetonius, Hirtius in his 8 book, together with the Sicilian records. The one of theſe is by Dio named Lucius Emylius, ſon of Marcus ſurnamed Paulus; the other by Cicero in his Epiſtles, C. Claudius ſon of Caius, Marcellus. Dio writeth, that this man by ſome was reported to be ἀνεψιὸς, i.e. the brothers ſon, others ἀδελφὸς, i.e. the brother of Marc. Marcellus, but Suetonius ſaith plainly, he was the brothers ſon.

Caſſiodorus ſetteth down for Conſuls this yeat Lentulus & C. Marcellus, as alſo Appian, Plutarch, Hirtius, Florus, and Cicero in his Epiſtles do teſtifie. Dio calleth theſe Conſuls Lu. Cornelius, ſon of Publius Lentulus: and C. Claudius ſon of Marcus Marcellus. In the broken marbles of the Capitoll it is to be ſeen thus. C. Claudius ſon of Marcus, nephew of Marcus Metellus. This is that Lucius Lentulus Crus, who as Cælius teſtifieth in the former election took a repulſe, and by Cicero is called in the Oration againſt Vatinius, Flamen Martialis.

C. Cæſar. P. Servilius.

WHen Caius Cæſar the Dictator held the ſolemn aſſembly for the election in the latter end of the former year, Conſuls there were created Caius Julius, ſon of Caius Cæſar; and Pub. Servilius, ſon of Publius Iſauricus. For now was the year come, when as Cæſar by the laws might be choſen Conſul: for ſo in the third book of his own Commentaries he ſaith himſelf, and ſo Dio in his one and fortieth book, Plutarch, Tranquillus, Appianus, and Caſſiodorus do teſtifie of him. But he meaneth that law which expreſly forbad and debarred, that no man might be within ten years ſpace choſen Coſ. twice. As for Publius Servilius, he was the ſon of that Publius Servilius that firſt took the ſurname Iſauricus, who this year bare his Conſulſhip at Rome, while Cæſar warred in Macedony.

Dio ſaith, That the people of Rome having intelligence that Pompeius was murdered, endeavoured earneſtly, that there might paſs as honourable decrees for Cæſar the Conqueror as poſſible might be. And therefore they ordained, that he might be Conſul five years together, and Dictator not for ſix months as beforetime, but a whole year; and endued with the Tribunes authority for ever. Now Cæſar, albeit he was without Italy, immediatly entred upon his Dictatorſhip, having ſub-ordained under him for his Generall of the horſe, Mar. Antonius, a man who yet had not been Prætor. This appeareth by the Capitoll records, Dio, Plutarch, and Cicero in his ſecond Philippica. But under what pretence and colour Cæſar took upon him this Dictatorſhip and the reſt following, Marcus Antonius ſheweth in his Oration of Cæſars praiſe in Dio: wherein he ſaith, that Cæſar was created Dictator to make head againſt the enemies, and therefore the troubles and diſſentions of war was the cauſe of this creation. But certain it is that Cæſar became Dictator for another cauſe, namely, that by the means of that ſoveraign power, he might draw unto himſelf alone the whole managing and government of the State, which beforetime had been adminiſtred by many perſons. But Dio addeth moreover and ſaith, that in the beginning of this year there were neither Prætors nor Conſuls elected. For Marcus Antonius Generall of the horſe, arraied in his purple robes, with ſix Lictors, making way before him, reſembled a certain ſhew of the ancient liberty. But within a while after he departed forth of the City, and that which never was before done by any Maſter of the horſe, he left Lu. Caſar an aged man, Provoſt and governor of Rome. Howbeit, in the end of the year, after the recovery and conqueſt of Ægypt, when King Ptolomeus was ſlain, and Pharnaces K. of Pontus vanquiſhed; Conſuls were created, Q. Fuſius, ſon of Quintus, Calenus; and Pub. Vatinius, ſon of Publius. And theſe the Capitoll tables do ſhew, and Caſſiodorus alſo. Of Publius Vatinius Conſul, Macrobius in his ſecond book maketh mention.

C. Caſar. M. Lepidus.

Verrius in his capitoll tables ſetteth forth Conſuls of this year, only without ever a Dictator. The ſtone record of Colatia, whereof Onuphrius ſpeaketh here, nameth C. Julius Caſar the third time, and M. Æmylius Lepidus. But Dio in his three and fortieth book, The next year following (quoth he) he bare the Dictatorſhip and the Conſulat both, the third time, and took unto him for his Collegue in both Magiſtracies, M. Æmylius Lepidus. Of the ſame mind ſeemeth Tranquillus to be in Caſar, chap. ſeventy ſix. Likewiſe Hirtius in the fift book. But Onuphrius ſuppoſeth that both Tranquillus and Dio, yea, and Hirtius alſo was in an errour. For with the capitoll records, Plutarch and Eutropius agree; who write that Caſar this year was Conſul the third time with M. Lepidus, and Dictator the ſecond time.

C. Caſar. Q. Maximus.

They who cut the capitol marbles, do ſhew unto us that Caſar this year was third time Dictator with M. Lepidus General of the horſe. From whom Dio differeth; who doth report that this year Caſar was Dictator the 4 time, and Lepidus ſecond time Maſter of the horſemen: alſo that Lepidus fellow-Conſul with Caſar, declareth himſelf againſt all law, Generall of the horſe. Thus much of the Dictator. But as touching the Conſuls this year, there is to be ſeen written in the Index or table of Dio, that the ſame year Caſar bare his fourth Dictatorſhip, and likewiſe his fourth Conſulat without Collegue. In that hiſtory alſo it appeareth, that Caſar preſently entred upon his fourth Conſulat, but bare it not throughout the whole year: and that ſo ſoon as he was returned to Rome out of Spain, he reſigned and ſubſtituted in his place for the reſt of the year, Q. Fabius Maximus, and Cn. Trebonius. With Dio, the evidences agree that are written in the capitoll fragments: wherein it appeareth that Caſar was the fourth time Conſul, and that without a Collegue; as Sigonius maketh interpretation. For Cuſpinians Kalender, together with the Sicilian regiſters, do ſhew that Caſar was Conſul now alone the fourth time. In like manner, Appian and Plutarch make mention of Caſar, who being Conſul elect from the fourth time led an army into Spain. As for Q. Fabius, Suetonius calleth him a three months Conſul. Dio ſaith moreover, that Caſar upon the death of Q. Fabius the Conſul, declared the very laſt day of the year, C. Cannius to be the Conſul for thoſe few hours that were behind. Whereof Cicero in his ſeventh book of Epiſtles, writing to Curius, Macrobius in his ſecond book of Saturnalia, Tacitus in his eighteenth book, Pliny in his ſeventh, and Suetonius in Caſar do make report.

C. Caſar. M. Antonius.

Dio ſetteth down for this year Caſar Dictator the fift time, together with M. Æmylius Lepidus Maſter of the horſemen. But the capitoll tables avouch him Dictator now the fourth time. Dio and Appian write that he created himſelf Conſul together with M. Antonius. Likewiſe Caſſiodorus and the Sicilian regiſters give record, that Caſar was this year Conſul the fift time, together with M. Antonius. And Macrobius in his firſt book ſpeaketh of them. Moreover, written it is in the capitoll and Colotian tables, that C. Caſar was Coſ. the fift time, with M. Antonius ſon of M. and that in the room of Caſar there was choſen P Cornelius ſon of Publius. And this was P. Cornelius Dolabella, whom Caſar himſelf (if he had lived) meant to have ſubſtituted in his own room. Plutarch writeth, that Caſar Conſul now the fift time took unto him for his companion in government M. Antonius. And when as he would have ſubordained Dolabella in his own ſtead, Antony gainſaid it in an oration: and afterwards, when Caſar a ſecond time would have had Dolabella to be declared Conſul, and ſtill Antony croſſed and withſtood it, Caſar gave over his enterpriſe. But after Caſar was murdered, Antony (as Dio writeth) fearing ſome inſurrection and commotion if he ſhould have rejected Dolabella, took him into the fellowſhip of government. Appian ſaith, that immediatly after Caſar was killed, Dolabella entred into the Magiſtracy. So ſaith Velleius alſo. And this verily was the year, in which the conſpiracy was contrived againſt Caſar, whereof the captains were M and Decimus both Bruti, C. Trebonius & C. Caſſius: and upon the fifteenth day of March, when he ſat in Councill together with the Senat in the court of Pompey, he was was ſtabbed, and received in his body three and twenty wounds: which done, the murderers who had wrought the feat ſeized the capitoll. And C. Octavius his nephew or ſiſters ſon, whom Caſar had made in his will his half-heir, and adopted to bear his own name, came out of Epirus, whither Caſar had ſent him before, minding to make war upon the Parthians, and after all lucky and happy proceedings, took upon him the name of Caſar, according to his laſt will and teſtament.

711

C. Pansa. A. Hirtius.

Dio, Cassiodorus, and the rest, nominate Consuls for this year, C. Vibius Pansa Caprolianus, and A. Hirtius, son of Aulus. Cuspinians book sheweth Cretonianus and Hirtius. Whereby it may be understood, that Cretonianus was the surname of Pansa, but peradventure written for Capronianus. In the Colotian table they are named C. Vibius, son of Caius, and Au. Hirtius son of Hirtius. This Hirtius was one of their sons who were out-lawed by Sulla, and whom Cæsar (as Dio reporteth) advanced to honourable dignities. Both these, and the Consuls of the year following, were by Cæsar elected and destined thereto, before he was slain. Dio, Appian, and others report, that of these two Consuls, Hirtius in the time of the civill war, in a battell before Modena against Antonius was slain; and Pansa some daies after, upon a hurt received in the same fight, died at Bononia. In the room of Pansa, C. Octavius was sub-elected Consul, the nineteenth of August in the same year, and he instead of Hirtius, took unto him for his Collegue Q. Padius.

M. Lepidus. L. Plancus.

Cassiodorus and the Sicilian records put down for Consuls, M. Lepidus and L. Plancus. Dio, M. Æmylius Lepidus the second time, and Lu. Munatius, son of Lucius, surnamed Plancus. Of these Consuls Suetonius speaketh in Tiberius, saying, That Tiberius was born after the battell of Philippi, when Mar. Æmylius Lepidus was the second time Consul with Munatius Plancus. Now had there been before appointed Consuls against this year by Cæsar, D. Brutus and Lu. Plancus. But by reason that Brutus the year before was by the law Pedia condemned and after killed, and so the three Triumvirs usurped the rule of the common-weal; agreed it was, that M. Lepidus one of the Triumvirs who beforetime also had been Consul with Cæsar in his third Consulship, should together with Plancus, (who also taking part and siding with Antony, had revolted from the Common-weal) administer the Consulat. Moreover, this Brutus was by Plutarch, Appian, Dio, and Zonaras, called also Albinus; I suppose, for that out of the race of the Bruti he was adopted and incorporat into the house of the Albini. In this year, during the civill war, Brutus and Cassius were slain in battell before Philippi, as Dio, Plutarch, Appian, and others write.

THe Colotian tables, Dio, and Cassiodorus match Consuls together for this year, Lu. Antonius son of Marcus, surnamed Pietas, and P. Servilius, son of Publius, Isauricus, the second time. Of these Consuls, Suetonius writeth in Tiberius. This P. Servilius was first Consul with Cæsar in his second Consulat; whose father Isauricus died a little before, as Dio and Eusebius report. As for L. Antonius, named he is by Dio Pietas, for that being Consul, he together with Fulvia the wife of his brother Marcus, managed the affairs of state with that mind, as if his whole care had been for his brother the Triumvir, in regard of which brotherly and affectionat kindness, he challenged the surname of Pietas.

714
Cn. Domitius. C. Asinius.

A Colotian table, Dio, and Cassiodorus joyn in the Consulat of this year, Cneus Domitius son of Marcus, Calvinus, the second time; and C. Asinius, son of Cneus, Pollio. Of these, Josephus speaketh in his fourteenth book of the Jews antiquities and three and twenty chapter. Toward the end of this year, Dio writeth, that these Consuls gave up their place and that other Consuls were substitute for those few daies that were to come: and one of them was L. Cornelius Balbus Gaditanus. And therefore in the Colotian table these subordained Consuls stand under these names, L. Cornelius, son of Lucius, and P. Canidius, son of Lucius. Of Pub. Cornel. Balbus Consul, Pliny writeth in his seventh book and three and fortieth chapter, and Velleius in his second book.

Cassiodorus inferred for the next Consuls, Lucius Censorinus and Caius Calvisius. The Sicilian records have Censorinus and Sabinus. Dio, L. Martius and C. Sabinus, C. Calvisius son of Caius, is named by Dio in the catalogue or table, Sabinus, although it be read there commonly, but amiss, Asinius.

716
Ap. Claudius. C. Norbanus.

COnsuls that follow, were App. Claudius and C. Norbanus, as Cassiodorus saith. But as the Sicilian registers, purport, Censorinus and Sabinus: as Dio writeth, App. Claudius son of Caius, Pulcher; and C. Norbanus, son of Caius, Flaccus. As touching Tadius Asper the Consul elect, and substitute in the room of another, who before he entred into government, being terrified with the minatory threats of C. Cæsar, threw himself down headlong, and so brake his neck, see Tranquillus in Augustus.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, M. Agrippa and Lu. Caninius. The Sicilian registers Agrippa and Gallus. Dio, M. Vipsanius, son of Lucius, Agrippa: and L. Caninius son of Lucius, Gallus. Josephus in his fifteenth book of Antiquities, avoucheth Consuls, Mar. Agrippa and C. Canidius Gallus. Nepos also in the life of Atticus, calleth Vipsanius Agrippa. In the capitol marbles and in other old monuments of Rome his gentile name is paſſed over, and namely, in the forefront of the Temple, called Pantheon, wherein is engraven M. Agrippa ſon of Lucius, Conſul the third time. Tacitus alſo in his firſt book mentioneth this Agrippa.

L.Gellius. M.Cocceius.

Caſſiodorus nameth for Conſuls this year, L.Gellius and M.Cocceius. The Sicilian records ſhew Publicola and Nerva: Dio hath Lu. Gellius ſon of Lucius Poplicola, and M.Cocceius Nerva. Out of the capitoll fragments it appeareth, that L.Gellius was the ſon of Lucius, and nephew of Lucius. By the report of Dio, this Lu. Gellius was brother to M.Valerius Meſſala. For it is the ſame man who was pardoned before by M. Brutus: whereby it may be underſtood, that Poplicola was his ſurname by way of adoption: for they were not the Gellii but the Valerii, that carried the ſurname of Publicolæ. The ſame fragments do ſhew, that the ſaid Gellius left his place, and that another was put in his room. And haply it was L. Munatius, ſon of Lucius, nephew of Lucius Plancus: whom Pliny in his thirteenth book and third chapter, ſaith to have been twice Conſul: but in what year he was the ſecond time, a man cannot find, unleſs it were in this.

Caſſiodorus and the Sicilian records teſtifie, that this years Conſuls were Sex. Pompeius and L.Cornificius. Dio, L.Cornificius ſon of Lucius, and Sextus Pompeius ſon of Sextus. This year Sex. Pompeius, ſon of Cneus was ſlain.

M. Antonius. L. Scribonius Libo.

Caſſiodorus putteth down for Conſuls, Lu. Scribonius and Lu. Atratinus. The Sicilian catalogue Antonius and Libo. Dio, M. Antonius ſon of Marcus the ſecond time, and L.Scribonius, ſon of Lucius, Libo. The ſame Dio ſaith moreover, that M. Antonius the Triumvir, preſently upon the very Calends of Jannary gave over the Magiſtracy, and ſubſtituted in his own ſtead Lu. Sempronius Atratinus: and therefore many there be that affirm how it was not Antonius but Atratinus that was Conſul this year with Libo. That Conſuls alſo were ſub-elected to bear out one part of the year, it is to be found in ſome authors that have ſet forth the Municipal Annals. And verily Dio maketh mention of Paulus Æmylius Conſul, for one part of the year, and that he built a ſtately porch or gallery at his own charges, and dedicated it in his Conſulſhip.

Caſſiodorus exhibiteth unto us for Conſuls, C. Cæſar and L. Volcatius. Dio, Cæſar the ſecond time, and L. Volcatius ſon of Lucius Tullus. They who compoſed and digeſted the Sicilian regiſters, very unfitly ſet down Cæſar and Cicero for this years Conſuls. Of this Conſulſhip of Cæſar, Suetonius and Dio ſpeak, ſaying, that he held it very few hours, as Antonius alſo beforetime. Inſtead of Cæſar was Lu. Antonius ſubrogated, and many other for one part or other of the year, who in the book entituled, Old inſcriptions, are reckoned in this manner:

Emperor Cæſar II. L.Volcatius.
Kal. Januarii. L.Antonius.
Kal. Maii. L.Flavius.
Kal. Julii. M.Atilius.
C.Fonteius.
Kal. Sept. L. Vinutius.
Kal. Octob. L. Lanonius.

Of L. Flavius made Conſul by M. Antonius, and depoſed, Dio likewiſe maketh mention.

722
Cn. Domitius. C.Soſius.

Caſiodorus nominateth for Conſuls this year, Cn. Domitius and C. Soſius. The Sicilian records, Ænobarbus and Soſius. Dio, Cneus Domitius, ſon of Cneus, nephew of Cneus, Ænobarbus; and C. Soſius ſon of C. nephew of Caius. Nepos writeth, that Atticus died, when Cn. Domitius and C. Soſius were Conſuls.

723
C.Cæſar II. M.Meſſala.

Caſſiodorus avoucheth Conſuls this year, C. Cæſar the ſecond time, and M. Meſſala. The Sicilian regiſters, Octavius and Corvinus. Dio, Cæſar the third time, and M. Valerius, ſon of Marcus, ſurnamed Meſſala Corvinus, and that right truly. For Caſſiodorus maketh no reckoning of that Conſulſhip of Cæſar which he bare with Pedius, becauſe he was ſubordained in the place with another. But Dio and Appius do witneſs, that Cæſar and Antony were marched together this year, both of them in their ſecond Conſulſhip, at what time as upon peace made with Sextus Pompeius, they were appointed Conſuls beforehand for eight years next enſuing: howbeit, in the firſt year the people turned Antony out of his Conſulſhip, and proclaimed war againſt him and Cleopatra, and ſo in his place was Mar. Meſſala declared Conſul. As touching the Conſuls this year ſubordained, thus we find written in the ancient inſcriptions.

Emperour Cæſar IIII. M.Valerius.
Kal. Maii. M.Titius.
Kal. Octobris. Cn.Pompeius.

724
C.Cæſar III. M.Craſſus.

Caſſiodorus nameth for this years Conſuls, C. Cæſar the third time, and M.Craſſus. The Sicilian records Octavianus and Craſſus. Dio, Cæſar the fourth time, and M. Licinius, ſon of Marcus Craſſus. He added moreover, and ſaith, Cæſar in the midſt of that water croſſed the ſeas out of

of Macedony into Italy, wherein he was the fourth time Conſul with M. Craſſus. Oroſius likewiſe noteth, that Cæſar called Emperor, was Conſul the fourth time with M. Livius Craſſus. Of other Conſuls ſubſtituted after M. Licinius, this we find in the old inſcriptions.

Emperor Cæſar IV. M. Licinius.
Kal. Jul. C. Antiſtius.
Ibid. Septembr. M. Tullius.
Kal. Novembr. L. Sanius.

Of M. Tullius Conſul with Auguſtus, Dio maketh mention in his ſtory of this years acts. Pliny alſo in his 22 book and 6 chap. and Plutarch in Cicero. By Velleius and Tacitus it appeareth that Antiſtius had for addition the ſurname of Vetus, and Sanius of Savinus.

C. Cæſar IIII. Sex. Apuleius.

IN Caſſiodorus the Conſuls be C. Cæſar the fourth time, and Sixt. Apuleius. In Di, Cæſar the fift time, and Sext. Apuleius ſon of Sext. In the Sicilian records, Octavianus and Apuleius: in the Antique inſcriptions, Emperour Cæſar the fift time, and Sext. Apuleius. Dio ſaith, this was the year 725 from the foundation of the City. Of Cæſar five times Conſul, there is to be ſeen an old Epigram or inſcription in this manner.

Senatus Populuſq́ Romanus,
Imp. Caſ. Divi Julii Fil. Coſ. Quinc.
Coſ. Deſig. Sext. Imp. Sept.
Reſp. conſervata.

That is,

The Senat and people of Rome. By Emperour Cæſar, ſon of Julius of famous memory, Conſul five times, elect Conſul the ſixt time, and Emperor the ſeventh, the Commonwealth ſaved.

C. Cæſar V. M. Agrippa II.

Caſſiodorus declareth for Conſuls this year, Cæſar the fift time, and M. Agrippa the ſecond time. Oroſius and the Sicilian records, Cæſar the ſixt time, and Agrippa the ſecond time. Dio, Cæſar the ſixt time, and M. Vipſanius Agrippa the third time: but it is to be read the ſecond time, as Sigonius advertiſeth, ſo as the next year it ſhould be written the third time. And this plainly appeareth by the ſuperſcription of that Temple (which he erected and named Pantheon) in this form, [M. Agrippa ſon of L. third time Conſul built it.] For Dio ſaith, that this Temple was finiſhed two years after that he was Conſul with Cæſar the ſeventh time Conſul, in which year himſelf bare his third Conſulſhip, and not the fourth. For otherwiſe in the front of the ſaid Temple, he would have written, [Conſul the fourth time.]

727
C. Cæſar VI. M. Agrippa III.

Caſſiodorus ſaith, that the next Conſuls were Cæſar the ſixt time, and Mar. Agrippa the third time. But Dio, Cæſar the ſeventh time, and Agrippa the fourth time. But what is to be thought of them both, is evident by that which hath been ſaid before. In the Sicilian regiſters verily it is written Octavianus the ſeventh time, and Agrippa the third time.

728
C. Auguſtus Cæſar VII. T. Statilius.

Caſſiodorus putteth down for Conſuls, Cæſar Auguſtus the ſeventh time, and T. Statilius. The Sicilian monuments Octavianus the eighth time, and Taurus. Dio, Cæſar Auguſtus the eighth time, and Statilius Taurus the ſecond time. For he had been Conſul firſt, for a part of the year, anno 727, and now is the ſecond time: of whom Suetonius writeth thus in Nero; Nero took to wife Statilia Meſſalina, daughter (in the fourth deſcent) of Taurus, one who had been twice Conſul, and alſo triumphant: he writeth alſo, that Auguſtus entred upon his eight and ninth Conſulat at Tarracon.

C. Cæſar Auguſtus VIII. M. Silanus.

Caſſiodorus ſheweth for Conſuls next, Cæſar Auguſtus the eighth time, and M. Silanus. Dio and the Sicilian records, Auguſtus the ninth time, and M. Silanus. A fragment of the capitol, Emperour Cæſar Auguſtus the ninth time, and M. Junius Silanus. This year Auguſtus Cæſar was Emperour the eight time, and ſhut up the Temple of Janus the fourth time now that ever it was ſhut: which he had ſet open before in regard of certain wars, as Dio reporteth.

730
C. Cæſar Auguſtus IX. C. Norbanus.

Caſſiodorus putteth down for this years Conſuls, Cæſar Auguſtus the ninth time, and C. Norbanus. The Sicilian regiſters, Auguſtus the tenth time, and Flaccus. Dio and a fragment of the capitoll marble, Auguſtus the tenth time, and C. Norbanus Flaccus. This Norbanus ſeemeth to be the ſon of C. Norbanus the Conſul, anno 716. for he had not the numerall note teſtifying a ſecond Conſulſhip.

731
C. Cæſar Auguſtus X. Cn. Piſo.

Caſſiodorus ſetteth down for Conſuls, Cæſar Auguſtus the tenth time, and Cneus Piſo. The Sicilian records, Auguſtus the eleventh time, and Piſo. And Dio, Auguſtus the eleventh time, with Cn. Calpurnius, ſon of Cneus Piſo. By a fragment of the capitol ſtone it appeareth that Auguſtus entered the Conſulſhip the eleventh time, together with Aulus Terentius Varro Murana: alſo that Murana died in his Magiſtracy, in whoſe ſtead was elected Cn. Calpurnius Piſo; and Auguſtus went out of his government. Of which matter Dio thus writeth; Auguſtus went to the Alban hill, and there reſigned up the the Conſulſhip. For whereas both he himſelf and many others, ever ſince the time that the C.W. was ſet in frame and eſtabliſhed, had born the yearly Magiſtrats, he thought that from thence forwards he was to forbear the ſame, to the end, that the honourable dignity of Conſuls ſhould be open to as many as might be. And this did he without the City, becauſe he would not be hindred and letted in the action: and therewith ſubſtituted in his place Lucius Seſtius, a man that of all others moſt affected and loved Brutus: who alſo wrote of his praiſes and commendable parts.

M. Marcellus. L. Aruntius.

THis year had for Conſuls, as ſaith Caſſiodorus, M. Marcellus and L. Aruntius: as Dio, M. Claudius ſon of Marcus Marcellus, and Æſerninus ſon of Lucius. In the Capitoll ſtone theſe Conſuls are thus ſet down, L. Aruntius ſon of L. nephew of L. and M. Claudius ſon of Marcus, nephew of M. Whereby it is given to underſtand, that in the Sicilian records the Conſuls are not well put down to be Octavianus the twelfth time, and Aruntius. In this year, the conſpiracy of Fannius Capio and Varro Murana againſt Auguſtus was diſcovered: and the Temple of thundering Jupiter was dedicated, witneſs Dio.

M. Lollius. Q. Lepidus.

THe Colotian ſtone and Caſſiodorus ſhew for this year Conſuls, Q. Æmylius Lepidus and M. Lollius. Dio writeth, when Auguſtus was in Sicily, and the people of Rome at the aſſembly for Conſuls election, there aroſe a ſedition and commotion. For M. Lollius only entred upon the government, by reaſon that the other place was reſerved and kept for Auguſtus: but when he made refuſall, Q. Lepidus was created. Of theſe Conſuls Horace in his firſt book of Epiſtles writeth thus:

Me quater undenos ſciat imſleviſſe Decembres,
Collegam Lepidum quo dixit Lollius anno.

Know he, that 40 winters old and four, I was that year,
At Rome when Conſul Lollius, choſe Lepidus his feer.

M. Apuleius. P. Silius.

AFter Caſſiodorus, the Conſuls that followed for this year, were M. Apuleius and P. Silius. But in Dio, M. Apuleius ſon of Sextus, and Publius Silius ſon of Publius Nerva. In the Sicilian records, Apuleius and Nerva.

735
C. Sentius. Q. Lucretius.

THe Colotian ſtone, Euſebius in his treatiſe of Times, Dio and Caſſiodorus ſet forth as Conſuls this year, Caius Sentius, ſon of Caius, Saturninus; and Quintus Lucretius ſon of Quintus Viſpillo. Of this years conſuls thus writeth Dio. Caius Sentius was declared Conſul: but for that there was to be given him a companion, and Auguſtus refuſed the ſecond place of Conſulſhip reſerved for him, there aroſe a ſedition, untill Auguſtus pronounced Conſul Quintus Lucretius one of the Embaſſadors, whom the Senat had ſent unto him about the appeaſing of the foreſaid ſedition; notwithſtanding he was a man in times paſt proſcribed and outlawed. The ſame writeth Velleius in the ſecond book. In the broken Colotian ſtone it is to be read, that the Conſul elected inſtead of Sentius Saturninus, was Mar. Vinucius ſon of Marcus. Velleius, unto Vinucius adjoyneth as Collegue, Agrippa. In this year, after the firſt ten years were expired, for which ſpace Auguſtus together with Agrippa at the firſt received the Cenſorian authority and dignity, he was created a ſecond time by the people over-ſeer of mens behaviour for the term of five years; and reſumed the Cenſors power for the ſame time, and the Conſular authority for ever. So as, at all times and in all places, he might have twelve Lictors go before him with their bundles of rods, and be allowed to take his place and ſit with the Conſuls.

736
Cn. Lentulus. P. Lentulus.

PUblius Cornelius ſon of Publius, Lentulus Marcellinus: and Cn. Cornelius ſon of Lucius, are ſet down for Conſuls by the Colotian ſtone table; by Dio alſo and Caſſiodorus. In this year Marcus Agrippa by the motion and authority of the Emperour Ceſar Auguſtus, obtained of the Senat and people of Rome the Tribunitian power for five years.

C. Furnius. C. Silanus.

THere ſucceeded Conſuls next, according to Caſſiodorus, C. Furnius and C. Silanus. After Dio, C. Furnius ſon of C. and C. Junius ſon of Caius Silanus. But in the Colotian fragment C. Furnius ſon of Caius, and C. Junius. Whiles C. Furnius and C. Junius Silanus were Conſuls, the ſolemn plaies, called Seculares were now the fift time ſet out by Auguſtus, as Cenſorinus and Dio affirm.

CAſſiodore nameth for Conſuls Lucius Domitius and P. Scipio. The Sicilian records, Ænobarbus and Cornelius. Dio, L. Domitius ſon of Lucius, nephew of Lucius, Ænobarbus: and P. Cornelius ſon of P. nephew of Publius, Scipio: In like manner the Colotian table, wherein it ſtandeth, that for P. Cornelius there was ſubſtituted L. Ta. i.e. Tarius: of whom Pliny in his eighteenth book and ſeventh chapter writeth thus, L. Tarius Rufus, a man moſt baſe for his parentage, parentage, deſerved a Conſulat under Auguſtus Caſar of happy memory, only for his military ſervice. In this Conſuls year was the Quinquennal ſolemnity performed, as writeth Dio, in memoriall of the Empire of Auguſtus: and Agrippa one of the Quindecemvirs, had the ordering and ſetting out thereof.

739
M. Druſus. L. Piſo.

THe Conſuls next following, were M. Druſus and L. Piſo, as Caſſiodorus ſaith. The Sicilian regiſters name them Libo and Piſo. Dio, M. Livius ſon of Lucius, Druſus Libo: and L. Calphurnius ſon of Lucius Piſo, M. Druſus ſon of Marcus. L. . . . according to the Colotian fragment.

740
Cn. Lentulus. M. Craſſus.

THis year next following had for Conſuls, after Caſſiodorus, and the Sicilian monuments, Cn. Lentulus and M. Craſſus whom Dio calleth, M. Licinius ſon of Marcus. C. . . . and Cn. Cornelius, ſon of Cneus Lentulus. The Colotian fragment ſheweth Marcus Licinius ſon of Marcus.

741
T. Nero. Q. Quintilius

Tiberius Nero, and P. Quintilius were Conſuls this year, as Caſſiodorus reporteth. They are named Nero and Varus in the Sicilian Catalogue. And Dio calleth them Titus Claudius ſon of Tiberius Nero: and P. Quintilius, ſon of Sextus Varus. The Colotian fragment, Tiberius Claudius ſon of T. Suetonius writeth, that Tiberius bare his firſt Conſulſhip but a few daies. For this is that Tiberius Nero, Auguſtus Cæſars wives ſon, who after the death of Auguſtus, attained to the Empire, having been firſt by him adopted.

742
M. Meſſala. P. Sulpitius.

Caſſiodorus putteth down for Conſuls, Meſſala and P. Sulpitius. The Sicilian records, Meſſala and Quirinus. Dio, M. Valerius, ſon of Marcus, Meſſala Barbatus: and P. Sulpitius ſon of Publius Quirinus: of whom Suetonius in Claudius, and Tacitus in his ſecond book write. Moreover, this is that Sulpitius Quirinus, who by Joſephus in the ſeventeenth book of antiquities and firſt chapter, is ſaid to have born the Conſular dignity, and was Lieutenant in Syria. At which time, our Lord Jeſus Chriſt the Redeemer and Saviour of mankind, was born: of whom Saint Luke maketh mention, ſaying, This was the firſt enrolment or taxation which was made by Quirinus Preſident and governour of Syria. After theſe Conſuls, others were ſubſtituted in their place, as the Colotian ſtone ſheweth, wherein it is thus read:

M. Valerius. M. F.
C. Volgius. C. F.
Suff. C. Caninius.

Likewiſe in Cuſpinian his Calender, theſe Conſuls are written with their ſurnames:

Meſſala Quirinus.
Rebilus Saturninus.
Maximus Tubero.

By which it appeareth that Rebulus and Saturninus were the ſurnames of Caninius & Volgius. By a fragment of the capitoll marble, it is evident, that the ſurnames of Valerius was Æmylianus; of Volgius, Rufus; and Rebulus of Caninius: and that as Rufus was put in the place of Valerius, ſo Rebulus inſtead of Rufus. There remaineth alſo the memoriall of Rebulus and Saturninus in the Sicilian records. In this year, Dio reporteth, that Auguſtus was a ſecond time made over-ſeer for mens manners and demeanours five years more: and that he reſumed ſtill the ſame authority by times, as alſo the Empire, and therein Agrippa died.

P. Fabius. Q. Ælius.

Caſſiodorus exhibiteth for this years Conſuls, Paulus Fabius and Q. Ælius. Dion, Paulus Fabius, ſon of Quintus Maximus and Tubero. Of Q. Ælius Tubero, and P. Fabius Maximus Conſuls, Frontinus ſpeaketh of in his book of water-conduits: and Pliny in his eight book and ſeventh chapter, where he writeth, that the Theater of Marcellus was dedicated when Quintus Tubero and Fabius Max. were Conſuls.

744
Julus Antonius. Q. Fabius.

Caſſiodorus nameth for Conſuls this year, Junius Antonius Africanus and Q. Fabius. Dio, Jul. Antonius Africanus and Q. Fabius ſon of Quintus Maximus. The Sicilian Catalogue and Calender of Cuſpinian ſhew Africanus and Maximus. Dio nameth Julus, the ſon of Antonius. Unto him Horace writeth in this manner:

Pindarum quiſquis ſtudet æmulari
Iule, ceratis ope Dædalea,
Nititur pennis, &c.

With wings deviſ'd by Dædalus
And glew'd with wax, they flie:
Who ſtrive (O Iule) with Pindarus
To match his Poetry.

And after,
Tendit (Antoni) quoties in altos
Nubium tractus.

——O Antoni, ſo ſoft
As he doth mount the clouds aloft,

Druſus Nero. Titus Quintius.

THere ſucceeded Conſ. according to Caſſiodorus, Druſus Nero, and T. Quintius: but after Dio, Nero Claudius, ſon of Tiberius Druſus; and T. Quintius, ſon of Titus Criſpinus. Druſus and Criſpinus, by Cuſpinians Calender and the Sicilian regiſters. This Druſus brother of Tiberius Nero was Auguſtus Cæſars wives ſon: who being Conſul, died in Germany, and both he and his children had the ſurname of Germanicus, as Dio writeth: which addition the Senat gave him firſt of that Province, as Eutropius ſaith. With the death of this Druſus endeth Livies hiſtories: for thus it is written in the laſt Epitome, &c. Look in the ſaid Breviary.

To the Reader.

I doubt not but many of them who ſhall take delight and pleaſure in reading the Roman ſtory above-written, will preſently grow into a liking of the very place, which hath afforded ſo worthy perſons and rare examples. The love whereof hath moved many a man to undertake a voyage to Rome, only to ſee the river Tyberis, thoſe ſeven hils, and the monuments remaining of that famous City. The journey they have found, for way long and tedious; for expence of money heavy and chargeable; for hazard of religion, conſcience and good manners, exceeding dangerous: ſo far degenerate are the inhabitants now from that ancient people, ſo devout, ſo vertuous and uncorrupt, in old time. To ſatisfie the Readers in this behalf, and to avoid the peril of that travell, I thought it not amiſs to bring Rome (as it were) home to them, even to repreſent unto their eye the Topography thereof, that is to ſay, the deſcription of the places, with the memorable edifices, or rather the ruins of thoſe antique buildings, mentioned in the ſtory aforeſaid. And for aſmuch as Bartholmew Marlian hath [illegible] plains, and made a Treatiſe thereof, worthy in his conceit to be dedicated unto that noble Prince of famous memory, Francis the French King, the firſt (I take it) of that name: and for that thoſe learned men, who firſt ſet Livy forth in print, have thought good to adjoyn thereto, as a neceſſary dependant, the foreſaid Treatiſe; I for my part, having ſtrugled with the difficulties of the Alps, and in ſome ſort overcome them; croſſed Rhoſne and the Po; paſſed over the hils Olympus and Æmus, and ſcrawled through the rough ſtreights of Thermopylæ and Tempe, ſeem now I would not at my return to ſtick at the pleaſant mounts, Palatine, Capitoll, Aventin, &c. with the plains and valleys between, or the river Tyber and Mars field underneath them, beautified eſpecially with ſuch ſtately Temples, triumphant Arches, glorious Palaces, Theatres, Cirques, Columns, and Coloſſes, wonders of the world. And albeit I found Marlian far unlike himſelf, and the book that goeth in his name much corrupt in the print, yet by conference with other Authors, I have reformed the fault, and endeavoured that our Engliſh edition might in ſome meaſure be anſwerable to the Latine.

A Summary collected by John Bartholmew Marlianus, a Gentleman of Millain, touching the Topography of Rome in ancient time.

CHAP. I.

The ſituation of the City.

BEfore we enterpriſe to ſhew the edifices and buildings of the City of Rome, ſomewhat would be premiſed of the ſite thereof. Begin therefore we will at the very habitation of the immortall gods; with the invocation of whom, the Poets are wont in every hard and difficult work, to lay their firſt ground and make their entrance.

The Capitol hill, where it is broadeſt, exceedeth not 800 foot: in length it lyeth out toward the Northweſt 1500. It hath a point or wing on either ſide in faſhion of a ſemicircle, and in compaſs containeth well-near ſeven * furlongs.

* Stadia.

From this mount as it runneth out in length, the Palatine hill is divided by a valley of the ſame breadth, or ſomewhat more; making a ſquare with four angles of unequall ſides, containing 1200 paces. For, the one of 600 foot boundeth upon the Capitoline hill: a ſecond of ſeven hundred foot, bendeth to the Northeaſt: the third, being almoſt twice as long, looketh toward the Southeaſt and the mount Cælius: the fourth, which of all others is biggeſt, and comprehendeth the liſts or ſhew-place, called Circus Maximus, directly regardeth the Aventine. On the ſecond ſide thereof there is one plain, reaching from the head and top of the Forum Rom. to the utmoſt skirt of the hill Quirinalis, which bendeth toward the Suburra, and taketh up in breadth 500 foot: but it lieth out in length almoſt a mile from both fronts, between the Capitoll, the Forum Nervæ, and the mount Cælius: in like manner from the ſaid mount Cælius and Palatine, Suburra and the Eſquilie, as far as to the Church of Saint Marcelline. A ſecond plain there is, under the other point and top of the Capitol, near the Theatre of Marcellus, which ſtretcheth out 500 foot from the mount it ſelf, as far as to the Tyber; and anon over-againſt the valley from the crooked reach and courſe of the river, and the nook whereby the Aventine is divided from the Palatine, it ſpreadeth broader: but afterwards between the ſaid hils it groweth narrow, untill ye come to Cœliolus and the very gate Capena, where the Aventine is parted from Cœliolus only by the breadth of the ſtreet or high way. The length of this plain is likewiſe a mile, having on the right hand, Tyber and the Aventine; on the left, Capitoline mount, the Palatine, and Cœlius.

Then followeth the mount Cœlius (ſeparate from the Palatine by a plain) reſembling a pyramidal form of a ſpire, ſo as the Baſe thereof containeth 500 foot near to the Amphitheatre. Divided alſo from the ſame it is by the ſtreet Appia, faſt by the grand Cirque, which reaching to the gate Capena, leaveth on the left hand a valley 600 foot broad, between Cœlius and Cœliolus, lying out in length 4 Stadia, and within a while to the wals which joyn cloſe to the mount Cœlius, as far as to the gate Aſinaria. This hill then from thence lyeth along the City wall for 4 Stadia, toward the Northeaſt. From hence the wals meet afront for the ſpace of two Stadia, even to the gate Navia: from whence as they turn to the Northeaſt, it is parted from the Eſquilia by the ſtreet Labicana: and anon ſhewing it ſelf afront near S. Marcellines, it beareth forward as far as to the Amphitheatre. Thus keeping no certain form, it taketh in circuit about 2500 paces. Moreover the Cœliolus is incloſed within the ſaid valley, the ſtreet Appia, and all along Northeaſt and Southeaſt, with the City wals: and hath in compaſs well-near a mile.

The Aventine ſeemeth to contain two hils; the broader part whereof toward the Tyber, and in like manner in length from Tyber along the wals, and anon near the gate Hoſtienſis, is divided and cut with a crooked ſtreet-way which leadeth to the angle of the grand Cirque and the mount Cœlius: leaving the other part thereof, divided on the right hand from the mount Cœlius by the ſtreet Appia, untill you come to the gate Capena. It had in compaſs 18. Stadia, as Dionyſius alſo teſtifieth; and on the Southeaſt, a moſt ſpacious and large plain of 4 unequall ſides: toward the South containing almoſt 6 Stadia, Weſtward five, ſomewhat leſs Eaſtward, but toward the Tyber not above four.

The Eſquilia on the South part is divided with the ſtreet Labicana; on the Northweſt, with the valley lying between Cœlius, Palatinus, and it ſelf; on the North the Suburra; and from the Viminal hill, the ſtreet called Patritius parteth it, untill a man come to the bath of Dioclefian. In circuit it containeth about 4 miles, and hath no certain form; inſomuch as Varro (not without good reaſon) thinketh it two hills, and cutteth it into many parts.

The Viminal hill on the Weſt ſide regardeth the Quirinal, having about a furlong ſpace the plain Suburra lying between: on the North it hath the valley Quirinalis. Between the ſame hils there lyeth as it were 4 jugera in breadth, but about a quarter of a mile in length. And anon it joyneth to the Quirinal and Eſquilia along the wall of the City, by a continuall row of many arches, whereby theſe mountains are made even. The compaſs thereof taketh up two miles and an half; the form thereof is longwiſe, and the breadth not in every part alike, but variable.

The Quirinal mount on the left hand, directly from the tower called [Militiarum] for the ſpace of 4 Stadia, over-looketh the levell plot of the City which lieth Weſtward: but on the right hand (as clearly appeareth by that which we have ſaid) it is oppoſite to the Viminalis: on the third ſide, Northward, for the ſpace of 6 Stadia, it lieth to the hill called [Hortulorum.] It hath a valley lying between, in breadth 4 jugera, reaching near to the gate Salaria: and in the whole compaſs it taketh almoſt three miles.

Next to it is the little hill Hortulorum, although it ſtandeth without the old pomœry of the city: for the ſpace of 3 Stadia it beareth over the valley Martia lying between it and Tyber. It carrieth in length along the wall of the City, from the gate Flumentana to Collina, a full mile more than any other ſides. The circumference thereof is much about 18 Stadia.

There remaineth now the mount Janiculus, on the other ſide of Tyber: the one half thereof and not above, is contained within the walls: from the Vatican plain, for the ſpace of 3 Stadia, whereas it ſtretcheth toward the South, it adjoyneth to the river: the other part thereof is incloſed within the walls, for the compaſs of five Stadia.

Moreover, above the Vatican plain, there is a little hill of the ſame nature, which putteth forth two points like horns; the one toward Janiculum, the other Northward, much like a bow full bent: the convexity or outward compaſs whereof containeth a mile.

Now will we run over the plain and baſe plot of the City: which beginning at the Capitol hill near the gate Flaminia, at this day on the Northeaſt ſide (or rather the North) comprehendeth a Diameter or race almoſt of 8 Stadia, environed with the hils Quirinalis and Hortulorum: but on the Weſt ſide, the Tyber runneth by it, where along the banks thereof it beareth a greater ſpace. Moreover, by a ſtreight and direct line being drawn for two Stadia from the hill Hortulorum, and namely, where it over-looketh the Piere of Domitian called Naumachia: along the bank of Tyberis, over-againſt the Pile Hadriani, it maketh a quadrangle of four uneven ſides, containing within it more than three miles: without which ſquare is left the valley Martia, namely, as much as lieth between the hill Hortulorum, the wall of the City, and Tyberis: ſo as the bredth draweth narrower ſtill unto the gate Flaminia.

There reſteth yet the Tranſtyberin region, which together with the Janiculum, taketh in compaſs about three miles. This will be more eaſily obſerved and marked by the very channell of

Tyberis; which entring into the city, keepeth his course directly on the right hand of the gate Flaminia through the vale Martia, and soon after by little and little turneth from the North, Westward, and representeth the form of a semicircle, in the convexity whereof is the Vatican, and within the concavity, the Mars field. Moreover, beneath the Moles or pile [Hadriani] returning to his former course, as far as to the utmost foot of the Aventine, winding somewhat crooked into the South, not far from the gate Portuensis it runneth forth of the city.

Thus much concerning the situation and form of Rome, and the plot wherein it standeth, which at this day is so far changed, that hardly a man may find any token or memoriall of it, as it was in old time.

CHAP. II.

Of the founders of the City of Rome, the KK. and Inhabitants thereof.

THe region (on which Rome was after built) West of Tyber, a hundred and forty furlongs distant from the sea, the Sicilians (by constant report) first inhabited. Afterwards, the Aborigines leaving Arcadia, by the conduct of Oenotrius the son of Lycaon, came into the said quarters: and being grown into a liking of the place for the fertility thereof, they expelled the Sicilians, and held it for their own use. In process of time the Pelasgians, a people of Greece, together with the Thessalians, who came to aid the Aborigines against the nations their neighbor borderers, remained also in these parts (with the good will and contentment of the said Aborigines) untill the Trojan war: but they all retained the name of the Aborigines, which prerogative they held because they were the first, that by arms conquered that seignory and kingdom. Long time after, Saturn being chased out of Crete by Jupiter his son, fled into Italy: where he taught Janus the King of the Aborigines the skill of planting vineyards, with the use thereof, and likewise the handling of the sickle: in regard of which good turn, he was freely feoffed by Janus in part of his realm, yea, and after the decease of Janus enjoyed the kingdom alone. After this, the Arcadians, who forsook the city Palantium (as weary of their own native country) and by the leading of Evander, seeking some other place of habitation, arrived at the place where now Rome standeth; received of Faunus the K. of the Aborigines, a portion of ground; built a fort upon a little hill not far from Tyber, and named it Palantium, in remembrance of their native city which they had abandoned. After all this, the Peloponnesians, Phanetians, and Epians, by reason that Elis their native country was wasted before by Hercules, were by him brought away into Italy, and they planted themselves upon the mount Saturnine. These men lived a long time according to their own laws and customs, untill they being vanquished and subdued by the Aborigines, were incorporated by them into one Commonalty. Then raigned Latinus the son of Faunus, untill such time as Æneas the son of Anchises, after the overthrow and finall ruin of Ilium, after many adventures and much variety of fortune, which he had endured together with the Trojans his companions, came by the instinct of the destinies to K. Latinus. Whose daughter Lavinia he took to wife, and so was by Latinus admitted into the society and fellowship with him of the kingdom. When the Aborigines and the Trojans were thus linked and joyned together, he called both nations by the name of Latines. Then was Æneas warred upon by Turnus; for that he had married Lavinia, who was espoused and affianced to him before. But Æneas won the victory, and in single combat slew Turnus. At that time also Latinus died, and left his son in law Æneas heir to the crown. certain years after was Æneas killed by Mezentius K. of the Tuscans; and Ascanius his son succeeded in the kingdom. He built the towns Lavinium and Alba: and when he departed this life, made over the crown to his brother Sylvius. After him followed Kings, Æneas Sylvius, Latinus Sylvius, Alba, Atys, Capys, Capetus, Tyberinus, Agrippa, Romulus, Aventinus, Procas, and Amulius. This Amulius usurped the kingdom by fraud, which in right of eldership was due to his brother Numitor. And for fear least there might arise from his brothers off-spring, some one to make claim and recover the royall seat, and thereby himself be thrust out of his place, he consecrated Rhea the daughter of Numitor to Vesta, for to be a professed Nun. She being thus made a votary, and devoted to perpetuall virginity, happened to be with child by Mars, and was delivered of two boies, twins, namely, Romulus and Remus. Amulius advertised hereof, commanded both the babes to be cast forth to perish. Found they were by Faustulus a shepheard upon the bank of the river Tyber, and by his wife Faustula fostered and brought up among other shepheards. Remus being grown to mans estate, was taken by certain thieves and robbers, and brought to K. Amulius his great-uncle. Accused he was, for that he used to raise booties and drive away whole droves of Numitor his cattell. Whereupon delivered he was to Numitor for to be punished according to his discretion. But Remus after much discourse of speeches to and fro, was by certain tokens found and known to be Numitor his daughters son. And at the very time came Romulus also with Faustulus in place, purposing to rescue Remus his brother. Soon they entred into a conspiracy, and at unawares surprized and murdered Amulius: and so restored their grandsire Numitor. In the second year of Numitor his reign, Romulus and Remus built the City of Rome, in the very place where they had been laid forth to perish, which was the 432 year after the winning of Troy, and the twelfth day before the calends of May. Afterwards in a fray that arose between Romulus and Remus striving for the soveraignty, Remus came by his death, and then Romulus gave name both to the City and Citizens also of Rome.

CHAP. III.
The form and bigneſs of the City of Romulus.

Romulus ſet out the City fourſquar, as Plutarch witneſſeth: whereupon of ſome it is called Quadrata. Others affirm, that the form and compaſs thereof is uncertain, and by reaſon of Antiquity unknown at this day. The hill Palatinus was by Romulus firſt fortified, becauſe therein he was brought up: at the foot thereof began the Pomœrium. Afterwards the Capitol and the Roman Forum were laid to it.

The City began to be marked and bounded out from the beaſt-market; from whence in certain places were ſtories pitched and ſet between, along the bottom of the mount Palatine, as far as to the altar of Conſus: and ſo within a while to the old Curia: then, to the Chappell of the Lares and the Roman Forum the bounds were extended, untill a place was aſſigned for the wals, and a ſpacious plot to build the City upon.

Titus Tatius began the wall from the rock Carmentalis, and brought it to the way, which is not far from Tyber. From thence, Southward unto the fartheſt part of the grand Cirque: and ſo North-eaſt-ward he ranged it into the Forum of Nerva, and in the end joyned it to one of the points of the Capitol hill, and within it compaſſed both the Capitol it ſelf, and alſo the Palatine. And finally, to enlarge the City, he ſet to it the hils Quirinalis and Cœlius.

CHAP. IIII.
The gates of Romulus his City.

Romulus when he died, left the City of Rome with three gates, namely, Carmentalis, Romana, and Pandana. Others add a fourth thereto, to wit, Janualis.

Carmentalis took the name of Carmentis the mother of Evander, whoſe Chappel Carmentale ſtood before the gate. This gate ſtood under the Capitol on the right hand, between the cliff Tarpeius and the Tyber, over-againſt the Church now of S Katherine, toward the ſhew-place Flaminius. This was afterwards named Scelerata, for that without this gate, in the Temple of Janus, the act of Senat paſſed, for the ſending of the three hundred Fabii to Cremera, who went forth at this gate, and were ſlain every one at Cremera.

Romana was ſo called of Romulus: built it was where now the gardens are belonging to the new Church of S. Mary, not far from the angle of the mount Palatine, in the bottom of the cliff of Victoria. Some affirm, that this gate was afterwards called Mugonia, of the lowing of kine and oxen: others name it Trigonia, of three corners that it had.

Pandana was ſo named, becauſe it ſtood open for things to be brought through it into the City. The ſame alſo was called Libera or Romulida. The place for it they aſſigned where the gate Saturnia ſtood, bearing the name of the old City ſo called and after deſtroyed.

Janualis carried the name of the Temple Janus, which is not far off. It ſtood ſometime at the very foot of the hill Viminalis.

CHAP. V.
The variety of the compaſs and walls of the City.

WHen the Romans one while made war upon their neighbor nations of Italy, and otherwhiles defended themſelves againſt their violence, it hapned for the moſt part that they got the upper hand, and ever as they vanquiſhed any and ſubdued them under their ſubjection, in the end made them Citizens of Rome: by which occaſion, the City built by Romulus, was not ſufficient to receive ſo great a multitude. Tullius therefore after his conqueſt of the Sabins and Albans laid to the City the mountain Cœlius and the Eſquilia, and ſo enlarged it. Afterwards, when Politorium was won, and a number of the inhabitants tranſlated to Rome; Ancus made a ſecond enlargement of the City, and granted theſe new commers the mount Aventine to inhabit. The old Romans therefore dwelt in Palatine; the Sabins in Capitolium; the Albans in Cœlius; and this new-come multitude in Aventine. But after the Latines alſo were received into the City, they joyned Janiculus alſo to the city by a woodden bridg made over the Tyber; and caſt a trench called Foſſa Quiritium, about the low and levell places of the city. So the Tranſ-tyberine quarter was united to the city, and made it more ſpacious and ſtately: laſt of all, Servius Tullius by adjoyning the hils Viminalis and Quirinalis to the five abovenamed, amplified the city. And as before it was mounded about with rubbiſh, and the ſame rudely laid, Tarquin the proud was the firſt that encloſed it with a wall of good aſhler ſtone. And the very ſame wals which ſtand at this day, were by the poſterity that followed, repaired and reedified upon the old foundations. But the city in old time, when as it flouriſhed in greateſt glory, extended far more in bounds and compaſs. For in Plinies time the circuit thereof within the wall contained about 20 miles. But in theſe daies hardly 12. And the whole compaſs of the city, with the ſuburbs and buildings about and without the walls (which although they ſpred far, were comprehended yet under the name of city) in the ſaid Plinies time, was 50 miles.

CHAP.

CHAP. VI.
The Pomœry of the City.

THat void ſpace of ground within and without the walls, which might not lawfully be either ploughed or inhabited, is called Pomœry. And ſometime it is put for the circuit of the whole City. This Pomœry was oftentimes ſet out farther, and altered by the Roman Emperors. But none had power granted ſo to do, ſave only they that either conquered ſomewhat to the Roman dominion, or endowed the City with ſome ſingular and eſpeciall benefit; as the Emperor Claudius and many more. And like as the Romans had no certain limits of their Empire, ſo no ſet bounds confined either the City or the Pomœry.

CHAP. VII.
The gates of old Rome, which at this day are not to be ſeen: thoſe alſo that are now extant.

EVen as the bounds of the City and Pomœrium were many times altered, ſo the gates alſo; ſome were left within the City, by occaſion that the walls were farther ſet out and loſt their names: others in time were ſo old, that they fell down; and albeit their name remain, yet the place where they ſtood is not known. Some again were made new, and took either new names, or elſe kept their old: others changed the place, and held their old name: and finally, there were ſome that had two names; and others more. And theſe in manner were all the names of the gates:

Flumentana, or Flaminia.
Numentana, or Viminalis.
Eſquilina, or Taurina.
Capena, or Appia.
Tergemina, or Hoſtienſis.
Ratumena, or Vientana.
Quirinalis, Agonenſis, or Collina.
Janualis, or Sabiuſa, leading into the Sabins country.
Nævia, or Labicana.
Cœlimontana, or Aſinaria.
Portuenſis, or Navalis.
Triumphalis, or Vaticana.

Carmentalis, Magonia, Pandana, Querquetulana, Raduſcula, Saginalis, Saucualis, Collatina, Interaggeres, Tiburtina, Gabinſa, Latina, Aurelia, Catularia, Laurentia, Fontinalis, Lavernalis, Ferentina, Minutina, Saluta-is, Mutia, Piacularis, Preneſtina, Libitinenſis, Valeria, and Tarpeia.

Flumentana took name of the rivet Tyberis; for it ſtood at the firſt upon the bank of that river, not far from the bridg of Xyſtus, in the end of the Broad ſtreet, and at the head of the way or ſtreet Flaminia: but afterwards, tranſlated it was to the place where now it ſtandeth. In time following, it was called Flaminia, of the cauſey of Flaminius: at this day it is named, The peoples gate, and is ſituate in the hill Hortulorum.

Collatina bare the name of Collatia, a town not far from Rome: now it is Pinciana, of one Pincius a Senator, whoſe name it keepeth. This alſo ſtandeth in the hill Hortulorum: between it and Flumentana is a mile ſpace.

Quirinalis took name of the Chappel of Quirinus: or becauſe in old time the way lay through it for them that went to the hill Quirinalis. It ſeemeth to be called Agonenſis, quaſi ἄγωνος, i.e. without a corner; afterwards, Collina: and at the laſt, Salaria; for that by it ſalt was carried into the City. This name it holdeth ſtill and ſtandeth 6 Stadia from Collatina.

Viminalis is from Quirinalis diſtant 5 Stadia; ſo named, as they ſay, of a wood of Oſiers, which (as it is ſuppoſed) ſometime grew thereby: or elſe, of a Chappell of Jup. Vimineus. This alſo men called Figulenſis, of the potters works made without it: but now they name it the gate of S. Agnes, and Numentana.

Interaggeres ſtandeth in the Plain Viminalis, between the gate Viminalis and Eſquilina: it had the denomination of Tarquinius his mures and banks, among which it was built.

Tiburtina ſtood between Eſquilina and Numentana, ſo as it was 12 Stadia diſtant from Eſquilina, upon the plain of Eſquiliæ in the very place where the conduit is of the Mary water.

Eſquilina took that name of the hill Eſquiliæ, the ſame in ancient time was called Taurina, of a bulls head there found: for many a day after was the ſaid bulls head ſeen painted in the inner front of the ſaid gate. At this day, S. Laurence gate.

Nævia drew the name of certain *groves or woods near adjoyning. In times paſt Labicana, and now Major. An arch there was ſo called and erected in the ſame place by the old Romans.

Cœlimontana, ſtanding from Nævia 8 Stadia, ſeemeth by affinity of name to be ſo called of the hill Cœlius, in the edge whereof it ſtandeth: and Aſinaria it was called, of the Aſſes which were wont to be ſent out to Naples, by that gate. At this time they call it S. Johns gate.

Gabinſa, built cloſe to the mount Cœlius, Southeaſt: which ſeemeth by all likelihood to take the name of the City Gabii, which it directly regardeth. It carried the name alſo Metrodium, of meaſuring and is ſituat from Cœlimontana, as it were 5 Stadia.

Latina is 5 Stadia likewiſe from Gabinſa, ſeated not far from the Church of S. John Baptiſt: ſo called, for that men go forth of it into Latium.

Capena is ſo named of the Capenats, a Latine nation, againſt which it lyeth. This alſo is called ſtill Camœna, of a grove and Chappel of the Muſes, built juſt before the ſame gate. Appia likewiſe, of the high-way Appia; which Appius the Cenſor paved, and ſo it bare his name. They call it alſo also Triumphalis, for that in triumph the pomp is that way carried with ſtate. Of ſome it is named Fontinalis, for the plenty of ſprings there. At this day S. Sebaſtians gate.

Tergemina took that name of an old gate ſo called, at which the 3 twins Horatii went forth againſt their enemies, and gave the firſt name to it. Some ſhew remaineth yet of this gate to be ſeen, neer the Saliga.

Hoſtienſis, was in ancient daies ſo called, for that it led to the City Hoſtia: now S. Pauls gate: ſituate it is from Capena wel-neer 8 Stadia.

Portuenſis is a gate beyond the Tyber, within half a Stadium of the ſaid river; ſo called, for that it leadeth to the haven of Hoſtia. Now a-daies men call it, Porta ripæ, i. The bank gate.

Aurelia, looketh toward Janiculum; diſtant from the former almoſt 7 Stadia. In this age they call it S. Pancrace gate.

Aalia, was built by Ælius Hadrianus, of whom it took that name.

Septimiana, bare ſhe name of Septimius the Emperor: and becauſe it ſtandeth under Janiculum, is at this day called, Subtus Janum. Some affirm, that this is Fontinalis, becauſe out of the mount called Aureus, there iſſue fountains: for to the ſaid hill this gate ſtandeth cloſe. From it to Aurelia are 5 Stadia; and to the river Tyber 7 jugera or acres.

Thus much for the gates of the City of Rome, and their names.

The wall in old time had upon it 360 turrets. Some of theſe are decaied and gone; others repaired, and many this long time are ready to fall.

NOw is it time, and the courſe of the Story doth require, that leaving the towrs and walls, we enter into the City, and ſhew the beginning and the place of thoſe edifices, which within the walls, either upon the hills or the plain plot of the City, were built by men in old time. Firſt therefore, begin we will at the worthieſt earthly habitation of all their Gods, to wit, the Capitol.

The ſundry names of the Capitol.

THe Capitol was by the old Romans called Mount Saturnius, either of a City named Saturnia, which under the very hill was built in that place where now Rome ſtandeth: or becauſe Saturn in times paſt dwelt in that hill: or elſe (as ſome think) for that the mount it ſelf had Saturn for the tutelar God and Protector therof. But afterwards it was named the mount Tarpeius, of the Virgin Tarpeia, of whom Livy writeth. Laſt of all, Tarquinius Priſcus going in hand to build upon that hill a temple to Jupiter, when he digged for to lay the foundation, chanced to find in the bottom of the trench a mans head; whereupon they called it Capitolium. And the Auguſts being ſought unto and demanded, What the finding of that head might ſignify? anſwered, That this Caſtle ſhould be the See of the empire and the head of the whole world. This hill they divide into the Caſtle and the Capitol. The Caſtle they built Northward, as a ſtronger and more fortified place: but the Capitol, toward Tyberis, a place naturally defended.

CHAP. II.

Who firſt laid the foundation of the Capitol: who finiſhed it: how often it was burnt, and by whom reedified.

IN the Sabine war, Tarquinius Priſcus vowed to build the Capitol temple: but after the war was ended, ſo ſoon as he had laid the ground-work, he died. After him, Tarquinius Superbus finiſhed the building, of 4 ſquare ſtone: and defraied the charges thereof out of the pillage of Pometia, a Towu that he won. When he for his tyranny was baniſhed Rome, Horatius Pulvillus the Conſul, dedicated the ſaid Capitol to Jupiter. It ſtood upright and ſound for the ſpace of 415 years, until the Marian wars, and then (in the Conſulſhip of Scipio and Narbo) it was conſumed with fire. Sylla re-edified it, and Q. Catulus conſecrated it: and ſo it continued until the Vitellian war. During which troubles, it was a ſecond time burnt, at what time it ſtood with the dores ſhut, undefended, and not rifled. Veſpaſian built it again; and in his life, a third time it was deſtroied by fire: and together with the Capitol, Veſpaſian alſo himſelf died. Afterwards, Domitian rebuilded it in more magnificent and ſtately manner than it had been ever before, and diſburſed therein above 12000 talents. Of the Capitol turrets and pinacles, the ſtatues and images ſmitten with thunder-bolts and blaſted oftentimes with lightning, divers writers have made mention.

CHAP. III.

The Temple of Jup. Feretrius, of Jup. Opt. Max. of Juno, and Minerva's.

THe Capitol, Cicero calleth The houſe and habitation of the gods, becauſe it contained the chappels, ſtatues, and images in manner of all the gods: but the firſt of all other in Rome was that of Jupiter Feretrius, vowed by Romulus in the war againſt the Cenenians. After which war ended, and he returned to Rome with victory, he reared a temple in the very pitch and top of the capitol hill. But Jupiter was by Romulus named Feretrius, as ſome would have it; for that Jupiter aſſiſted him in ſtriking the enemy, in thar very place where he vowed the temple. Or elſe, becauſe the Romans uſed in making of peace, to ſwear by his ſcepter and the flint. The roof of this Church faln down for very age and through neglect of the Romans, Auguſtus repaired. This temple firſt built by Romulus, was afterwards enlarged by Ancus Martius.

But the temple of Iup. Opt. Max. of all other was the greateſt and moſt renowned. This alſo was called Capitolinum; and Tarq. Priſcus vowed it. After him, Tarq. Superbus expended in the foundation thereof 40000 pound weight of ſilver: but before that he finiſhed it, he was deprived of his Kingdom for his tyranny, and left the work unperfect, to be accompliſhed by the Romans. Built it was upon the hanging of the Capitoline hill toward Tyberis, as hath been ſhewed before. For the form, the greatneſs and beauty of this temple, read Dionyſius and ſundry other authors, who have written of the Roman acts and of Rome it ſelf. Upon the top or lantern thereof, ſtood Summanus the God, made of potters earth, whoſe head was ſmitten with lightning and fell into Tyberis. It had within it beſides, a ſanctuary or ſecret chappel, which no Lay perſon might enter into. Within the ſaid cell or chappel, were two coronets of gold: the one of them, the Gauls conſecrated to Iup. Opt. Maximus: the other, the Carthaginians ſent to Rome in the honor of Iupiter, in token of joy for their victory over the Samnits. Morever, in the ſaid temple were other three chappels, to wit, one of Iup. Opt. Max. in the midſt; a ſecond of Minerva on the right hand: and a third of Iuno on the left. And becauſe men in old time attributed unto Minerva the invention of numbers, a law was ſet down in writing, That the chief and higheſt Pretor for the time being, ſhould drive a ſpike or great nail neer unto her image, whereby the computation of the years might be known. This ſo rich and coſtly edifice, was burnt all at once in the Vitellian war. Now at this day the place wheras it ſtood, is prophane: howbeit there remain yet to be ſeen, ſome tokens thereof, and the foundations; but all deformed and broken peecemeal.

CHAP. IV.

The Temples of Saturn, Jupiter Tonans, Jupiter Cuſtos, of Fortune, of Vejovis Mercy. Juno Moneta, and of Janus. The ſepulchre of Oreſtes, the common Treaſury, the houſe of Manlius, and chappel of Carmenta.

SInce that we have deſcribed the temple of Iupiter K. of the Gods, in what place it was ſituat, and by whom built; meet it is to make report alſo of other gods in order, who had their houſes in the capitol: and firſt of Saturn, Iupiters father.

Saturn in old time had an altar erected unto him in the very way as ye go out of the Forum up to the capitol, as ſome think. There be, that would have this temple or altar of Saturn, built by the companions of Hercules: others again ſay, that Tatius reared it. But of this variety in opinion of Writers, this may be the reaſon, becauſe ſome affirm, that there were two temples conſecrated to Saturn, but reared in divers places and at ſeveral times: one at the rock of Carmenta, even before the capitoline cliff (wherein the bones alſo of Oreſtes brought from Aricia were beſtowed:) the other in that very place, where now ſtandeth the chappel of S. Saviour: where yet at this day there is a turret to be ſeen, which they call, the Tower in Ærarium: for there firſt was the common treaſure houſe of Rome. In the temple of Saturn, dedicated by Catulus Luctatius, there ſtood Ianus with four faces: ſignifying the four times of the year: of whom the firſt month Ianuary took name.

The temple of Iupiter Tonans Auguſtus Cæſar firſt built, on the capitoline cliff or ſide of the hill, South-eaſt; upon this occaſion: It hapned, that in the Cantabrian expedition, as he was carried by night in a litter, the lightning ſlightly glanced thereupon, and killed the ſervant that was the guide; and therefore he both vowed this temple, and alſo finiſhed it to the honor of Thundring-Iupiter. A temple alſo to Fortune was built not far from it.

The temple of Vejovis, ſtood between the caſtle and the capitol, in that part where now the chappels are to be ſeen of conſervators. In old time they called this Idol-devil, Vejovis, becauſe he was deprived of all power to help and do good. To him they ſacrificed a ſhe goat: becauſe he held arrows in his hand, moſt men thought he was Apollo.

Aſylum, that is to ſay, the temple of Mercy ſtood likewiſe upon the capitol hill, neer a ſhadowy grove, in the very valley amid the capitol, and the caſtle. Called it is the temple Intermontium, between two oke rows. This, Romulus erected; that what offender ſoever thither fled, he ſhould be priviledged as in a ſanctuary. But Tyberius afterwards, ſuppoſing that this place miniſtred occaſion of miſchief, deprived it of that liberty. This Aſylum, by report, the poſterity of Hercules firſt erected.

The temple (as alſo the mint-houſe) of Iuno Moneta, was built upon that plot of ground, where ſomtime ſtood the houſe of M. Manlius. This chappel, ſome report that L. Furius vowed; others, that L. Cicereius the Pretor; and Ovid, that Camillus. Now was Iuno called Moneta, of giving warning; for that from the very place where afterwards the temple was ſet, there was a voice heard of Iuno, admoniſhing them of the future overthrow by the Senones. In this place now ſtandeth a Senators houſe of Rome.

The

The temple of Janus keeper of the Capitoline caſtle, ſtood in that place, whereat that day is the goal and priſon for malefactors and ſellons, toward the Southweſt, over-gainſt the Forum Romanum. This Janus upon the Capitol, Romulus and Tatius deviſed to have two faces preſenting therby the two nations. Others would have him to be pourtraied 2 faced, for his cunning and providence: for he was the firſt that invented the roiall crown; alſo boats; the skill of navigation; braſen coin and many other things. Janus took that name ab eundo, of going, for that he turneth about the heaven and all things elſe. For which cauſe he alſo named Vertumnus: In old time they beleeved there was but one Janus; but poſterity in later age, have imagined more.

The temple of Jupiter Cuſtos, Domitian (after he was inveſted in the empire) built: and placed his own image in the lap and boſome of that god. It ſtood where at this day the Salara or ſaltpits are, neer to the temple of Janus.

CHAP. V.

The temple of gods which have no certain place now in the Capitol.

AMong thoſe gods, whoſe determinat place aſsigned to them in the Capitol, is not known where it was, the firſt was Terminus, as to whom in all the world throughout, there is no proper place appointed. Now this Terminus was a rude and formleſs ſtone. Unto him Tatius firſt vowed a temple: and ſome ſay, that Numa dedicated it. How ever it be; no doubt verily ancient it was, as eaſily may be collected by that which followeth. But why, that in the Capitol was of men in old time reputed for a god, this was the cauſe: when Tarquinius Superbus determined to build a temple to Jupiter, he conſulted with the Augurs about the place, becauſe he would begin nothing without the approbation of the birds. They ſhewed unto him the mount Tapeius, but this place was already taken up with other gods, whoſe chappels there, were conſecrated and hallowed. Theſe therefore were by certain ſacrifices to be conjured out from thence, for to give way to Jupiter. and to be tranſlated into ſome other quarter. All the gods willingly yeelded their places up to Jupiter as their K. only Terminus refuſed to be diſplaced; and ſo remained there ſtil. When he had finiſhed the temple and fore-part of the roof which regardeth the ſaid ſtone, was left naked and open for that god, as who neither ought nor could be encloſed. the augures therfore being ſought unto and demanded, For what reaſon Terminus alone abode ſtill with Jupiter; when all the other gods were gone? made anſwer, that thereby ſignified, that together with religion, their empire alſo was eternall. To this god they ſacrificed not but in open air and publickly abroad, as being the god and keeper of bounds. Saint Auguſtine witneſseth, that Mars alſo and Juventus together with Terminus would not agree to give place to Jupiter: for that the dominion of Rome ſhould not be bounded out, nor yet decay with age and continuance of time.

To Mars and Venus Ericina, Attilus and Q. Fab. Max. being Dnumvirs, dedicated chappels upon the Capitol, ſevered aſunder by one vault or ciſtern.

To queen Juno, C. Flaminius in the Ligurian war, vowed a temple.

To Ops, Tatius the K. conſecrated a temple; for that ſhe is called the earth, and is the mother of all things, as bringing forth all, and receiving all again. The ſame Ops is called Maia, Fauna, and Bona Dea. This temple was blaſted with fire from heaven, as Livy teſtifieth.

Mars revenger, Auguſtus Ceſar erected a temple upon the Capitol, within the hill Saturnius.

To Faith, on the ſame hill, Attilius Collatinus dedicated another.

To Health, Concord, Liberty, and Victory, they built temples: and many there were within the city erected to Concord.

To Fortuna Primigenia and Obſequence, Tullus dedicated a temple.

To Venus-bald they alſo ſet up a temple in the Capitol, in memoriall and everl ſting praiſe of the Roman dames, for willingly parting with the hair from their heads, toward the making of engins, that during the Gauls war, were deviſed and made againſt the enemies.

Tarquinius Superbus built a temple to Jupiter Sponſor, and Sp. Poſthumius dedicated it. Likewiſe to Jupiter * Piſter the old Romans conſecrated a temple in the Capitol.

CHAP. VI.

Of the ſtatues which either in old time were or now remain in the Capitol.

OF ſtatues in old time were ſundry ſorts, and the ſame made of divers matter: ſome of marble, ſome of braſſe, ſome of ſilver, and others of gold. Many of theſe were ſet up in the capitol to the immortal gods for divers cauſes, and namely, for their benefits beſtowed upon mankind; which a long time were honoured and worſhipped. To noble men likewiſe and ſuch as had deſerved well of the common-weal, the uſuall maner was in old time to ſet up ſtatues and images in the temples, to provoke others by their example to do the like.

To Jupiter in the Capitol, Sp. Carvilius erected a ſtatue in his temple, after he had vanquiſhed the Samnits, taking the proportion or form thereof by the pattern of Jupiter Latiarius his image. Floras maketh mention, that this ſtatue was ſmitten with lightning. He alſo ſet up another to thundring Jupiter.

The old Romans ſet up in the temple of Jup. Opt. Max. ſtatues to Victory and Faith, to either of them one.

For Nemesis also was an image erected in the Capitol, for that this goddesse punished proud and faithlesse persons. She is named also Rhamnusia of Rhamnus a village in Attica, where she was worshipped: & Adraste, of Adrastus, who was the first that built a temple in the honor of her.

Unto Hercules, for his notable and famous acts, they erected many statues in the Capitol: and namely, Pub. Sulpitius and Pub. Sempronius one; and Q. Fabius Max. another, which he brought from the Tarentins by him subdued.

The images of good Event, and good fortune (the workmanship both of Praxiteles) were within the Capitol.

The image of Apollo with a diadem, and his Colossus thirty cubits high, in the making whereof were bestowed 140 talents, Lucullus translated out of Apollonia in Pontus, into the Capitol.

An image there was of Janus likewise in the Capitol, holding in his right hand the number of 300 and in his left of sixty five, to signifie the daies of the yeer.

Two golden statues of Castor and Pollux, were by the Emperor Claudius of famous memory, dedicated in the temple of Jupiter.

The counterfeits resembling the rivers, Nilus and Tygris, half naked, were set up in the forefront of the temple of Conversators: the one cary upon the shoulders, Sphynx: the other a Tygre; two wild beasts: both of them hold in their right hand Cornucopia, which signifieth plenty.

The personage of Hercules pourtraied naked, of brasse and double guilt, without beard, holding in his right hand a club, and in the left the golden Apples of Hesperides, was found neer the Greek school and the beast market, in the ruins of Ara Maxima.

There be certain portraitures also of the Parthian and Dacian triumphs, enclosed within wals which were taken out of the church now called S. Martina.

CHAP. VII.

Statues of famous and noble men set up in the Capitol.

TO Scipio they erected in the Capitol, a statue * wearing a souldiers cassock and slippers or pantoses in regard of his victory over Antiochus, for an everlasting memorial of his worthy deeds.

To Sylla there was also a statue erected in the Capitol, in habit of a footman.

For Æmylius Lepidus, when he was but a boy, the people of Rome set up a statue, because he had in a battel vanquished the enemie, and saved a Citizen.

The like honour to the rest they did to Metellus, for that he had preserved out of the temple of Vesta, being on fire, the image of Pallas.

They erected an image to Cornelia the mother of the Gracchi, in recompence of a benefit of hers for that in a great dearth of corn, she served the people at 3 farthings a Modius. The same they did to Trebius the Ædile.

Fabius Maximus made for himself a cast or molten image, and erected it just by that of Hercules.

Unto Brutus, for delivering Rome from the tyranny of Tarquinius, the Romans erected his image in the midst of the KK. statues.

Domitian would not suffer any image of his to be erected, unlesse it were of molten silver or gold, and of a certain weight.

The emperor Commodus took off the head from the coloss of Nero, & set upon it his own statue which he had in the Capitol. This Colossus is to be seen broken as it was, in the houses of Conservatores.

In the said houses of Conservatores, is extant yet the brasen portraiture of a she-wolf, at whose teats, Romulus and Remus, the first founders of Rome, are to be seen how they hang sucking.

The image of Romulus and Remus remained in the Capitol, resembling two youths; the one, standing upon the feet in servil habit and attire: the other sitting like a shepheard or heardman, bending forwards with the body, plucking a thorn out of the sole of his foot, which rankled and festered withall.

An infinit number of statues were in the Capitol, of gods especially, brought from other parts to Rome. For the Romans robbed the churches of forrein nations, for to enrich and adorn their own.

* Cum Chlamyde & crepundiis. but for [crepundiis] read [crepidis] out of Cicero pro Rabirio: signifying the Greekish and Asian habit: for the Roman statues were Togatæ.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Capitol cliff, Tarpeia rock, the stone of Carmenta, and the gate Stercoraria.

IN old time, they called that place and way whereby men go up to the Capitol, Clivus Capitolinus: but where that place was in times past, sundry opinions there be. Some affirm, that it lay toward that part of the hill which looketh to the Aventine, where now standeth S. Gregories Church in Velabrum: others between the temples of Saturnus and Concordia, neer to the arch of Severus, and at the staïs and standings, called Senatoris Stabula. Now the arch of Severus was raised at the foot of the Capitol hill, in the very head and top of Forum Romanum: under which they passed, that in triumph ascended up into the Capitol. The Capitol cliff then, was neer unto the Roman Forum: which by the Censors was paved with flint: who also set up a gallerie from the Chappell of Saturn unto the Capitol Temple close to the

Sanaculum

Scalarum and the Curia over it. Corn. Tacitus writeth, that in former times there were many avenues and waies upon the Capitol, and thereupon arose so many and divers opinions concerning the Clivus Capitolinus. In the place of the feast Floralia was in old time celebrated, wherof some tokens remain at this day to be seen. In it stood Milos house, which was full of shields and other armor, Cicero maketh report.

That place was called Tarpey rock which standeth over the Forum Romanum: from whence in times past tellonious malefactors found guilty, were pitched down head-long, and wherein at this day offenders are punished.

Carmenta stone, regardeth Tyberis, just over-against the Senators bridg.

The Dung-gate called Stercoraria, stood upon the Capitol cliff aforesaid; thither was thrown out all the filth rid out of the temple of Vesta, for to be caried away and soon after to be cast into the Tyberis.

CHAP. IX.

Of tables, of the brasen columns or pillars, and of the silver Goose.

IN the Capitol there were two sorts of tables; the one of Pictures containing the noble acts or battels, with the siege and assault of Cities, exploited by valiant martial men. For some of them were so desirous of praise and renown, that they could not be content to behold their own statues erected in the Capitol, unlesse their acts were described also and depainted in tables set up in publick place; and by that means left their glory behind them, commended likewise to posterity. Another kind there was of tables, wherein were written in the most ancient laws, to wit, of Romulus, Numa, and the other KK. Likewise the statues of the later lawgivers: the publick acts and ordinances; the leagues and covenants with other nations; the sacred rites and divine service, and the ancient records and monuments, which were engraven and cut in brasen tables: of which, some at this day are extant; others by continuance of time, by war, fire, and careless negligence are lost and perished. For the keeping of these, there were certain persons appointed, that in so serious and important matters, there should be no forgery and corruption.

Pillars likewise of brasse, were by Domitian set up in the Capitol; the which, Augustus the conqueror of Ægypt, caused (of many brasen beak heads of ships molten together) to be made into four huge columns, and brought them to Rome. Sylla likewise took out of Iupiters temple in Athens, certain brasen pillars, brought them to Rome, & there consecrated them to Iupiter in the Capitol.

The Portraiture of a goose in silver, was set up within the Castle by the Romans for perpetuall memory, because a goose by gagging gave warning of the enemies coming, to the warders of the castle and therby saved the Capitol. For which cause geese a long time after, were fed & kept in Rome at the Cities charges. There are besides, many other antiquities within the Capitol, cut in tables of brasse and marble both, and namely, Epitaphs, which here for brevities sake are left out.

CHAP. X

Of certain edifices and buildings upon the Capitol hill, and of other things in general.

NOw that we have made declaration of the statues, tables, and columns, worth the noting: something by the way would be said in the place, as touching the ancient houses there.

The court called Calabra Curia, Romulus built the Capitol, and covered it with reed. Into this place the King-sacrificer was wont to assemble the Senat and people of Rome, that from him they might learn and know the daies of solemn game, plaies, and sacrifices.

Not far from the said Curia, was the cottage of Romulus.

And almost the same place stood the stately porch or gallery of Metellus and Constantinus. The Library also called Majorum, built artificially upon marbles pillar: and besides the publick court-yard.

There was an hallowed place likewise upon the Capitol from whence they gathered Verbena, or sacred herbs, to make garlands for the fæcials heralds and the Paterbatratus: wherewith they were crowned when they purposed either to make any accord and peace, or to proclaim war.

The flint stone also was here found, which they held in their hand when they sware by Jupiter, pronouncing these words, If I made default with my knowledg, then let Diespiter cast me out of all that I have (saving the City and the castle) as I hurl from me this stone.

The Capitol had certain vaults like cisterns, into which were thrown all things over-worn, or so old that they were good for nothing. The six steeds drawing in one team, were there to be seen, which Cneus Cornelius set up, the twelve gilded shields likewise, made of that mony wherin the Ædils condemned and fined the corn-mongers that hoorded and kept in their corn. The shield also * Martius, set out with the image of Asdrubal; and the column garnished with ship beak-heads of brasse, whereof Livy speaketh, were here to be seen. Within the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus there was a short cloak or mantle and purpole wollen, to which, of other purple garments were laid, they shewed the colour of ashes in regard of the excellent bright gloss and lustre that it caried. A present this was (by report) given to Aurelianus by a Persian K. who had it from the furthest Indians. The lintell, cheeks and sill of the Capitol dore, were made all of brass. The brasen tiles likewise upon the roof, Q. Catulus gilded over: the place where Numa took his auguries was on the Capitol; but Tatius used rather the castle cliff: where also stood sometime the house of Manlius, but afterward, therupon was built the chappel of Juno Moneta. The books also of Sibylla were kept in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, by ten Wardens in a stone coffer under the ground. Over & besides so many edifices were there, so beautiful was the Capitol, and the riches thereof so great, so many goodly ornaments and shrines of the gods most artificially wrought, that right worthily of men in old time, it was called the earthly habitation of the gods & Jupiter himself. For during the upright and flourishing state of Rome; so curiously built and richly beautified it was: that as heaven surpasseth the earth, so far this edifice went beyond all other works and wonders whatsoever of the world; insomuch as it seemed to have been built by the gods: so far surmounted it all the device and reach of mans wit. But as excellent as these things sometimes were, now at this day they are to be seen, all naked, forlorn, and desolate.

CAHP. XI

The Temple of Concord, and Jupiter Stator: moreover what the Curia is.

BEtween the Capitol hill and mount Palatine, there lyeth a valley, whereof we have spoken before. The Temples and buildings wherof, as also the places behind the Capitol, by order and course we are now to describe. In this valley therefore the temple of Concord deserved to be visited first: which word, being derived (as it were) from the unity and agreement of heart, maintaineth, augmenteth, and preserveth alone, all things in the world whatsoever.

A temple to this Concord, Camillus vowed, in case he could reconcile the Commons to the Nobles. When as therfore the people were brought into grace and favour again with the Nobility, he built the church of Concord, beginning above the Comitium and so forward unto the Forum. The porches belonging to this temple, are yet to be seen at the foot of the Capitol. From it, there was an ascent of an 100 steps up to the chappel of Juno Moneta. That temple of Concord, faln in long time to decay, was afterwards by the Senat reedified. Therein many a time the Senat met and sat in counsell, and orations were made unto the people. In this also there was a vault or shroud under the ground, wherein oftentimes theeves, armed men, cutters and hacksters were kept as in a prison, untill the assemblies of the people were dismissed. This house had many statues and images curiously and cunningly wrought, namely, of Juno, Apollo, and of Latona, bearing and holding her two babes Apollo and Diana. Likewise of Æsculapius and * Hygia, the handy-work of Niceratus. Also of Jupiter, Ceres, and Minerva: likewise of the Dames weeping and adoring the said images all made of Stones. Moreover, the images of Mars and Mercurie; the workmanship of Piscrates. Also of Marsyas-bound, made by Zeuxis the painter. Likewise father Liber and Cassandra, painted by Theodorus. As for the image of Victory in the porch and entrance of the said temple, it is to be seen how it was smitten with a thunderbolt.

* i Health.

To Jupiter Stator, Romulus in the Sabine war vowed a temple, that he might stay the flight of the Romans: whereupon he was called, the upholder of the Roman state. Therefore after victory obtained, he built a temple at the foot of the Palatine hill, just over-against the church of Concordia, where at this day be most high battlements of wals. In this house also, like as in that other of Concord, the Senat assembled oft. Likewise in other temples. The courts, wherein the Senat gathered together in Councel, were temples all, and therein were there acts made: but in the sacred churches of the gods, neither met the Senat, nor any orations were made to the people. This temple of Stator was burnt to the ground in that fire of Nerons making, and never after reedified.

CHAP. XII.

The temple and grove of Vesta: the temple of Faith and of Romulus.

THe temple of Vesta was built by Romulus, between the Capitol and the Palatine hils, not far from the Forum Romanum; where at this day is to be seen, the church of S. Mary of graces. Neer unto it the palace of Numa was built. The Roman Pontifies, when they would consult of great matters concerning religion, met in the court-yard of Vesta; like as the Senat and people of Rome, debated in councel of their weightiest affairs within the temple of Faith. Now this was a most ancient temple built in Palatium by Romulus, or, as some will have it, by Numa.

There was a grove also consecrated to Vesta, which reached from the root of the Palatine, as far as to the large street called Nova via. Out of that grove (before Rome was taken by the Gauls) a voice was heard, giving warning, that the City should be lost, unlesse the wals and gates were repaired.

The temple of Romulus was seated at the foot of mount Palatine, in the midst of that side which regardeth the Capitol, in that very place were now the church is of S. Theodore. In this said temple there is a most ancient monument, the portraiture of the she wolf, yeelding her teats unto the founders of the City, to be sucked.

CHAP. XIII.

Lupercal, and the figtree Ruminalis.

THe Lupercal was a cave at the bottom of the Palatine hill, overspread and covered with trees having springs deep beneath under the rock. In the most inward and secret place of this cave there there was an altar consecrated to Pan. But as touching the etymology and derivation of the name, as also of the situation thereof, there go divers opinions; for as in times past the place was close hidden and unfrequented, so now it is inhabited on every side; insomuch as there remaineth no mark and token at all where Lupercal was. Howbeit the greater part of writers affirm, that it was in that quarter of the City, where at this day S. Theodors church is seen. For to this place upon a time the Tybre overflowing, made a creeke thither: and hard by it was, where the two infants were cast forth. In the Lupercal therefore, certain authors confidently avouch, that Romulus and Remus were laid to perish, and so carried by water to the place called afterwards Ruminalis, were under a fig-tree there, nourished by a she wolf. This wolf haunted & kept in the den called Lupercal, & from thence ran to the bank side under the fig-tree Ruminalis for to the suckle the said babes, and so gave the name unto the cave to be called Lupercal, as it were the lurking hole and den of the wolf. There be again that would have Evander to give the name to the same hollow cave: for he, as is before declared, was descended from Arcadia, where the people after most ancient rites and ceremonies, do right devoutly worship Pan, the god of herdmen. Vnto whom also a mountain in Arcadia to him dedicated, was called Lycæus, for that he keepeth, λυκὰς, i wolves from the sheep, and preserveth the flocks and herds. This Evander therefore coming upon a time into Italy, and resting in these parts, consecrated both this grove and cave to Pan, and according to the manner of his countrey, there honoured him. In the said cave therefore reared was an altar, and a goat thereupon sacrificed unto him, as to the god and preserver of the flocks: and seeing that he chased wolves from them, therfore the place wherein he was worshipped took the name* Lupercal.

* Quasi lupis arcens.

Now the feast Lupercalia was by Romulus and Remus instituted. For they having obtained of Numitor a plot of ground to build them a City on, in that very place where they had been set forth, called all their companions to a feast and merry meeting: where, after they had killed sacrifices, and refreshed themselves with meat, and withall taken their wine liberally to the full, they grew to disport, and in the merry fit clad themselves in the skins of the goats which they had sacrificed, and then fell to hopping and dancing full jocundly. Hereupon their posterity, celebrating the memoriall thereof, held a festivall solemnity called Lupercalia, which retained the name of the place where first they began. Hereof see more in Valerius Maximus, Servius & Plutarch in the life of Antonius. As for the fig-tree Ruminalis, it was so named of the river Tyber, called at the Rumon. Some would have it take the name of Romulus. Others of the milk given to the said infants, for that part of the throat which draweth milk ir called Ruma in Latines. This place was over against the house of the two lords Cosmus and Damianus, on the side of the mount Palatine, opposit against the shew-place, called Circus Maximus. Romulus and Remus thus laid forth about Lupercal, and caried by the water to this place, were fostered for a while under the figtree Ruminalis, in the place where the Comitium after was. The tokens of this tree remaineth unto the time of Augustus Cæsar, as Ovid testifieth.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of the new way, the streets Jugarius and Tuscus.

THe street called the new way over against the temple of Jupiter Stator goeth along the valley between the Capitol hill and the Palatine, and reacheth to the Forum Romanum. This, howsoever it be called new, was well known to be most ancient, and is different from that, which Caracalla repaired under his bains.

The street Jugarius, otherwise called Thurarius, leadeth from the gate Carmentalis, along the foot of the Capitol hil, to the Forum Romanum. In it was the altar of Juno Juga, who was thought to make marriages, and to couple folk in matrimonies, and she it was that gave the name to Vicus Jugarius.

Vicus Thuscus beginneth at the Forum, and along the foot of the Palatine sheweth the way to Velabrum. The reason of the name was this. The Tuscans upon a time fighting against the Aricians, were by them overcome; and after many thousands of them slain in battel, the rest being few in number fled to Rome: who taking delight in the pleasant seat of the City, & the commodiousnes of the place, determined there to remain. Whereupon having a plot of four stadia granted them by the Senat, between the Capitol and Palatine, they inhabited the same. Herupon the street was called by them Thuscus Vicus, & many a 100 yeer after retained that name. In it afterwards there kept bawds and such kind of people, whereupon it grew out of credit, and lost also the first name.

CHAP. XV.

The Arches of Romulus, the Senaculum, and the dwelling house of Ovid.

THe old arches (which some think Romulus erected) continued a long time built of brick, neither would the Romans suffer that any man should make them of marble: to the end, that the memorial of their City founder, should remain more firmly in the minds of men. But in continuance of time long after, they decaied and fell down, in that very place where now is the church of Saint Mary of Grace, and were never afterwards reedified. The Romans named that place Senaculum, between the Capitol and the Forum, wherein the Senat kept a consistory for counsell and consuation.

That

That Ovids mansion house stood under the Capitol, himself witnesseth, even where as now the church is of S. Marry of Consolation.

Thus much of the buildings of the Capitol and the valley to it. Now followeth the mount Palatine.

The third Book.

CHAP. I.

The divers etymologies of Palatine.

ALbeit the hill Palatine were along time inhabited before the City was builr, and namely, first by Valentia the daughter of Italus; then by Evander, who also therein set up a castle: whom there succeeded after the City was founded, KK. and Emperors; insomuch as scarcely any one place of Rome is more renowned by writing, then this hil: yet the certain reason of the name why it should be so called, and which a man may be bold to follow, can hardly be set down. Some would have it so called, because the Arcadians wandring with Evander disorderly, and the Palatines out of the Rheatine territory (called likewise Palatium) came to that mount and it inhabited: others of Palas the great grandfather of Evander. Livy thought, that of Palanteum a City of Arcadia, it was first called Palantium, and afterward Palatine. There are besides, who of Palatia the wife of Latinus, fetch the original of the denomination: or of Palatho, the daughter of Hyperborens, who bare Latinus unto Hercules, and inhabited this mountain: or of Palantia the daughter of Evander, who there was buried: or of Palas, who was himself interred in it. Some there was also, of the bleating of sheep, which pastured there in times past, before the hill was by men frequented and peopled, imagine it was so named: or else because flocks were wont there palare, that is, to wander and grase up and down. And hereupon it is, that Navius called it Balantium, of Balatus; or Palantium of * palare. Tremellius calleth it the mount Romuleus, of Romulus his image, found at the very foot of the said hill. This may suffice of the derivation of the name.

* Baletus, ie. Bleating.

CHAP. II.

The temple of Victory, Ceres, Juno Sospita, and the mother of the gods: the temple of Liberty and the porch thereof, as also the house of Cassius.

NOw that we have declared the reason of the name of Palatium; we will go forward to shew the temples and houses of the mountain, like as we have done in the description of the Capitol hill.

When the Romans had performed fortunatly many martiall exploits, and oftentimes returned with victorie over their enemies, because they would not be found unthankfull to the gods, unto whom they were beholden for their happy atchievements, and thereby afterwards misse of the like fortunat successe: they consecrated unto the goddesse Victory a temple in that part of the Palatine, which looketh toward the hortyards and gardens of Maria Nova in the very bottom of the descent, hard at the gate Romana. L. Posthumius an Ædile Curule took order for the building thereof, out of certain mony raised by fines and penalties; and when it is finished, he dedicated it to the goddesse Victoria.

Neer thereto there was a chappel, consecrated to Victoria, which M. Porcius Cato vowed.

Besides in the same place was the temple of Juno Sospita.

The Arcadians, which with Evander came to the Palatine hill, built a temple also in Palatium to Victory, but as different from this above-named, as far more ancient and to the honor of that goddesse, solemnized yeerly sacrifices.

They built a temple also to Ceres in the Palatine.

In the fatall book of Sibylla there was a propheſie found, That the forrein enemy and strange born should be chased out of Italy, in case the mother of the gods might be brought to Rome from Pessinus. Now a stone it was, which the inhabitants of that countrey so called. Sent therefore were Embassadors into Asia as far as to Pessinus a town of Phrygia: who brought with them that Great mother of the gods in Italy. Then P. Cornelius caried it from the sea into the Palatine, and bestowed it into the temple of Victory, until such time as one was built of purpose for her. Afterwards M. Livius and C. Claudius the Censors, took order for a temple to be made to this great mother of the gods, & the same set out with statues, pillars and pavement of divers stones of great price. And Junius Brutus dedicated it. The plaies also and games called Megalesia, wherof Cicero speaketh, were first instituted at the dedication thereof.

Unto Liberty, P. Clodius built a temple and stately gallery, in part of Cassius his house, neer the temple of Jupiter Stator.

CHAP. III.

CHAP. III.

Of the Chappell and altar * Febris: the temple of Lares: the chappel of the goddesse Viriplaca, of Faith, and Jupiter Victor.

* The fever.

NOt to those gods only that did good to mankind the Romans consecrated temples, but dedicated chappels to those also that did them hurt; to the end, that they should do less harm, and punish them more gently. For certein it is, that on the hill Palatine there was a temple & altar both consecrated to the Fever: likewise to Nemesis the goddesse of vengeance; wherof before in the second book.

Besides, they erected a chappel of the Lares in the Palatine.

In like maner, there was a chappel in the Palatine, consecrated to the goddesse * Viriplaca; into which, if man and wife came together, although they disagreed and were falln out before, they returned home again good friends from thence, and all was well.

* Not much unlike, but somewhat a better saint, then S. Uncumbre of Paris.

After that Æneas with his son Ascanius and daughter Roma came into Italy, they reared a temple to Faith, in Palatine: they which was dedicated notwithstanding in the name of the daughter, and the same was written in the forefront of the temple: and therefore many yeers after, when Romulus and Remus strove who should give name to the City, the Senat and people of Rome reading the name of Æneas his daughter in the frontispice of the laid temple, resolved to name the City after her, Roma.

Q. Fabius in the Sabin war, vowed a temple to Jupiter conqueror: and afterwards built it on the Palatine hill, and there dedicated it.

CHAP. IIII.

The temples of Heliogabalus, Apollo and the Penates: the house of Orcus; the place of the Palladium or image of Minerva; and the temple of Augustus.

ANtonius Heliogobalus consecrated a god in the mount Palatine, which he called Heliogabalus, and built a temple in the place, where before stood that of Orcus or Pluto. But to win credit and name to this new and counterfeit god with great reverence and worship; he endeavoured to translate into this temple of his, * the sacred cup of that great mother of the gods, the fire of Vesta, the image of Minerva, called Palladium, the heaven, escutcheons, and all things else which the Rom. honoured above the rest. The Christian and Jewish religion also he there counterfeited, to the end, that no man in the religious worship of that temple and god might alledg any pretence why he should not with good conscience so do.

* Stephum or rather typhum, the figure.

Moreover, in the Palatine, there was built a most ancient temple of Apollo. This chanced to be overthrown by thunder and lightning; and when the soothsaiers gave out, that the god misled it & required another, Augustus Cæsar adjoined a porch to the ruins therof and reedified the temple a new that there stood: wherein himself, when he grew aged, many a time sat in councel with the Senat, and empanelled the decuries of judges. In it likewise were pendant candlesticks, branched with arms like trees, whereon the approved poets bestowed their writings. Certain marks and tokens of this temple are to be seen (although obscurely) neer to the vineyard of Fedra, where the house of Tiberius stood. Unto him were instituted the Apollinare games wherof read Cicero.

The temple of the City-protectors, called Penates, stood in that part of the Palatine which looketh into the North, even to Velia not far from the Forum. In it were the images of the Trojan gods. In the same are portraied two yong men sitting together, and holding a ball in their hand. In like maner, the crooked augurs staves called Litui, of iron and brasse. Besides, an earthen Trojan vessel of potters work. Apollo also and Neptune were there to be seen.

When the temple of Vesta was on a light burning fire, the image of Pallas being saved out thereof, was transl ted into Velia, and gave the name unto temple of Palaca, now S. Andrews church, standing in the same place.

Some report, that there was a temple built in Palatium to Augustus Cæsar of famous memory by his daughter Livia.

CHAP. V.

The Palatine houses, and the court of the Salii.

THat Romulus and Remus being shepherds abode some time in these parts, the sheds and cottages, which long time after were found here, made of slight wood & reed, do testifie: which as any of them in continuance of time decaied and fell down, the shepherds repaired with the like matter to their ancient form, that the perpetuall memorial of Romulus and Remus the City founders, what kind of persons they were, and what maner of houses they lived in, might be delivered to posterity. In that corner of the Palatine hill, which leadeth unto the grand cirque or shew-place, there stood (many ages) the cottage which they called Casa Romuli.

Tullus Hostilius, before he built his court dwelt upon Velia, in that very place were afterwards the chappel of the Penates stood.

Not far from thence, even in that part of the Palatine which regardeth the Forum, Catiline (by report) had his house built.

More-

Moreover, between M. Scaurus his house and Catilins, there was but a small step over. Cicero's house purchased of Crassus, was in the most frequent and conspicuous place of the mount Palatine, above the Church of Jup. Stator, neer the Palatium.

Pliny testifieth, how the houses of Crassus the Orator, and Viterbius, in the Palatium, were in old time overturned.

One Captain Varus likewise had an house in the Palatium.

Also Tiberius, whereof we have written in the former chapter.

Augustus (born in the region about Palatium, in a place called Capita bubula, i. the oxe heads; and where after his death, they erected a chappel unto him) dwelt first neer the Roman Forum, above the round stairs called Scalæ annulariæ, in the house sometime of Calvus the Orator. Afterwards he built the stately Palatine at his own charges and gave it to the City, and himself dwelt on the Patine hill in the small house of Hortensius.

The Guild, or religious court of the Salii, built in the mount Palatine, chanced to be burnt; and in the ashes thereof, the staff of Romulus called Lituus was found, without any hurt.

Publicola dwelt in an house standing over the Forum, which was called Subvelia.

That the dwelling house of Tarquinius Priscus was neer unto the Temple of Jup. Stator, may soon be proved out of Livy.

CHAP. VI.

Of the top of Velia; the statues in Palatine, and other things in general.

THe pitch of the hill called Summa Velia, was in that higher part of Palatium, which looketh into the South-east, whereas now is the Temple of Mary the new. Called Velia it was, because in old time before the device of shearing sheep the shepherds were there wont to pluck the wooll from the sheeps back.

Augustus set up a Library of Latine and Greek books in Palatine, and adorned it with the money raised of the most excellent brass of that huge colossus of Tuscan Apollo. He adjoyned thereto a porch or gallery, which they called Palatium.

In it was erected by the Senat, a statue unto Numerianus the Emperor, and a singular oratory. In the same porch the Romans also set up a statue unto M. Varro, whiles he lived.

The Augeratorium, which was a place where they used to take auguries, was upon mount Palatine. Apollo Palatinus likewise, the workmanship of Scopas, was in Palatium. Latona in the same was placed.

Titus the Emperor set up a golden statue in Palatine to Britannicus.

Moreover, the tree which grew out of Romulus his spear, was in the Palatium. For he, after he had taken his auguries in the mount Aventine, lanced his spear from him into the Palatine, which sticking in the earth, budded forth leaves and grew to be a tree.

Likewise the bay tree, which the same day that Augustus was born, sprung with him and suddainly appeared, was in Palatium. Of this laurel tree, they that afterwards triumphed, were wont to wear their wreathed garlands.

The Palatine bains, whereof Cicero maketh mention in his Oration for Roscius, were in the same Palatium: and of them there remain yet some tokens, above the Circus max. not far from the vineyard of Fedra.

In the same mountain also there was a place called Sicilia, and Jupiters parlor.

The most beautiful streets called Antoniaca, paved with Lacedæmonian and Porphyret stones, were in Palatium. The streets also of Padus, and Fortuna respiciens, were to be seen in Palatine. And there were the games and pastimes celebrated, which they call Palatual.

CHAP. VII.

The Palatium now called the Greater: the court-yard of the Palatium : and the old gate of the very Palatium it self.

HOw great a compass the Palatium took up in old time, how gorgeously it was built, how rich, how frequent and full of houses, the huge ruins, the pictures, statues, and most pretious pillars there found, do easily declare. For no man ever hath left in writing, who first built so great and stately edifices: who afterwards enlarged the same, and in so conspicuous a place erected those houses. By little & little it grew to so great an height, as if all writers should be ignorant of those antiquities: neither was any thing at one time done at once, which seemed worth the memorial. For Historiographers are wont to deliver unto posterity those things only which are rare and worthy of admiration. The mount Palatine at this day is called Palatium majus, and setting aside the Church of Saint Andrew, hath scarce two houses inhabited. The rest being either replenished with vines or fit for pasture, yeeldeth grass and food, for sheep, caples, and goats. So as it seemeth it may be called Balantium of the bleating that sheep make, rather than Palantium.

This Palatium had also a place therein called Atrium, built in old time and hallowed by Augury: in it the Senat sate in councel, because they might not assemble in any place unaugurate or unhallowed. Therein also rams were sacrificed.

The old gate of the Palatium was neer the Rostra, over-gainst S. Laurence Church in Miranda. Some would have this to be called the gate of Romulus, in old time.

CHAP. VIII.

The Temples of Janus, Auguſtus, and Fauſtina.

After the deſcription of the Temples and edifices of Palatium the third part of the city, now followeth a fourth: namely, the Roman Forum. Therein is the moſt ſtately Temple of Ianus, (for me thinks we do well to begin at Ianus, who is counted the dore and entrance as it were of all things) having four gates. For Ianus himſelf, who was therein worſhipped, had four faces: and from Faliſci a city in Tuſcany forced by the Romans, he was tranſlated to Rome into the Forum, named after Tranſitorium. His Temple was built in that part of the ſaid Forum which looked toward the Roman Forum. Procopius ſaith, that in his daies it was built in the mids of the Forum over-againſt the Capitol, a little above the place which the Romans called, The three Deſtinies. Other Temples there were beſides of Ianus, and namely, in the Capitol neer the theatre of Marcellus, with two fronts all of braſs, and had two braſen dores, which in time of peace were ſhut: and againſt war, were ſet open.

The temple of Auguſtus was builded in the Roman Forum. This was begun in the time of Tiberius the Emperor, but left unperfect. Caligula finiſhed it. Above it, he made a bridge which joyned the Capitol and Palatine together.

There remain yet to be ſeen certain monuments and marks of the temple of Fauſtina. Hadrianus the Emperor her husband founded it at the foot of the Palatine hill (where the braſen image of a bull ſtandeth) for her ſake that ſhe might be honoured as a goddeſs. The ſame his ſon Antonius Heliogabalus afterwards would have to be a temple for himſelf, or Iupiter Syrius, or elſe the Sun. At this day it is the church of S. Laurence in Miranda.

CHAP. IX.

The Temple of Caſtor and Pollux, and the Roſtra.

NO man doubteth but that the temple of Caſtor and Pollux was ſomtime in the Roman Forum before the Roſtra, neer to that aboveſaid of Fauſtina. This ſacred houſe A. Poſthumius the Dictator dedicated: and L. Metellus afterwards repaired and beautified it, with the Dalmatian ſpoils. In it, as in many other, the Senat uſed to ſit in councel, and therein were publick Orations made to the people. C. Metellus adorned the ſame with ſtatues, pillars, and excellent painting: wherein alſo he ſet up the portaiture and reſemblance of Flora, a picture of ſingular beauty. A table beſides, which contains the records and monuments touching the free burgeoſſie granted to the horſemen of Capua. The ſteps and greeces going up to this temple, Clodius afterwards plucked up as witneſſeth Cicero.

There was a temple or conſecrate place called Roſtra, at the foot of the hill Palatium, over-againſt that before-named of Caſtor and Pollux, whereas now is the little chappel of S. Mary de Inferno. From theſe Roſtra, were the ſentences and acts of the Senat, brought and propounded to the people.

CHAP. X.

The Temple of Cæſar, Venus Genitrix, and Mars revenger: and the court of Venus.

CÆſar of famous memory had a temple neer his own Forum, at the broad-ſtreet called Sacra, behind the temple of Fauſtina. In it were ſet up as Saints Victory and Caſtor.

In the ſame Cæſars Forum, there ſtood a chappel of Venus Genitrix, behind the ſaid temple of Fautina. This, Cæſar vowed in the Pharſalian war, and dedicated it. After victory in the war againſt Pompey, Cæſar encloſed the temple of the ſaid Venus, within a court-yard and a cloiſter, which Hadrian afterwards repaired and built new.

Auguſtus Cæſar in the battel of Philippi, vowed a temple to Mars the avenger, which afterwards he edified in his own Forum, wherein were certain iron pots dedicated to Mars: and two ſtatues, bearing up the tabernacle of Alexander the Great. This is thought to be at this day the church of Saint Martina.

CHAP. XI.

The Temples of Vulcan, Concord, Peace, Romulus, and Venus Cloacina.

THe temple of Vulcan, Romulus founded, above the Comitium and Forum Romanum, at the bottom of the Palatine hill: but Tatius dedicated the temple of Vulcan, as alſo of the Sun and Moon, of Saturn, Rhea, Veſta, Diana, and Quirinus. In the temple of Vulcan there was dedicated unto Vulcan, the braſen chariot of Romulus, wherein he rode in triumph a ſecond time. Therein remained alſo the ſtatue of Cocles there erected. Many a time were Orations made to the people in this time.

In the yard belonging to Vulcans temple, Fulvius, the ſon of a Libertine or enfranchiſed citizen, 303 years after the building of the capitol, vowed the temple of Concord, if he could reconcile the States of Senators and Gentlemen to the people. Afterwards he built it of the amercements and penalties that he took of Uſurers condemned, at the foot of the mount Palatine. Opimius the Conſul afterwards repaired it anew. In it, Pliny teſtifieth that an altar ran blood for two daies.

Conſul

Livia Druſilla in her open gallery, erected a chappel of Concord, in regard of the mutual and loving agreement between her husband and her: which afterwards Tiberius dedicated.

In that place where Druſilla firſt founded the ſaid chappel of Concord, Veſpaſian afterwards with wonderful celerity and ſpeed, (after the civil wars ended) finiſhed the Temple of Peace, begun before by Claudian. A large building this was and four ſquare, ſet out with moſt ſtately and fair columns, and of all other Temples the richeſt. In it Veſpaſian beſtowed the holy veſſels and pretious ornaments of the Temple in Hieruſalem, which T. had ſhewed in triumph. It had alſo the ſtatue of Ganymedes, and an infinite number of other ornaments wherewith it was decked and beautified. This Temple caught a fire, and at once ſuddainly was conſumed whole: and never was it known to this day how this fire came; unleſs it were (as ſome imagine) by reaſon of an earthquake which hapned the ſame hour, the ſtones rubbed together and ſtruck fire.

An altar of Peace was by Auguſtus firſt reared; but in what place, the poſterity knoweth not. The ſame, Agrippa afterwards enlarged and adorned. Between the Temple of Peace and Fauſtina, there is at this day a moſt ancient Temple, and two pillars of the porch to it, which now is dedicated to the two brethren Saint Coſmes and Damians. Some think it was the Temple of Romulus and Remus, the ſame that Carvilius the Conſul, after he had ſubdued the Samnits, dedicated, and of the infinit maſs of ſpoils adorned it.

That the Temple of Venus Cloacina ſtood neer the broad ſtreet Sacra, Ovid teſtifieth. Now the image of this Cloacina was found in a privy or draught, called Maxima, and Tatius conſecrated it. And becauſe it was not known whoſe reſemblance it was, it took the name of the place wherein it was found.

CHAP. XII.

The Temples of Tellus, Salus, Victoria, the Sun and Moon, the houſe of Caſſius, and the Armory.

WHere the Temple of Tellus ſtood, ſome ſay it is uncertain: others think it was not far from the Eſquiliæ, neer the riſing of the hill that leadeth to S. Peters Church in Vinculis, where as now ſtandeth the Temple of Pantaleon. Sempronius vowed it: for whiles he fought a battail with his enemy, at Aſculum the head Town of the Picentins, the earth quaked: and becauſe he would pacify the goddeſs Tellus (i. the earth) which he thought was angry, he vowed this Temple unto her. Built it was in the ſame plot of void ground, where the houſe of Spurius Caſſius (who ſought to be a King) was overthrown. Neer unto this Temple of Tellus, there was an Armory; where of Cicero alſo maketh mention in a certain place. Within the ſaid compaſs, C. Junius Bibaculus the Conſul, vowed a chappel to the goddeſs Salus, in the time of the Samnits war. The ſame was by him put forth to building when he was Cenſor, and dedicated by him Dictator.

L. Volumnius an Ædile, cauſed the Temple of Victoria neer the Roman Forum to be made, of the penalties and fines taken.

In this place alſo was the altar of Apollo.

Some would have, that the Temples of Concord and Æſculapius, were neer the Amphitheatre, in the place where the gardens be of S. Mary the new.

The Temple of Mercury alſo was in the Forum.

The Temples likewiſe of Iſis and Serapis were in the Burſſe called Emporium. And ſome think, that theſe were the Chappels of the Sun and Moon, dedicated by Tatius.

CHAP. XIII.

The Forum of Trajanus: the things now therein, or that have been heretofore.

THus much of Temples, of holy and religious places, which ſeemed worth the noting, hath been briefly written. Now from hence forward we will ſpeak of thoſe things, which ſhall concern the honour and memorial of mortal men, and firſt begin we will with that excellent Prince Trajanus.

Forum Trajani was built (with wonderful Art and induſtry of man) by Apollodorus, between the Forum of Nerva, the Capitol hill, and the mount Quirinal. The ſame workman built alſo (at the commandment of Trajanus) Metodeum and Gymnaſium. The roof of that Forum or Hall was of braſs, within round about in every place the forms and images of horſes, and militaryenſigns all guilt. Now were theſe foreſaid images erected there at the cities charges in memorial of them that had deſerved well of the common-weal, or otherwiſe of ſome notable act.

The triumphant arch in like manner with many other monuments reared to the praiſe of Trajanus, adorned this Forum or hall of his.

The porch of this Forum, built upon moſt mighty and high pillars, and reſting upon large chapiters, yeelded ſo great admiration to the beholders, that they ſeemed rather the works of gyants than men. Into this, Alexander Severus in the honor of Trajanus, tranſlated moſt beautiful ſtatues of ſingular men.

Trajans horſe in like manner ſtood in the mids, bearing upon high columns.

In a coin alſo there is found the image of Trajan, with this inſcription: S. P. Q. R. Optimo Prin-

Principi, The Senat and the people of Rome to the beſt Prince. But hereof Lampridius writeth much.

He likewiſe is reported to have adorned the palace, made of ſundry marbles, with pictures and ſtatues within.

In the midſt of the Forum, there ſtood the column of Trajan, built with winding ſtairs. This had round about it the ſummary of the acts of Trajan engraven and chaſed moſt cunningly; but above all the Dakes war: within there be 185 ſteps up to the top; and it hath 40 little windows to let in light unto them that ſhall go up: 120 foot high it was, or (as Eutropius writeth) 140. In the louver or lantern thereof were the bones of Trajan kept within a golden ball. This pillar Trajan himſelf never ſaw: for whiles he warred againſt the Parthians, the Senat dedicated it unto him in his abſence. But he in his return from the Perſians, died in the way at Seleucia, a City in Syria, of a flix of blood. His dead corps was brought to Rome: and of all the Emperors, he alone (as Eutropius writeth) was interred within the City. The reaſon why his bones are left in that Column is this: The manner in old time was, for Princes and Noblemen to be buried under hills: but there being not mountains enough whereupon to raiſe ſepulchres in every place, it hapned that ſuch ſteeples and high pillars were ſet over their dead bodies inſtead thereof.

CHAP. XIV.

The Forum, the Palace, and porch of Nerva.

NExt to our ſight cometh the Forum of Nerva, and it is behind the Church of S. Hadrian. In the midſt of it there ſtood a Column of braſs of an huge bigneſs; covered with plate of latten or copper, and hath within it, light every way. This Forum was garniſhed with divers ſtatues and Columns, containing the whole order of the acts of Nerva. This was afterwards called Forum Tranſitorium, for that from it there was the way to the Forum of Auguſtus, and the Roman.

There appeareth as yet ſome part of the Porch or gallery belonging to the Forum: for being conſumed by fire, yet it left certain obſcure tokens, witneſſing, that in the ſame place was the Forum of Nerva.

Part alſo of the Palace of Nerva, built of 4 ſquare ſtones and pillars, together with the Church of S. Blaſe, are yet ſeen encloſed between the Comitium and the tower of Militia.

CHAP. XV.

The Roman Forum, the Comitium, the priſon Tullianum, and the Image of Marforius.

THe Roman Forum, which alſo is called Latinum, began at the foot of the Capitoll, and reached in length to the Church now of S. Mary the new, which is in Velia. But at the firſt, the circuit and bounds thereof were much narrower. For from the head thereof abovenamed, it went no farther than the neareſt foot of the mount Palatine. Many a year after, Auguſtus Caſar enlarged it.

The Comitium joyned to the Forum, or rather it was a part thereof: for it beginneth at the gate of Palatium, and endeth at the Church of S. Mary the new.

At the foot of the Capitoll hill, South-eaſt-ward, Ancus Martius built a priſon for malefactors to be laid up in. After him K. Tullius adjoyned to it that part which is under the ground, and called that dungeon, Tullianum. Made it was of huge and mighty big ſtones, with narrow long holes, for to receive the ſhadow, as it were, and reſemblance of a light. The dungeon within was vaulted with ſtone, ugly for darkneſs, and loathſome by reaſon of a ſtrong and ſtinking ſent. This whole priſon was divided into two parts, the upper room and the nether. Carcer it was called in Latine à coërcendo, becauſe it kept them there encloſed from coming forth.

Juſt before this priſon there lieth a huge marble-idoll which they call Marforius. Some think it was the Image of the bakers god, others, of Jupiter, ſurnamed Panarius, of the tumours that bear out, like to loaves of bread. For the Romans in times paſt, when they were beſieged by the Gauls in the Capitoll, had warning by Jupiter in a dream, to make bread of all the corn that they had left, and to throw it into the enemies camp. Whereby the Gauls deſpairing that the Romans could poſſibly be tamed with hunger, brake up the ſiege. Whereupon the Romans in perpetuall memoriall of this benefit, erected an altar and a ſtatue to Jupiter Piſtor.

This image is thought to be the reſemblance of the river Rhenus in Germany, becauſe it is upon a rock. But why it ſhould be called Marforium, I know not, unleſs it be becauſe it ſtandeth in the Forum of Auguſtus.

CHAP. XVI.

The Secretary of the people of Rome; the arch of Septimius; the Temple of Saturn. Of the Treaſury, and the mint-houſe where they coined mony.

BEhind the image of Marforius, overagainſt the arch of Septimius is the Church of S. Martina: where, as it appeareth by an evidence engraven in marble, was ſometime the place called the Secretary of the people of Rome.

Right againſt the ſaid Church of S. Martina at the bottom of the rock Tarpeia, ſtandeth the arch of Septimius, which in both the fronts thereof containeth the deeds of that Emperor both by land and ſea.

Directly there followeth the Temple, ſometimes of Saturn, now, S. Hadrians Church. The ſaid Temple was of great antiquity. Some report L. Largius for the builder thereof; others L. Tarquinius: albeit more likely it is that Largius dedicated it. Livy writeth, that when A. Sempronius and M. Minutius were Coſſ. Numantius Plancus reedified it. The treaſury of the people of Rome, no writer denieth, but that it was tranſlated out of the Capitol into this Temple. But why men in old time would have the treaſure to be within Saturns Temple, there be divers opinions. Some ſay, becauſe in Saturns daies there was no theft committed: for under him all things were common; no covetous miſer nor lewd perſon laid wait for his neighbour, but all things were adminiſtred with righteouſneſs, faith, and love. Cyprian alledgeth this cauſe, becauſe Saturn was the firſt that in Italy ordained money to be coined. Moreover, in this treaſure-houſe were kept the publike ordinances. Alſo the books called Elephantini, containing the five and thirty tribes of the people of Rome. Moreover, all the books of the Cities accounts: alſo the ancient writings and records of the old Ærarium and the City debts. Furthermore, the ſtandards and enſigns of war. Over and beſides, whatſoever was by the Generals and Captains after the conqueſt of Provinces carried in triumph, was thither brought. Laſtly, whatſoever was expedient and profitable for the Common-weal to be reſerved, as laws, letters, and other common regiſters of a City. The Cenſors likewiſe were put to take their oath in the Temple of Saturn.

Between the Church now of S. Hadrian, and that which ſometime was the Temple of Caſtor and Pollux, ſtood in old time the work-houſe wherein they coined money.

CHAP. VII.

The golden Miliarium the bridge of Caligula, the Roſtra and the Curia.

Miliarium aureum ſtood in times paſt at the head of the Roman Forum, under the Temple of Saturn, near to the arch of Septimius. A pillar it was, ſo called, wherein all the high-waies of Italy were cut and engraven, and there ended, and from which the meaſures began and went on to every gate of all quarters.

Caligula brought a bridg of marble through the Roman Forum, from the mount Palatine to the Capitoll. A more ſtately and curious piece of work there never was throughout all the City: for the bridg was ſuſtained with fourſcore mighty pillars of moſt white marble: whereof at this day three are to be ſeen at the foot of the one hill, and as many at the other, in ſuch manner as they were in times paſt by Caligula built for the bridg. In the midſt of the Forum, over-againſt S. Hadrians Church there ſtandeth a pillar, which is verily thought to be one of them that ſupported the brazen horſe of Domitian gilded all over. At the foot of this horſe was the reſemblance of Rhene, a river in Germany; for that Domitian the Emperor had triumphed over that Province. And this is the Image which afterwards they called Marforius.

Of the beakheads of the Antiat ſhips, a pulpit was built in the Roman Forum by the Romans at the foot of the mount Palatine, which Temple they called Roſtra, that therein the acts of the Senat ſhould be made. Now of this Roſtra there were twain, the new at the bottom of the Palatine as is before ſaid, and the old, near the Curia in the Comitium. In this Roſtra were laws publiſhed, cauſes pleaded, and Orations made to the people. On the ſame the manner was alſo to erect the Statues for moſt famous and noble men.

In the moſt conſpicuous place of the Forum Romanum, before Roſtra, upon a lion of ſtone was the portraiture ſet for Fauſtulus the foſterfather of Romulus and Remus. For he, whiles he was deſirous to part the fray between Romulus & Remus the founders of the City, was there ſlain, where, afterwards they erected unto him his ſtatue. Behind the Roſtra was the ſepulchre alſo of Romulus. Moreover, before the Roſtra ſtood the ſtatue of Hercules, clad in a coat after the Eleans habit, with a grim and ſtern countenance. Three ſtatues alſo of Sibylla in the ſame place. The manner of the Romans beſides, was to ſet up the heads of thoſe that were put to death, there to be ſeen.

Two Curiæ or Councill-houſes at Rome there were: one near the Forum, faſt by the Temple of Peace, named Hoſtilia; the other in the mount Cœlius, whereof we will ſpeak hereafter.

CHAP. XVIII.

The Lake Curtius, the great ſink or town ditch, and the Doliola.

THe lake Curtius was in the midſt of the Rom. Forum, near Domitian his horſe. This lake took that name of M. Curtius, who to ſave the Common-weal, willingly of his own accord caſt himſelf headlong, armed as he was, together with his horſe into a chink of the ground in the midſt of the Roman Forum. Some would have it ſo called of Metius a Sabine, who through this lake eſcaped ſafe to his own company.

The vault or ſink called Cloaca Maxima, was made by the commandment of Tarquin: for by reaſon that the hils were digged under, and the City ſtood hollow upon arches, it received & carried away all the filth thereof. At the Temple of Jup. Stator, divided it was into three conveyances or channels, whereof two of them are now ſtopped up, the third runneth with moſt clear water by the Lake Curtius, under the Roman Forum, along the foot of the mount Palatine into Velabrum, and from thence in a ſink made of four-ſquare ſtone, it diſchargeth it ſelf into Tyber. In old time there there were many ſuch vaults, and thoſe for publike uſe. But after the City was won by the Gauls & burnt, whiles every man made haſte to rebuild his houſe, where he could meet firſt with a convenient place; they took no heed to the ſtreets as they were before: ſo as neither the City was divided as aforetime into quarters, nor yet the ſinks which in times paſt went under the ſtreets, were marked where they lay: but afterwards were conveyed under privat mens houſes, whereby it came to paſs, that each houſe almoſt at this day hath a ſink or privy belonging to it. Hereupon alſo it is, that this author, whoſe epitome or abridgment we write, hath not divided the regions of the City, agreeable to the old writers. But to the end that thoſe things which he ſetteth down might be ſooner underſtood, and better remembred, he hath parted it into thoſe quarters as now it ſtandeth and when he ſheweth in what part of the city any place in times paſt was, he declareth them in: thoſe coaſts which at this day are known to the Inhabitants. But as at firſt theſe ſinks were common (as I have ſaid) ſo there were appointed publike overſeers to look unto them.

Near the foreſaid great ſink there was a place, which of certain barrels under the ground was called Doliola. This place was reputed ſo holy, that a man might not ſpit thereupon. In it were ſuppoſed to have been certain ſecret myſteries of Numa. And yet, there be that think verily the aſhes of the French Senones were there beſtowed.

CHAP. XIX.

The Comitium, the Temple of Venus Genitrix. The Statues and Images that were in the Comitium and Roman Forum. Cæſars ſtatue and pillar.

WHere the Comitium was, from what place it began, and in what part of the City it ended, we have ſhewed before, in the fifteenth chapter of this book. Called it was Comitium, as Plutarch ſaith, for that Romulus and Tatius were wont to meet together in this place, to make covenants between them. In which place afterwards, the Senat and people of Rome aſſembled, when they would decree any thing for the good of the C.W. and namely, when Conſuls, Tribunes Conſular, and ſuch Magiſtrats were created, and other affairs concluded, whereof authors make mention in all their writings. That place was neat the Senaculum, at the very foot of the mount Palatine. This Comitium was open above-head for many years: whereupon oftentimes, albeit aſſemblies were ſummoned, yet they were empeached holding for them, fearing ſome tempeſtuous weather toward. Long time after, when Annibal came into Italy, they ſet a roof over it: and afterwards Cæſar repaired it again. In this Comitium the plaies were many times exhibited. In the ſame (as Livy reporteth) the books of Sibylla were burnt. In like manner many lewd and outragious acts were committed in the aſſemblies there, whereof elſewhere we will ſpeak.

In the Comitium ſtood the ſtatue of Cocles; which being afterwards ſtrucken with fire from heaven, was tranſlated into the court-yard of Vulcan. In the cantons and angles of the Comitium, were the ſtatues likewiſe of Pythagoras and Alcibiades: Alſo in the aſcent and ſtairs thereof, on the left hand of the Curia ſtood the Image of Accius, together with his whetſtone and razor.

The image reſembling the Mother goddeſs, was ſet up in the Forum. They that worſhipped this goddeſs were of this opinion, that the ſtone whereof ſhe was made, could not poſſibly be conſumed with fire: which they gueſſed hereby, for that albeit many fires were made in the night eſpecially at her Image, yet it took no hurt thereby; and therefore gave they out, that there was ſuch vertue herein, as I have ſaid. And from thence it came, that in all ſtreets almoſt they began to worſhip her and to erect altars and little chappels unto her.

The Temple of Venus Genitrix, as is ſhewed before, was in the Forum: Juſt before this Temple ſtood the ſtatue of Cæſar, carrying a blazing ſtar upon the head. In like maner a Column of Cæſar made of Numidian marble 20 foot high there remained. Before the Temple of Caſtor there was the ſtatue of Q. Martius in horſemans habit: of Tremellius clad in a ſidegown; of M. Atticus covered with a vail.

CHAP. XX.

The column called Mœnia: the pillar Horatia: the houſes of Cæſar, Conſtantine, and Domitian, The Temple and Court-yard of the ſaid Cæſar.

IN that part of the Forum was the Column Mœnia, where ſtood the palace of Portius. Called Mœnia it was, of Mœnius the Cenſor: for he (when as he ſold unto Cato his houſe, and when Flaccus the other Cenſor gave order, that the palace aforeſaid ſhould there be built, reſerved in the ſale ſo much ſpace for himſelf, as pillar or column would take up: upon the which he might put out aloft to jut forth, made of joiſts and boards upon them: from which place both he and his poſterity might behold the ſport of ſword-fencers. And this priviledge he obtained: whereupon, others alſo, as many as might be allowed, were as induſtrious, and built them columns in the Forum.

There ſtood a rock of ſtone in the Forum, whereupon the ſpoils of the three twins Curiatii were hanged.

In like manner the pillar callar Horatia.

The houſes of Cæſar, Conſtantine, and Domitian beautified the Forum.

Likewiſe the court and cloiſter of Minerva; and the ſhops [of Bankers] as well old as new.

The dead corps of Cæsar was brought out of the Curia into the Forum, and interred in that place, where afterwards they built unto him an altar and Temple.

Likewise in the Forum the manner of the Romans was, to lay down their Magistracy.

CHAP. XXI.

Cæsars Forum: the Palace of Paulus, and his Library.

BEsides the Temple of Saturn, or the common treasury (whereof we have written before in the 16 chap. of this book) in the Roman Forum toward the Northeast was Cæsars Forum, even in that very place which seemeth lower than the rest, behind the Temple of Faustina. There was the Temple of Venus Genitrix, about which Cæsar made a cloister and a Forum, not of wares and merchandise to be sold, but for them that repaired thither for justice in law matters. In this Forum, among other statues (whereof there were many and those most fair and beautiful) he suffered his own to be made, all armed. The Forum it self contained but a small compass, but it was most excellently set out. The very level of the plot stood him in an hundred millions of Asses and above.

Cæsar purchased with 1500 talents, Paulus Æmylius the Collegue of C. Marcellus in his Consulship, to be his friend and to stand with him. Paulus having received this sum of money built in the midst of the Forum near to the Temple of Castor and Pollux, a most excellent and wonderfull Palace, of Phrygian columns which afterwards they named, Basilici Pauli.

A Library also the same Paulus erected, near unto his own Basilica.

CHAP. XXII.

The Forum of Augustus: the galleries of Antonius, Faustina, and Livia: Cæsars house.

THe Roman Forum, those also of [Julius] Cæsar and Augustus, were (as it is well known) near one to another. That of Augustus, they affirm to have been at the image of Marforius, in the most frequented place of the City: it was but in little compass, as the other of Cæsars, but excellently wel adorned with brave statues and other things. For it had the statues of Castor and Pollux, with the victory of Alexander the Great: the image also of Corvinus, and of the raven that upon his helmet fought. Also Apollo in Ivory; and besides these, other ensigns and ornaments of vertue and valour.

In this Hall or Forum, publike justice was administred: and the judges from thence were empanelled: herein they debated in councill, of wars, of triumphs, and other weighty affairs. From hence they used to go when they took journey into their Provinces with soveraign command. Hither, they that returned victors, brought the ensigns and tokens of their victory. This Forum being by time decaied, Hadrian reedified.

This Forum had two porches, wherein were the statues set out & decked in triumphant manner.

Augustus dwelt in the street Sacra, in a house not so large and stately, but marvellously furnished by his neece Livia. And Augustus not able to abide this wastful superfluity of riches, pulled it down and laid it even with the ground: in the void plot and court-yard whereof, was afterwards built the gallery of Livia; which also was called Claudia. Nero cast it down, but Domitian built it up again under the old name.

The goodly galleries of Antonine & Faustina, adorned with divers and sundry marbles wel built in old time, were whereas at this day standeth the Church of S. Laurence in Miranda.

CHAP. XXIII.

The rafter or beam, called Sororium Tigillum: the street Cyprius, Sceleratus, and Patritius: the house of M. Antonius.

S*Ororium Tigillum* was a place hallowed for the expiation and assoiling of Horatius for killing his sister, set up near the street Carina, to the honour of Jupiter.

The street Cyprius is near to the cliff or rising of the Capitoll, which leadeth to the Church of S. Peter in Vinculis, so called of Cyprus. In it dwelt the Sabins first, when they were aranchised and made free denizons. Surnamed afterwards it was Sceleratus, upon the wicked and devilish act of Tullia, whereof Livy speaketh. Some think this was one with the former: others say, it was divers from it.

The street Patritius was so called, because of Patritii, who were by K. Tullus commanded there to dwel. For this was a place raised somewhat higher than others: from whence as from the upper ground, they might easily defend themselves against the sudden violence of others, if it should be offered.

M'. Antonius dwelt in that house, where sometimes stood the Temple of Tellus. After Antonius, the Church of S. Pantalion was in the same place built.

CHAP. XXIV.

Busta Gallica, and Æquimelium.

B*usta Gallica*, was a place in the heart of the City, where the dead bodies of the Frenchmen that held Rome, were burnt and buried. It was in that part of the City where at this day standeth the the Church of S. Andrew (in Busta Gallica.) Now they call it by an awk name, Portugallo: and it is not far from the Amphitheatre. Varro setteth the Busta Gallica near the Æquimelium. As for Æquimelium, it was so called, because the house of Melius who sought to be K. was there laid level with the ground.

CHAP. XXV.

The street called Via Sacra: the arch Fabian and Vespasian.

THis street beginneth at the old Curia, in the angle of Palatium near the arch of [Great] Constantine. Varro supposeth that it began at the Carinæ and the chappel of Sternia. Whereby a man may gather, that the Via sacra sometimes went through the gardens now of S. Mary the new, to the Temple of Peace, the Forum of Cæsar, and so directly up to the Castle of the Capitol. The name of Sacra it took for that the Augurs when they came from the Capitol hill, went through it as they took their Augury: or because monthly, they went in procession with sacred reliques along that way: or last of all, in regard that in it there was a league and covenant made between Romulus and Tatius. At the head and top of it, Ancus Martius in times past dwelt, near the chappel of the Lares.

In this street was the famous statue set up of Cloelia.

The arch Fabian likewise, near the Kings Palace, fast by the Basilica of Paulus, was reared by Fabius the Censor, who subdued the Allobroges. In which arch was the scutcheon with his arms, and other tokens of the victory engraven. Fast by it, Scribonius Libo erected a seat and Tribunal for the Prætor named Puteal.

In the same street-way was the marble arch of Vespasian, (the ancientest of all others that are now to be seen) erected by Vespasian after he had won Hierusalem. In it were his victories cut and engraven, with the ark of the covenant of one side, and on the the other, his triumphs and spoils; and namely, the golden candlestick; the seven other lights, the two tables of Moses, the vessels of the Temple of Hierusalem; the golden table, weighing one great talent; and many things else, whereof Josephus writeth.

CHAP. XXVI.

Græcostasis; Senaculum; the Curia; the Palaces of Opimius and Porcius.

Græcostasis is a place on the right hand of the Rostra, as men go forth of the Comitium; where, the Embassadors of forrain nations being sent unto the Senat, used to stand and give attendance untill they were admitted to audience.

The Palace of Opimius, and the Curia, stood near unto the Græcostasis. Above the Græcostasis was the Senaculum at the Temple of Concord. Called it was Senaculum, because the Senat or the elders were wont there to meet. In Greek it is named Γερουσία.

Curia was in the Comitium, and some think it is all one with Senaculum; so called, because the affairs that required publike care were there debated. There was a Curia also of Priests, where Church-matters were handled and treated of. Now this Curia where the Senat met, was a Temple or hallowed place: for neither might the Senat meet, nor act of Senat pass, but in the place set out and appointed by augury. Hereupon Curia Hostilia, Pompeia, and Julia, being profane places before, were by inauguration consecrated Temples. In this Curia was the altar of Victory: and upon the stairs of the said Curia stood the image of Victory, made of fine pure gold.

Cato the elder in the time of his Censorship, built (with the City money) a palace near to the Forum, under the Curia, which after his own name he called Portia Basilica.

The palace also of Romulus (as men think) stood where the Church is now of S. Mary the new. These places therefore which have been thus described in the fourth region of the City, joyned together in one place in a manner, and were all contained within this circuit, as you go from the Comitium toward the Temple of Peace, and the Church and gardens of S. Mary the new almost as far as the Esquilia.

The fourth Book.

CHAP. I.

The Temple of Janus and Piety: of the publike goal of Rom. Commons.

SEeing that four parts of the City are described, the fifth ensueth; which includeth those places that comprehend Tybre, part of the Aventine on the right hand, and the rock Tarpeia on the left: the valley also which lyeth between those very hills. Wherefore begin we will at the memorable places, which are next after the Theatre of Marcellus, and so run through the plain and levell plot of the City. And with Janus first, whom men in old time believed to be the very door, and as it were the entrance of all things. Unto Janus Numa built a Temple at the gate Carmentalis, (afterwards the chappell of S. Katharine) at the bottom of the Argiletus, close close unto the theatre of Marcellus. This Temple had two doors: in time of peace they were shut, but in war opened by that Consul, who, as the worthier person, was first created. It is found in records, that this Temple was shut but only thrice. First, by Numa himself: secondly, by T. Manlius the Cos. and a third time by Augustus, after the battel of Actium. But why in time of war it stood open many reasons are given: and this is thought the chiefest, namely, an accident that befell when Romulus warred against the Sabins: for when the Sabins were now possessed of the gate Carmentalis, and about to rush violently into the City, all on a sudden unlooked for there issued forth upon the enemies a plenteous river and stream of hot scalding water out of the Temple of Janus, which stood near to the gate: whereupon they were driven to flee, and so the City was saved. From hence it is that posterity coming after, open the doors for Janus that he might be at liberty, when he is called forth, as it were, to help in time of war.

Others report, that Tatius and Romulus both were the founders of that Temple: as who, when the covenant was made betwixt them, agreed together of that two-faced god as an indifferent and common witness to them both of the accord contracted between two Kings and two nations; and so erected unto him this Temple in that very place where now the ruins of S. Katharines Church are to be seen.

Moreover there be who affirm, that Cn. Duilius vowed it, and Tiberius built it: but the variety of these opinions seemeth hereupon to arise; for that it is received and held for certain, that there were many Jani worshipped as gods by the posterity; whereas they in old time believed but one: so as that which is spoken of divers, is falsly supposed, as said of one. Which may be seen before, whereas we wrote of Janus with four fronts or faces, whose Temple was erected in the Forum. For it is said, that Janus was the first who erected Temples and ordained divine service and ceremonies for the gods; and therefore in sacrifices deserved the first place.

Pourtraied he is with a key and a wand; as who is the porter to keep the gates, and the guide to direct the waies.

Augustus besides, brought his image out of Ægypt to Rome, and in the herb-market built a Temple in the honour of him.

To Piety in the said herb-market, M. Atilius Glabrio dedicated a Temple in that very place where at this day standeth the Church of S. Nicholas in the prison: for even there Ap. Claudius the Decemvir by a decree of the Senat built a prison, for that the common goal (whereof we have written before) was not sufficient; and called it The prison for the Commons of Rome: wherein himself afterwards being found guilty wrought his own death. In which also many years after, a certain silly poor woman of base and obscure parentage, being newly brought a bed, being apprehended for an heinous offence, was condemned to be starved to death. Her daughter, being a milch woman, and delivered lately of a child, made humble request to the goaler, that she might have leave to go to her mother: and when he had made streight search before, whether she brought with her any food; and saw her have nothing about her, let her in: and so she went and came many times. At the last known it was that the prisoner within was nourished by the breast-milk of her daughter: whereupon the mother was delivered and set free; and both mother and daughter were allowed their food ever after by vertue of a decree, at the Cities charges: and in regard of that kindness and affection of the child to the mother, they consecrated this place to the goddess Pietas. Livy supposeth, that it was not the mother but the father that in this manner was by the daughter nourished.

CHAP. II.

The herb-market: the Temple of Juno Matuta, and of Hope: the Oratory or Chappel of Numa: the Column called Lactaria: the Altar and Chappell of Carmenta.

THis place hath the name of Forum Holitorium, for that therein is great store of worts and pot-herbs without the gate Carmentalis, where, where, in times past was the old market kept: and at this day called it is the street Montanaria.

Within the compass or the said market-place, C. Cornelius the Consul, in the time of the Gauls war, vowed a Temple to Juno Matuta: which afterward being Censor, he put out to building, in that very place where afterwards stood the Church of S. Andrew, surnamed in Mentuza.

The same C. Cornelius built in the Forum Holitorium the Temple of Hope, and the same adorned with divers and sundry marbles: which afterwards Collatinus consecrated. Many a day after, it was smitten with lightning; and in the end set on fire and burnt.

A Column also there was in the same market-place, named Lactaria: unto which the sucking babes that were to be nourished with milk, were presented.

The Oratory of Numa stood in the bottom of Argiletum, near the theater of Marcellus.

The Altar Carmentalis, consecrated by Evander to his mother Carmenta, stood before the gate Carmentalis.

In the same place also was the Chappell of Carmenta built by the matrons of Rome. At the first, she was called Nicostrata: but for that she delivered Oracles in verse, she took the name of Carmenta.

CHAP. III.

The fish-market, and Temple of Fortuna Virilis.

THe fish-market standeth along the Tybre, near to the [Forum] Junium, between the Churches of S. Mary in Portico and Ægyptiaca, within the gate Carmentalis, not far from the Forum Boarium, i.e. the ox-market.

The Church of S. Mary Ægyptiaca is at this day near the Tybre, and a bridg of the said name. Some go about to affirm and prove that this was sometime the Temple of Mercy; others, of Fortune and Chastity; but all in vain: for those Temples were not in this place, but in the ox-market: as for this Temple of Fortuna Virilis, whereof we now speak, it was near Tybre. In it stood the statue of Serv. Tullius made of wood and guilt all over, which in a great scare-fire when all things else were burnt, remained only safe and sound.

CHAP. IIII.

The Temple of Vesta, the Salinæ, and the arch of Cocles.

NEar the Church of Mary surnamed Ægyptiaca, there remaineth at this day a most ancient Temple, now dedicated to S. Stephen, the frame whereof is circular, and the pillars are set round about and bear up the roof: which being one entire piece of work, carrieth the whole Temple. Consecrated it was in old time to Vesta: and Numa taking that circular platform, from the Temple which was at Alba, made it with a lover in the top, having a hole to give light.

Howbeit, of this goddess her self there is no image nor resemblance; for that fire, whereof she is the goddess, can have no certain and permanent form. As for Vesta, the Latines call her so, because she is arraied with divers and sundry things. Of the Greeks she is named Isia, for that her force and power appertaineth to altars and herths where fire is kept. This is not the Temple wherein the sacred fire is preserved: but that whereof we spake before, which Romulus built between the Capitoll and Palatium.

Salinæ were the store-houses of the salt which served the City; and they stood upon that bankside of Tybre, which from the foresaid Temple of Vesta reacheth into the Aventine.

The arch of Horatius Cocles stood at the very foot of the Aventine hill, where the rising thereof beginneth between the mount and the Tybre.

CHAP. V.

The Forum Boarium.

HItherto from the beginning of this fourth book, are described those things which on the right hand of the Tybre were worth the noting. Now forward we will after our manner, run through all the memorable things which are on the left side of that river: and first, as concerning the beast-market.

The beast-market was near to Velabrum and Janus, between the mount Palatine and the Greek school, close to the Temple, now called S. Gregories Church. In it there was a most ancient image in brass of a bull, whereupon some think it took the name Boarium. Others, for that oxen were there sold: or because they used in old time to sacrifice those kind of beasts there: or else, for that Evander in that place killed an oxe in sacrifice to Hercules, for killing Cacus and recovering again his kine and oxen. In the same place were kept the instruments wherewith the Ministers belonging to sacrifices, the sacrificers also themselves, were furnished when they went about their sacrifice. In this market-place was the first fight exhibited of sword-fencers.

CHAP. VI.

The Temple of Hercules Victor, and the Altar called Maxima.

THe round Temple of Jupiter Victor was built in the beast-market, near the Greek school: where sometime Evander reared unto Hercules the altar called Maxima. This Temple (as they say) was so religious and venerable, that neither flie nor dog would enter into it. For Hercules at what time as he distributed a dole of flesh to his followers and ministers in his sacrifice, prayed unto Myiagrus [the god that gathereth flies.] He it is therefore that driveth away all flies from this Temple: and at the door thereof he left his club behind, which as soon as the dogs see they run away far off: and thus unto the daies wherein Pliny lived it was free from flies and dogs. At the sacrifice and divine service of this Hercules, neither women nor bondslaves, nor yet freed men that had been in villenage might be present. At the last, this Temple was consumed in that fire which Nero the Emperour made.

Over and besides, Evander erected unto Hercules a statue, which was called, Hercules Triumphant because so often as there was any triumph in the City it was clad with a mantle, and other habiliments of triumph.

All the time that Evander raigned Hercules had no more but an altar which they called Maxima: and this Evander reared unto him for killing of Cacus, and restoring his kine and oxen again.

Upon

Upon this altar he ſacrificed the tenth part of the fruit of his kine: for Hercules had given out and promiſed, That they ſhould live an happy life who dedicated unto him the tenth part of their goods. Hereupon cometh the name of Decima Herculana, i.e. Hercules Tithes.

CHAP. VII.

The Temples of Chaſtity, Proſperous Fortune, Matuta, and Fors fortuna: of the place called Vicus Publicus, Velabrum: and the ſepulchre alſo of Acca Laurentia.

NEar to the Temple of Hercules, well known it is that a chappell was built by Æmylius to Pudicitia Patritia, i.e. Gentlewomens chaſtity. Now the image that repreſented this Saint, ſtood in the beaſt-market. To the ſervice and ſacrifices celebrated unto this goddeſs, virgins that were Commoners daughters might not come. And therefore a certain maiden of commoners degree, reared a chappell alſo to Pudicitia Plebeia. From the ſervice and ſacrifices thereof, the Patritian virgins were likewiſe debarred. Many other places & Temples beſides were conſecrated to Pudicitia.

The Temples of Proſperous Fortune and of Mutata, Servius Tullius conſecrated in the beaſts-market: And that Fortune he called Proſpera, which was not blind. In that place (ſay they) an Olive tree ſometimes ſtood, and upon a time when honey dropped and flowed from it, the Soothſayers gave order, that a little coffer or box ſhould be made of the wood thereof; wherein thoſe lots were put and laid up which by the direction of Fortune were either handled or ſhuffled together by the hands of young boys: as if ſuch ſhould prove happy, fortunat, & excellent. Servius Tullius aſcribed all his acts whatſoever to Fortune, who being born of a bondwoman, had many times found good by her, and was in the end advanced to princely dignity. And hereupon he dedicated Temples to Fortuna Primigenia, Maſcula, Converſens, Bene ſperans, and Videns, as who would ſay, ſhe ruled and did all. Likewiſe, a Temple he conſecrated to little Fortune, ſignifying thereby, that nothing can happen unto us, be it never ſo ſmall, but we muſt attribute it, as coming from the gods.

A Temple to Matuta Camillus vowed in the Veientian war and dedicated it; which long before that time Servius Tullius had erected. To Matuta and Fortuna Primigenia the Romans did ſacrifice upon one and the ſelf-ſame day: and likewiſe in one and the ſame day both their chappels were burned and conſumed with fire together. Carvilius the Conſul cauſed a Temple to be made unto Fors Fortuna, or [Fortis Fortuna] near unto that of Matuta, of the money raiſed out of the ſpoil gotten from the Tuſcans.

The ſtreet called Vicus Publicus began at the Forum Boarium, and went from thence unto the Aventine, as far as to the Temple of Juno. In this ſtreet near the ſaid Forum was the Chappell of Velabrum, in that very place where now ſtandeth the Church of Saint Gregory in Velabrum, ſo called.

Aventine hill was ſometime ſeparated from the other mountains by the Tyber between: for before that Tarquinius Priſcus turned the chanell of Tyber, it brake out many times, and having found a frith or creek, it beat upon the foot of the Aventine. And therefore of neceſſity, whoſoever would go to the Aventine was to make a fare, that is to ſay, by paying his quadrant, ferry over thither in a Wherry. Hereupon that place is at this day called Velabrum, à vehendo, i.e. ferrying over, where ſometimes the Tyber had wrought out a frith.

Antias hath left in writing, that the ſepulchre of Acca Laurentia was in Velabrum.

CHAP. VIII.

Vertumnus and his Temple; Janus with four faces; the houſe of Africanus; the Court or Palace Sempronia, and the wooll-ſhops.

MEn in old time called Vertumnus, not only the god of buying, ſelling, and of fruits; but alſo him that ruled mens minds, ſo named à Vertendo, for that oftentimes he turned & changed at his will and pleaſure the purpoſes and thoughts of men another way far divers. His Temple & image they erected in the Tuſcan ſtreet, near to the altars of Ops and Ceres. The feſtivall daies of this god, celebrated in the month of October, are called Vertumnalia. Some there be that would have Vertumnus and Janus with four faces to be all one; upon this reaſon, for that they affirm the Temple of Janus aforeſaid to be in Velabrum, whereas they built that of Vertumnus. But now that Temple whereof we have before ſpoken, upon four pillars beareth up one roof, and hath four gates beſides, and in each foretront twelve little windows, which ſignifie the four quarters of the year, and the twelve months. In old time they put Janus before, in all ſacrifices, and gave him that name ab eundo, i.e. going and hereupon the entries and doors of houſes be called Janua.

Near the image of Vertumnus Pub. Africanus had an houſe, which Sempronius afterwards bought together with the wooll-ſhops, and built the palace which they call Sempronia, near the Temple of S. Gregory in Velabrum

CHAP. IX.

Argiletus; the houſe of Cornelius; Æquimelium; the Chappell of Surquedry or ſloath.

THe Argiletus beginneth at the bottom of the Tuſcan ſtreet, and endeth at the Theatre of Marcellus. But Fabius Pictor ſaith, it began at the head of the ſaid Tuſcan ſtreet, under Cœlolus, between between it and the great Lists, and so reacheth to the Aventine. The name it taketh of a kind of clay or lome, whereof there is plenty in that place: or else of one Argus, who being entertained as a guest by Evander, laid await for his life, intending after he had murdered him, to be K. and raign himself. But the friends and company about Evander discovered his trains, and so he was by them slain. Unto him therefore Evander reared a tomb even there, and consecrated the place.

Now Imus Argiletus is just by the Theatre of Marcellus. In this street were divers shops of artisans or artificers, and especially of stationers or booksellers, and those they commonly called the Argiletan shops.

Cornelius Domitianus is said to have dwelt in Velabrum.

Æquimelium is between Velabrum and the Capitol, near to the staplers and wooll-shops. The name arose hereupon, for that Sp. Melius, a Roman Citizen who aspired to be K. sometime there dwelt: who being detected of that crime, was killed, his goods confiscat, and his house laid levell with the ground, and the plot where it stood by the Romans was made a void-yard.

The Temple of Murtia, goddess of Idleness, was under the Aventine, upon the ascent of the hill called Clivus Publicus, in that part whereas folk go up to the Church of S. Prisca. Hereupon the mount Aventine was sometimes called Murtius.

Moreover, some there be that in this place would have the Asylum to stand: but we have shewed before that Asylum was first built by Rom. upon the Capitol. But in process of time, after that so great riches and wealth was gathered and laid up there in the Capitoll, and that otherwhiles the Senat used there to meet and sit in council; the Rom. thought it not with the safest for them that thieves, fellons, and other lewd infamous persons of all sorts, should come for refuge thither, and there abide: and therefore they supposed it better for their security to translate this priviledged sanctuary to some othre place. Whereupon not there alone, but in many other parts afterwards there began sanctuaries to be set up, not at Rome only, but also in other quarters of the world.

CHAP. X.

Circus what it is, why it was so called, and for what cause ordained.

THe place where games & exercises of disport were performed, was called the Cirque: so named, for that the scaffolds were built in circuit round about to behold the pastimes; and within that compass the said solemnities were exhibited: also for that the pomp was carried in shew, and the horses ran about the goals there. Built it was round, but longwise like an arch or bow, having in the circuit about it steps one above another, with apt seats for the beholders, that one should not hinder the prospect of another: in the midst were two marks or goals distant alike one from the other. Also the barriers or carceres, so called because the horses stood there pent and kept in untill the Magistrate gave the signall to begin the course.

Now these solemnities of games and plaies are festivals in the honour of their gods: for ordained they were first, and still are observed and kept, either for their birth-daies & nativities, or dedications of Temples. And at the very first verily were hunting and baiting of beasts, which they called (Munera) to the honour of Saturn. But the stage-plaies were due to Liber: the Circensian games to Neptune and Ceres. Thus these pastimes were assigned, some to these gods, and others to those; and in honour and memoriall of them yearly solemnized. As for the games Circenses, they were so called, because when they were to be performed, they had the bank of the river of one side, and swords set to flank the other. But of these games, plaies, and solemn sights, Sisinius hath written at large.

CHAP. XI.

The great shew-place called Circus Maximus.

TArquinius Priscus instituted first this large circuit for running of races, and laid the foundation thereof between the two mounts Aventine and Palatine. But Cæsar was he that enlarged it, and made it more magnificent and stately. For being (as it was) three furlongs and an half in length, and four acres broad; it is thought that it was Cæsar and not Tarquin, who set it out to that largeness: and this soundeth like to a truth, considering that in Tarquins daies the City was not so populous, neither given so much to these shews and sights, as in the time of Cæsar, and therefore the place required not so great a compass of ground. Now this Cirque for three parts thereof to wit, the two sides and one of the ends, had a ditch digged ten foot deep, and as many broad: behind that ditch were galleries built three stories high; and these had seats made beneath with stone, and above of timber: all which galeries had one and the same bases for they closed together round like a globe. Able they were to receive a hundred and fifty thousand men. See more hereof in Dionysius, Pliny, Livy, and others who have written of the Roman Edifices. This Cirque Augustus adorned and beautified afterwards: for he made the barriers of marble, and guilded the goals, and many other ornaments he set it out withall. Lastly, when it was decaied and fain down, Trajan reedified it, made it more ample, and trimmed it up. Yea, and after him, Heliogabalus set thereto besides most fair and goodly Columns, and garnished them with gold, and paved the very floor with Chrysocolla. But as touching the beauty of this Cirque, Nazarius writeth much. For, by report, so elegant it was, that men resorted to it, not so much to behold the exercises and masteries there, as the pleasant and delectable beauty of the place. Maximus therefore it was called, either because consecrated it was to Vortumnus,

the

the greateſt of the gods, or for the excellency and ſumptuouſneſs of the games: or elſe becauſe in compariſon of other Cirques, to wit, Flaminius, and the other called Intimus, i.e. the inmoſt, this was the biggeſt. For Pliny hath left in writing, that it lay out in length three furlongs, and one in breadth, ſo as it would well ſerve for two hundred and ſixty thouſand men to ſit within it.

CHAP. XII.

The Temples and Altars which we read to have been in the Circus Maximus, or about it.

Conſus is reported to be the god of Counſell, either for that he concealeth mens counſels, or openeth them unto men. This God had an altar in the great ſhew-place covered over: which betokeneth, that counſell ought to be cloſe and covert. For which cauſe, this altar as we read, was by the old Romans to him conſecrated. For they at what time as they conſulted about the raviſhing of the Sabine maidens, fearing leſt they ſhould have been detected before the time dedicated this altar to this god, and erected the portraiture and image of him thereon. Which altar verily, either by ſome injury of the times, or through mens neglect of the gods, continued ſo forlet, as in the end it was altogether unknown where it ſtood. At length found it was again, and at all other times remained covered, but in the time of horſe-runnings, and then it was uncovered and ſet open. To this god was the feaſt alſo inſtituted, called Conſualia. And thoſe diſports and paſtimes which they deviſed for the raviſhment of the Sabin Virgins, were celebrated at this altar by certain Prieſts belonging to that god.

In like manner Neptune, ſurnamed the Chevalier, had a Temple in this Circus Max. which in the year of our Lord 1526 was found behind the Temple of S. Anaſtaſia, at the foot of the mount Palatine, in the very foundations of the Circus: for ſuch marks and tokens were there to be ſeen, that by good evidences it appeared that this was the very Temple of Neptune. For the honour of this Neptune, the games Circenſes were by men in old time ſolemnized.

Alſe to Genius the guide and director of ſecret plots, they directed an altar in the great Cirque. Over and beſides theſe, this Cirque contained three other altars: one to the Great gods: a ſecond to the Penats: and a third to thoſe gods of heaven and earth, from whom all things ariſe and have their beginning. Theſe gods above ſaid, the Romans called Genii, Penates, Preſidents, and keepers of the City.

Liber, Libera, Ceres, and Proſerpina, had their Temples about this place called Circus Max. which Poſthumius when he warred againſt the Latines, vowed: and the ſame man upon his return with happy victory built and dedicated them accordingly.

To conclude, in the ſame compaſs were the Temples of the ſun, and of Flora.

Moreover, a Temple there ſtood near this Circus, unto Venus: which Q. Fabius Gurges the Coſ. cauſed to be made of the money raiſed upon the fines of certain wives that were condemned for playing falſe with their husbands.

Lucinus dedicated a Temple to Juventus without the great cirque, not far from that place.

In like ſort, Mercury had a Temple near this Circus Max.

In Plinies daies there was ſeen in the Cirque Max. the image of Fortuna Seia.

CHAP. XIII.

The Naumachy of the great Cirque.

Naumachy is a place ſo called ὅτι ἀντὶ τῶν ναῦσι μαχέσιντο, i.e. for that in it they uſed to skirmiſh with ſhips. For there were places digged deep like ponds, where were repreſented ſome ſhews of navall fight for the exerciſe of the Roman youth, that they might know how to charge and annoy the enemy at ſea alſo. And theſe kind of ſports were exhibited and practiſed not in the cirques only, but alſo in the Amphitheatres.

CHAP. XIV.

The two Obelisks of the Cirque Max.

The Obelisk (as Marcellinus teſtifieth) was a very huge and rough ſtone riſing like a ſpire or broch, by little and little to a mighty height: and that it might reſemble a ray or ſun-beam, it groweth ſmaller and ſmaller in faſhion of a ſteeple, with four ſides or edges, and in the top it is very narrow, and there made plain and ſmooth right artificially. In moſt of them are engraven and cut certain Hieroglyphick notes, and namely, ſuch as teſtifie either the founder thereof, or elſe other memorable matters. Of theſe figures and characters, the ſame Marcellinus ſpeaketh in this wiſe: Moreover the infinite variety of forms and characters, called Hieroglyphicks which all about we ſee engraven, the ancient authority of the firſt learning did ſet forth and mark ſo. Thus much ſaith he. Now they drew and portraied therein ſundry forms and ſhapes of living beaſts and birds, and oftentimes deviſed new and ſtrange reſemblances, whereby they reſerved and kept for their poſterity whatſoever was memorable and worth remembrance. This manner continued not in Ægypt only, but alſo in other parts of the world, untill ſuch time as letters were found: and then this was given over. At the firſt one letter implied a whole word and one word went for a whole ſentence. But hereof ye ſhal find much in authors that have written of theſe characters. Moreover, as Pliny witneſſeth, theſe Obelisks were made of the ſtone Simithes. Them they erected and consecrated to the gods, and principally to the Sun: and therefore in hewing and cutting them, they resembled the sun-beams, as we said before. The first that ever devised these Obelisks, was K. Methres. At Rome were none of these Obelisks wrought and cut out, but brought thither from other parts, and so for beautifull shew and to wonder at were erected. Therefore in the Cirque aforesaid, called Maximus, two Obelisks were seen, one standing upright aloft, 80 foot high: the other lying along in the Naumachi; it carried in length a hundred and thirty foot and 8 inches, besides the base or footstall, which Augustus translated to Rome out of Hieropolis, a City of Ægypt: but when he would have set it up on end it fell down and brake in twain. This was hewn out of the quarry, by King Samnefreteus, in whose raign Pythagoras was in Ægypt.

conſecrated

CHAP. XV.

The arch of Settinius in the Cirque. The place of the Tuberoes in the Cirque. The stews, the house of Pompey, and the fountain of Juturna.

Sertinius having made conquest of Spain, brought great store of money into the City chamber: and of the spoils taken from enemies he reared two arches; the one in the beast-market, called Forum boarium; the other in the great shew-place, named Circus Maximus. Upon these arches he set golden images, and other ornaments to beautifie them.

The house and family of the Helii was none of the wealthiest, but yet of great credit and esti-estimation with the Romans. Among whom there was so great concord & unity, that 16 of them at one time dwelt and agreed well together in one and the same house. For their (ngular prowess and worthy acts they were allowed by the Senat and people of Rome a scaffold by themselves in all the shew-places and Theatres, to behold all sights and masteries of activity.

About the Circus Maximus stood the stews and brothel-houses, where sometimes harlots and naughty-packs kept, such as made profession of whordom. But this place was afterwards laid even with the ground, and is now a void place.

The house of Pompeius was near the Circus Max. & therein was the statue of Hercules erected.

The fountain or well of the nymph Juturna, is yet (as some think) to be seen, boiling up in the Velabrum near the common sinck or vault called Maxima.

CHAP. XVI.

The Septizonium of Severus.

THere should follow by course after the great Cirque, the sixt part of the City, namely, the mount Cœlius. But because we meet with the Septizonium of Severus, & the arch of Constantine (before we come to Cœlius) between it and the mount Palatine, something would first be spoken of them, especially being so excellent building as they are. The Septizonium therefore is a mighty mount or terrace raised from the plain ground 4 square, compassed about with seven articles, that is to say, courses of rows of pillars one above another, yielding as it were as many porches or galleries: and in this order they are disposed, that the higher the pillars stand, the lesser and shorter they be. In the midst hereof, four wals arise, containing within them certain hollow places like cabinets. In the top thereof were bestowed and laid the ashes of Kings and Emperors deceased. Jul. Capitolinus nameth this mount Septodium, for the Greeks call places much frequented; whereunto many waies lead, Heptodia of ἑπτὰ, i.e. seven, and ὁδὸς i.e. a way. Pliny calleth it Septisolium, of seven lofts or solars. For in every course thereof the columns meet together in the head with marbles transomes. Other beams there be are besides, reaching inward from them to the mount it self, so as every such course yielded a stage like a gallery or walking place. Two of these Septizonia we read there were at Rome, to wit, the one of Titus in the street called Via nova, of right great antiquity, not far from this of Severus: of which at this day there is to be seen no shew or token at all. The other of Severus, whereof there remain still ouer against S. Gregories Church 3 Zones or girdles (as it were) of curious work; for the beauty and statelines of the pillars worth the seeing, and pleasant to behold. Reared it was in the broad street called Appia, and built by Severus himself. That which now is left thereof leaneth out so, as it seemeth ever and anon ready to fall.

CHAP. XVII.

The triumphant arch of Constantine the Emperor.

THese triumphant arches were erected for them only, who having subdued whole Provinces or conquered forrain nations & obtained braue & fortunate victories, seemed worthy of triumph, and thereupon they are called Triumphant arches. Upon these arches for the perpetuall and everlasting memoriall of acts atchieved, were cut and engraven the portraitures of the very places where the war was performed; the resemblances of Fabricks and ranged battels, if the service was on land; and of ships if it were at sea. Howbeit, untill the time of the Emperors, no man raised any arches, and in Plinies daies they began first to be built: so as that of Titus is of all others most ancient. For before their age, only statues and trophies were set up. But in process of time following, many of these arches were raised: among which, that of Constantine is to be seen above the rest, at the corner of the mount Palatine, near the Theatre, beautified with triumphall ornaments;

and

and remaineth at this day in a manner ſound and whole without any hurt. This arch Conſtantine erected for himſelf, upon the victory which he obtained over Maxenitus at the bridg Milvius.

CHAP. XVIII.

Cœlius the mount, and Cœliolus.

THe mount Cœlius in old time was named Querquetulanus, for the number of oaks there growing: but afterwards it was ſo called of one Cœlius Vibennus, a Duke of the Tuſcan nation, unto whom the Romans granted a place in that mountain to inhabit. For when as the Tuſcan people, by reaſon of their multitude, and the ſtrong fenced places which they held, were ſuſpected, commanded they were to remove into a ſtreet which of themſelves was named Thuſcus. But ſuch as were without ſuſpition, kept the hill Cœliolus or Cœlicolus, i.e. the little Cœlius; a place where ſometime the goddeſs Diana was worſhipped: and at this day there ſtandeth the Church conſecrated to S. Evangeliſta the virgin. This mountain afterwards by Tiberius was named Auguſtus.

CHAP. XIX.

The Temples of Faunus, Venus, and Cupid: the Court Hoſtilia: the forrain camp: the houſe of the Laterans: the Palace of Conſtantine, and Cæſorianus: the horſeman ſtatue of L. Verrius.

VPon the ridg or ſide of the mount Cœlius there ſtandeth a round Church, now patronized by S. Stephen, but hallowed and conſecrated in times paſt to Faunus. Faunus he was called, ἀπὸ τοῦ φαίνω, for that he foretold things to come by voice and not by ſigns. The Albans in old time inhabited that part of the hill, where at this day the Church ſtands of S. Mary Dominick.

In the hill Cœlius ſtood ſometimes the Temples of Venus and Cupid, not far from the gate Nævia where now is the Church of the holy Croſs in Hieruſalem.

The Court Hoſtilia was in two places of Rome, the one in the common Forum, hard by the Temple of Peace, where King Hoſtilius firſt dwelt, the other in that place, where afterwards the Church of S. John and S. Paul was built.

A place there was in the mount Cœlius called Caſtra Peregrina, toward the Northeaſt and the Eſquiliæ, where at this time the Church of the four crowned Saints is frequented.

The houſe of the Laterans alſo was built upon the ſame mount, at the Palace or ſtately Hall of the Laterans.

The Palace of Flavius Conſtantinus, near the houſe of the Laterans, ſtood between the gates Calimontanus and Gabiuſa.

The Palace of Cæſorianus was built at the gate Nævia, and the Church of S. Holy-croſs in Hieruſalem.

In the ſtreet called Lateranenſis, ſtood the ſtatue on horſeback of L. Verrius. Some ſay it was made for M. Aurelius Antonius, others, for Septimius Severus.

CHAP. XX.

Of the Amphitheatres, and firſt of that of Statilius Taurus.

NOw it followeth to ſpeak of the Amphitheatre of Statilius Taurus, but before we write thereof, it would be briefly ſhewed what an Amphitheatre is. Now this word Amphitheatrum cometh ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀμφὶ, καὶ θεᾶσθαι, i.e. of looking round about: for two proſpects joyned in one, make the form of an hemiſphere or half circle. Some think, that Titus deviſed the Amphitheatre firſt, but ſome avow and prove, that C. Cæſar built the firſt that ever was in Mars field: but by the authority of Suetonius it is proved, that Statilius reared one Amphitheatre before Titus.

In theſe Amphitheatres were prizes and rewards propounded to them that would fight with beaſts. Condemned perſons likewiſe yielded there to the eyes of men a horrible and fearfull ſight to behold, for thither were thoſe priſoners brought by the Lictors, within that encloſure to wreſtle and maintain conflict with wild beaſts.

Moreover, the Emperors before they took their journey to any war or expedition, exhibited unto the people in theſe Amphitheatres ſhews of ſword-fencers at the ſharp for life and death, to the end, that the ſouldiers ſhould be acquainted with fight, and learn not to be affraid of weapons, of wounds, no, nor of bloudſhed, nor to draw back and avoid the perils of war to come, for the novelty and ſtrangeneſs thereof. A great part of Statilius his Amphitheatrum, is yet to be ſeen near the wals at S. Croſſes Church in Hieruſalem. And at the ſame time he built it, when Auguſtus Cæſar encouraged and exhorted the Citizens of Rome, every man according to his ability to beautifie and adorn the City.

CHAP. XXI.

The water conduits why they were deviſed, by what means waters were conveyed into the City, to what purpoſe, by whom firſt, and how many.

THe City of Rome in the beginning, as hath been ſaid in the firſt book, was but narrow of compaſs, and contained within ſmall bounds: and the people for commodity and ſtore of water, ſetled ſetled upon the river Tyber. But as the city daily more and more encreaſed, neceſſary it was that ſome ſhould build them houſes and habitation in one place, ſome in another, farther from the river: whereupon diſtreſſed it was for want of water, which was to be fetched ſo far off, and that with great pain and labour: beſides, thoſe places which had no current of running waters to waſh away the filth, and carry it into Tyber, became (by the noiſome air which was infected with their loathſome and ſtinking ſmels) unwholſome, and ſubject many times to the peſtilence. Prince Nerva therefore (the Emperor) undertook to redreſs and remedy this miſchief (and others after him by his example) and deviſe by the wit and ſubtile invention of men, conduit-pipes, to bring water into thoſe parts of the city which otherwiſe had none. And this verily they did two waies, the one by arched work, when by digging certain rills or rivulets the water was carried level above ground, forced by certain weights, ballaſes, and counterpoiſes: the other by vaults under the ground, bringing water into the city by ſecret under-waies through pipes, ſpouts, and rocks. By which means it came to paſs, that in the city every where ſuch ſtore there was of water, that each houſe almoſt had a well in it. But eſpecially at the bottom and foot of the hill Quirinalis, and all the ſide thereof, in the ſtreet Patricius, Suburra, the Latine way, the Aventine, the Jews ſtreet, and in many other places: ſo as in this our age full it is of ſuch water-works under the ground. Now were theſe waters conveighed from divers places, and ſome conduits eſpecially, ſuch as were deviſed by arches were higher or lower than other. In the beginning and all the former times, there were (by report) five heights or depths: The higheſt of all was new Anio; next, the waters Claudia; in the third place the water Julia; Tepula in the fourth; then Martia, and after it old Anio, the levell or current whereof, Virgo followeth and Appia, and the loweſt of all others, Alſietina, which ſerves that quarter of the city beyond Tyber, and other low places built upon the plain. Theſe waters were firſt brought into certain great conduit-heads, and from thence they were by a certain meaſure diſtributed by the conduit officer, and ſo ran into places appointed. Now that great conduit-head was called Caſtellum, which receiveth firſt the common water, and afterwards ſendeth it out into divers and ſundry parts: and the keeper or officer that overſeeth it is named Caſtellarius. There were beſides levell or above ground certain ciſterns or receptacles of water, which kept water to ſerve curriers, fullers, and other ſuch artificers for their neceſſary uſe. Over theſe waters were appointed certain wardens and keepers, and a ſet number of labourers and workmen to ſee thereto. Finally, a grievous puniſhment was to be inflicted upon them that either marred and hurt the conduit-heads, or derived and conveyed water to other places than the laws or publike ordinances, or the Cenſors or Ædiles permitted; or took more water than at the firſt was allowed them. Appius Claudius (by report) was the firſt man that brought water into the city by arched work. But of the Roman waters, of the conduits, and other matters ordained thereabout, of the manner of conveyance, the inſtruments, meaſures, and weights thereto belonging, read Frontinus, who of theſe things hath written truly and at large. Alſo have recourſe to Sex. Ruffus, who of the ſame argument hath made a good treatiſe. In the time of Frontinus there were but nine waters and no more brought into the City, namely, Appia, old Anio, Martia, Tepula, Julia, Virgo, Alſietana, called alſo Auguſta, Claudia, and new Anio. Ruffus reckoneth ten more, whereby it appeareth, that he wrote long after Frontinus.

CHAP. XXII.

The conduit or conveyance of Aqua Claudia.

Caligula began two conduits, but left them unfiniſhed when he died, Claudius the Emperor of famous memory, took them in hand again, and in moſt magnificent manner made an end. To the one of them, namely, which beginning at the ſources or ſprings called Cæruleius and Curtius, was drawn to the City, he gave the name Aqua Claudia: the other, for difference ſake of the two conduits of Anio he called his own, or the new Anio; and diſtinct it was from that which is named old Anio. The water Claudia therefore was brought from the gate Nevia, along the ſide of the mount Cœlius into the Aventine. A part alſo thereof Caracalla derived into the Capitoli hill.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of thoſe things which now in mount Cœlius are not known where they ſtood.

Brutus the Conſul having expelled Tarquine, built a Temple to the goddeſs Carna in mount Cœlius, to which goddeſs alſo, upon the accompliſhment of his prayer and vow, he offered ſacrifice. They in old time ſuppoſed that ſhe had power over the vitall members of the body, and to her tuition they committed thoſe parts, and that ſhe ſhould preſerve them ſafe, they did ſacrifice upon her altars, and preſented oblations.

Agrippina likewiſe began to build a Temple to Claudius Cæſar, which after her death Veſpaſian finiſhed, and Nero utterly deſtroyed to the very foundation: this alſo was erected in the ſame hill.

Mamurra Formianus, Maſter of Cæſars Carpenters in France, was the firſt Roman that adorned and ſet out his houſe which he had in Cœlius hill with marble rough-caſt. Moreover, the houſe of Claudius Centimalis ſtood upon the ſaid hill. Alſo the houſe of the Tetritici, who were two of the thirty tyrants. Likewiſe the houſe of Junius Senator, wherein, when as all other edifices and buildings upon that mountain were conſumed with fire, the image of Tiberius remained unhurt. There alſo it is ſaid of Titus Claudius Clytus, the maker of hymns. In this hill was the great Macellum, the cave or den of Cyclops, the Spoliarium, and the armory.

CHAP. XXIV.

The waies Appia, and Nova. The Temples of Isis, Vertue, Honour, Quirinus or Mars, and the river Almo.

NOw follow those places which are worth the remembrance upon the hill Cœlius toward the Aventine. And therefore the way or street called Appia we meet with first, which taking the beginning from the arch of Constantine, reacheth as far as Brundusium: and because afterwards it was paved and repaired by Caracalla, it took the name of Nova, i.e. the new causey. But that which properly is called Nova beginneth at the gate of Palatine, and along the foot of the Palatine hill, over the great Cirque called Maximus, stretcheth out as far as to the lowest fish-pool, where now standeth the Church of S. Sixtus. Many other streets there were, called Nova. Take heed therefore that in their names you be not deceived, and lest ye think that to be spoken of one, which oftentimes was meant of many.

Between the Church of Sixtus, the Fish-pools, and the ruins of the Antonian bains, there was the Church of Isis Antenodorica, built by Antonius Bassianus.

The Temple of Honour and Vertue, not far from the street Appia, was vowed by the father of Marcus Marcellus at Clastidium in Gaul; and seventeen years after dedicated by his son Marcellus.

Two Temples there were of Mars, one called the Temple of Quirinus within the City, near to the gate of that name, the other upon the way Appia without the City.

The river Almo runneth along the way Appia, under the foot of the Aventine into the Tyber. It beginneth ten miles from the City in the territory Marinum; which commonly afterwards they called the river of Appius. In this river the goddess named the mother of the gods, was every year wont to be washed by her Priests, called Galli.

CHAP. XXV.

Of baths and bains in generall.

Therma properly hath the signification from a Greek word, θερμὸν, which betokeneth hot. But we use to call those places which either having hot waters, or without them are heat with a stouph, appointed either to wash and bath, or to sweat, by the Greek name Therma. That the Romans used in old to bath and wash themselves oftner than we now adaies, is testified by many and divers authorities of writers: and for sundry causes they were wont so to do [as yet the manner is amongst us] namely, to scour away sweat, or to wash dust off, in like sort for health and pleasure: whereby it came to pass, that every man, if he were but of mean wealth, had in a manner a privat bath or hot-house by himself: but the same were devised and contrived after divers and sundry sorts. For many publike baths there were ordained for the common people to use at their pleasure. Serv. Orata invented first and made the pendant or hanging baths. But after that riot and superfluity abounded in excess, the bathing houses were built with wonderfull cost and magnificence, so as they seemed to keep no mean nor measure: as appeareth by the very reliques and ruins thereof at this day. And those places where they built these bains and hot-houses they called Therma; which contained within them divers places, and an infinit number of roomes, bearing sundry names, and serving to as many uses. For some were appointed to heat water (and those were round built) from whence hot water was let into the bains, not to them only that were on the ground beneath, but also to those which were pendant and hanging aloft: which water after they had done washing, being foul and good for nothing was conveyed by certain pipes and spouts into sinks. They had other rooms also called Apoditeria, wherein they that were to go into the bath put off their cloaths and laid them by. In the same places were court-yards, having about them most spacious porches or cloisters, built with arched and embowed roofs most stately; wherein were marble pillars, garnished with divers and sundry colours. In like manner pavements of stone, and walls seeled and hung with marble tables. Also close walking galleries, groves, and swimming places, all for the pleasure and contentment of the people, where they might refresh and solace themselves. These delights so drew and allured mens minds, as that they would wash oftentimes in one day, yea, and in these bains the Princes were wont to sup and bath with other persons whosoever, as it fell out. They had besides private baths to themselves most sumptuously built, and gorgeously set out. And namely, Antoninus Caracalla, at his own charges edified certain baths, which by his name were called Therma Antoninæ. The huge ruins thereof are yet to be seen: some of the pillars still stand, others are thrown down. Some say, they were begun only by Antoninus, but finished and adorned by Severus. They stood about the foot of the Aventine, near the street-way leading to Ardea, where now is the Church of S. Balbina. Under these baths there stood a most goodly Palace, built by the same Antoninus, but at this day there is scarce any example or shew thereof.

The fifth Book.

CHAP. I.

The Etymology of the mount Aventine.

THe Aventine is of the Roman hils the fourth in order. The compaſs and form whereof, becauſe we have already deſcribed in the firſt book, needleſs here it is to repeat. But it remaineth to declare, how it came ſo called, what Temples of the gods, and what other edifices be therein. The Aventine therefore, ſome think, took the name of birds which were wont to flie unto this hill, there to neſtle: others, of a * King of the Albans, ſlain and buried there. There be again who ſuppoſe, that the Sabins, who being by the Romans enfranchiſed Citizens, there ſetled and made abode gave the name to this hill of Avantes, a river in their Province. Varro affirmeth that it was ſo called of a ferriage: For as it hath been ſaid a little before, this mount was divided from the reſt, and from the City by certain lakes and the Tyber, whereupon, they that would go to it uſed to ferry over in ſmall punts or wherries. Some gueſs, that it came to have that name of reſort unto it, for that the Latines uſed in great frequency to repair unto the holy Temple of Diana there. Remurius alſo it was named of Remus who choſe a place in the top thereof to ſit, for to take the flight of birds for Augury, and in the end was there enterred: Romulus therefore commanded that it ſhould not be inhabited, becauſe he would have had it wholly conſecrated to his brother. This hill Ancus Martius afterward compaſſed with a wall, and granted leave to as many as would there to dwell: howſoever, there be ſome that think it ſtood void untill the time of Claudius the Emperor of happy memory, as being an ominous place and unfortunat, by reaſon of foul birds that hanted it, and therefore not to be received within the wals. But the truth is, when the Romans grew populous, they joyned this mountain alſo to the reſt of the City.

CHAP. II.

The Temples of Diana, Dea bona, Hercules Victor, Queen Juno, Moneta, Luna, Victory, Minerva, and Liberty. The Altar of Jupiter Elicius.

IN the top of mount Aventine toward the Tyber, there ſtandeth the Church of S. Sabina, that very place where aforetime was the holy chappel of Diana. The feaſt and holiday of bondſlaves was wont to be kept at Rome the thirteenth day of Auguſt, for upon that day Servius Tullius, whoſe mother was a bond-woman, conſecrated a Temple to Diana in Aventine, and ordained it to be a feaſtival day for bond-ſervants, who as yet were patronized by Diana. Some think that this chappel was built by K. Ancus of that money which the Citizens conferred and contributed, who lately had been tranſlated thither from Politorium. This Temple was common unto all the Latines, whereupon oftentimes they reſorted thereunto.

Very neer unto that place ſtood the Church of S. Mary, called Aventina. But in times paſt the place was conſecrated to the goddeſs Bona, i.e. good. For Claudia a veſtall virgin or Nun, built a chappel unto her in the honour of Fatua, * ſiſter of Faunus, a moſt chaſte maid.

* Or rather daughter.

Upon the ſame bank and brow of the hil, where at this day S. Alexius Church ſtandeth, was ſometime the Temple of Hercules Conqueror. And near unto it another of Juno Regina, built by Camillus with the pillage got in Veii. In the ruinat place of Decius the Emperors bains there was a Temple alſo of Hercules, where the Chriſtians afterwards conſecrated a Church to S. Priſca.

On the ſide of the Aventine hill ſtood the chappel likewiſe of the Moon, as Ovid doth witneſs.

Thus much of thoſe buildings in the Aventine, which had a certain place thereupon in our knowledge: the reſt following were doubtleſs in the Aventine, but in what part thereof they ſtood, it is unknown after ſo long time, and namely, the Temple of Victory built by the Arcadians, and in honour of whom they offer ſacrifice yearly. Minerva and Juno had their Temples there in the ſame hill, by the teſtimony of approved authors. To Liberty a Temple was built and dedicated by the father of T. Gracchus, with the money taken for fines and forfeitures. The cloiſter belonging to that Temple was by Ælius Patus and Cornelius Cethegus Cenſors repaired and enlarged, and laſt of all by Pollio alſo re-edified. Now this S. Liberty the Romans honoured above all others, and in defence and maintenance thereof, they ever ſhewed themſelves moſt reſolute and conſtant.

Upon the ſame hill, Numa reared the altar of Jupiter Elicius, ſo called ab eliciendo, i.e. of fetching out ſecrets and hidden myſteries.

In like manner there ſtood an old altar of Murcea in that hill. Now they named Venus Murcea, of the Myrtle tree conſecrated unto her; or as ſome interpret, becauſe Venus, immoderate and exceſſive, maketh a man to be Murcus or Murcidus, i.e. ſluggiſh, ſloathful, idle, and good for nothing.

The Temple of Juno Moneta was likewiſe built and dedicated upon that hill.

Camillus in the ſame mount conſecrated a chappel to dame Matuta.

The wood or grove, alſo called Laurentum or Laurentina, conſecrated unto Jupiter, was there: in which Emperor Valentinian [the ſecond] ſon of Conſtantine, and Galla Placidia was ſlain, as Pliny witneſſeth.

CHAP. III.
Cacus, and his hole or Cave.

Cacus, by report of the Poets, was the ſon of Vulcan, whom they believed in old time to breath out of his mouth fire and ſmoak. This Cacus infeſted the places near unto him with robbing and ſpoiling. But more probable it is, that he was a moſt lewd and theeviſh ſervant of Evander, and therefore the Arcadians called him κακὸν, i.e. naught. A cave he hanted, as by very good conjectures is certainly gathered, in Aventine toward Tyber, over-againſt the Church of S. Mary Aventine, whereas the river runneth neareſt to the hill, and whereas there hangeth over a vaſt and huge craggy rock, as fit a place as might be to make a ſtarting hole and cave for ſuch an one, and near it is to the gate Trigemina. Him when Hercules had killed and ſacrificed, he reared an altar unto Jupiter Inventor, near to the ſaid cave or den.

CHAP. IIII.
The Armiluſtrium, and ſome other things in generall.

Armiluſtrium was a place where ſouldiers ſhewed themſelves and their armor, and where they uſed to muſter; where alſo in their arms they ſacrificed and did ſervice to their gods, with reſounding loud trumpets. Some would have it to be in the Aventine, others in the Cirque Maximus: but that matters not much. Hither the ſouldiers uſed to repair when they were returned from war, and here they laid up their harneſs and weapons. For armor of their own and in their privat cuſtody the Romans had not, to uſe in the wars: but delivered all up to be kept ſafe either in the Armiluſtrium, or the tower or caſtle upon the rock Tarpeia.

In Aventine, near the Temple of Juno Regina, were the Scalæ Gemoniæ, that is to ſay, a ſteep place with a downfall; where wicked malefactors, drawn with a crook, were moſt miſerably executed and killed.

There ſtood ſometime this hill, near the Temple of Diana, the houſe of Phyllis.

A part of this mountain was called Remuria; which Remus choſe to dwell in: and being there by his brother Romulus committed to the earth, he gave it his name.

The Senat and people of Rome built in this mountain, to the honour of Decius the Emperor, the baths called Decianæ and others alſo near them, named Variana. Moreover, the bains of Trajan were in this place, where now the vineyard of Francis Albertinus is.

The caves of Faunus and Picus alſo were in the Aventine, as fables report. Italus likewiſe dwelt in the Aventine, as M. Cato recordeth.

The Temples and edifices of this hill all in generall were (by report) burnt in the daies of Tiberius, ſometime Emperor.

CHAP. V.
The ſheard hill, and other things within that compaſs.

THe plain and levell ground between Aventine, Tyber, and the City wall, hath four ſides, but uneven; in which there riſeth a little hill, commonly called Teſtaceus. The whole compaſs hereof will hardly be meaſured with 2000 paces; the height is about 160 foot. It reſembleth in ſhew the form of a gourd; and the one ſide of it which regardeth the Tyber is broader than the other. Near to this hill was the glaſs-makers ſtreet (and the potters) alſo the carpenters habitation. And no man doubteth, but hereupon aroſe and grew the mount called Teſtaceus. For in old time, at Rome and elſewhere, as alſo in ſome places now adaies, much uſe there was commonly of earthen veſſels made by potters: which even by this may be certainly collected, for that in Numa's daies there were four colledges or ſocieties of potters: and theſe made of clay, not only veſſels, but alſo the images of the gods, and ornaments to beautifie and ſet out their Temples: pillars and wals were by potters work ſeeled in the outſide, nay, the very dead bodies were beſtowed in cophins of baked clay. Since then, in ſo great ſtore of earthen veſſels and potters work, much of neceſſity muſt needs be broken, which if they had been caſt abroad in the corn-field and paſture grounds, would have made all barren and unfruitful; again, if they had been thrown into the water, would in time have choaked up the chanell of the current, and forced the river to ſwell and overflow the banks: Numa therefore commanded this kind of workmen to dwell in one place, and gave order to fling all that was good for nothing, as filth, riff-raff, and broken ſheards into one place: whereupon, in proceſs of time aroſe a mount which they called Teſtaceus. Among theſe potters there was a place hallowed to Venus Myrtea, as we find in ſome records.

CHAP. VI.
The Pyramides; the ſepulchre of C. Ceſtius, and the garners of the people of Rome.

THe Pyrmides were huge towers four-ſquare, riſing up in height, ſharp like to a flame, whereof they have the name ἀπὸ τῦ πυρὸς, i.e. of fire. But Stephanus ſuppoſeth they were ſo called, ἀπὸ τῶν πυρῶν, i.e. of wheat, becauſe into that place where they were erected, wheat was brought out of

of all Ægypt; which made a great dearth of corn. Theſe at the beginning were reared by the Kings of Ægypt, thereby to ſpend and conſume their ſuperfluous wealth and ſubſtance, whereof they had no uſe; for fear leſt if they had gathered goods, and heaped up a deal of gold, ſilver, and other riches, they ſhould thereby have given occaſion unto ſome for to lie in wait to take their lives away: alſo, that the common people ſhould not live in idleneſs. Afterwards, at Rome likewiſe they beſtowed their money thereupon, for to make the world wonder, and to ſhew their vain-glory. There is yet one of them to be ſeen, ſtanding upright at the gate Hoſtienſis. encloſed within a wall. And commonly it is ſaid, that it was the monument or ſepulchre of C. Ceſtius, one of the ſeven Septemvirs, called Epulones. But Blondus would ſeem to prove, that it was the place for buriall of the whole Colledg and Society of thoſe Septemvirs Epulones. Now were they called Epulones, who had the power to ordain and make feaſts and ſolemn bankets to the gods.

It is written, that there were 140 garners of the people of Rome, between the mount Teſtaceus and Tybre.

In the ſame compaſs of ground near Tyber was the lake or pool Hylerna.

Some alſo affirm, that there ſtood ſometime in that quarter a little town called Capena.

CHAP. VII.

The ſweating ſteeple, and the image of Jupiter.

BY courſe the Eſquilia ſhould next follow; but becauſe it lieth between the way Labicana on the Southeaſt ſide, and the valley (which for the breadth of 400 foot encloſeth that way) on the Weſt; we will rehearſe what memorable things ſoever there be in the Labican way and the valley aforeſaid, before we come to the mount Eſquilia. In our return therefore to the triumphall arch of Conſtantine, whereof we ſpake before, we will as we go diſcourſe of the reſt. Near then unto this arch there appeareth the half rundle or circumference of an old ſteeple made of brick, which Victor calleth the ſweating ſteeple: for that the report goeth, how ſometime there guſhed water out of it; whereby the common people, ſtanding to behold the games and plaies in the next ſcaffolds of the Theatre until they were athirſt quenched their drought.

In the top hereof ſtood the brazen image of Jupiter, becauſe their anceſtors in old time were wont when they made ſolemn leagues to uſe the image of Jupiter. But for that it was a trouble either to carry with them or to ſend the ſaid image, eſpecially if they were to contract and eſtabliſh any accords in far remote countries, therefore inſtead of the compleat image they took the ſcepter only; which might betoken Jupiter the King of the gods, as well as if he had been there preſent full and whole.

CHAP. VIII.

The Amphitheatre of Titus Veſpaſianus. The Temples of Fortune and Quies.

BEtween the two hils Cælius and Eſquilia was there an Amphitheatre. This Veſpaſian built firſt, and afterward Titus his ſon dedicated and beautified it with the bains, built near unto it with right great celerity and ſpeed. This Amphitheatre was commonly called Coloſſeum, of Nero's Coloſſus, which was ſet up in the porch of Nero's houſe. In the ſame place of the Theatre were the pooles beforetime of Nero, whereof we will ſpeak hereafter in this very book. This Amphitheatrum they called alſo Arena, i.e. the Sand-floore, becauſe the ground was ſpread over and laid with ſand, that the wreſtlers might fall ſofter and take leſs hurt, alſo that the bloud ſhould be drunk up, to the end that the ſword-fencers in combat might not be affraid upon the ſight thereof, and ſo with leſs chearfulneſs and courage ſet upon their concurrents: and laſt of all, that the champions, whoſe bodies were anointed with oyl being beſtrewed with the ſand, might with more eaſe take hold one of another. The whole Theatre and place it ſelf within (which during thoſe daies of the games was covered over with tent-cloath) would receive 80000 men. But hereof ſee more in Pliny, Pompeius Latus, and other writers of the Roman acts.

Fulvius Flaccus built unto Fortune (faſt by this Amphitheatre) ſo goodly a Temple, as for ſtate and magnificence there was hardly another in all Rome comparable unto it. Beſides it, there were many other chappels at Rome conſecrated to Fortune.

Likewiſe a Chappell of Quietneſs and reſt was built in the broad ſtreet Labicana.

CHAP. IX.

Of Eſquiliæ.

THe mount Eſquiliæ as well by Varro as others, is divided into many parts, and each part thereof took name of thoſe captains who in times paſt, before the City of Rome was built, there inhabited. For one was called Ciſpius, another, Oppius, and a third, Septius. But hereof Varro writeth at large. The poſterity following changed thoſe names, as we ſhall hereafter hear. Some think that Eſquiliæ took the name of Excubiæ, i.e. watch and ward. For when Romulus had no very great truth in Tatius, he uſed to have a ſtanding watch by night for fear he ſhould be ſecretly forlaied and killed, or elſe turned out of his kingdom. Others ſuppoſe it was ſo named of foulers, who there uſed to caſt forth chaff, and ſuch refuſe of light corn, to beguile and catch the poor birds.

The ſide of the hill toward the broad way Labicana, which lieth between the Churches of the 40 martyrs of S. Clement, S. Peter in Vinculis, and S. Martin, was called by the name of Carinæ, as Livy ſeemeth to teſtifie. From that part therefore, becauſe it was firſt inhabited, we ſhall do well to begin our treatiſe.

CHAP. X.

The Carinæ, the old Curia and the new.

THeſe Carinæ, according to their model and form were houſes like to keels of ſhips, ſtanding within the Temple of Tellus. Their ruins are yet to be ſeen near the Church of S. Peter in Vinculis, i.e. in bonds.

Near to that place was the old Curia built by Romulus: but the new was erected near to Compitum Fabricium, i.e. the Quarrefour or croſs way of Fabricius.

CHAP. XI.

The bains of Titus and Philip; the ſtatue of Laocoon; the Palace of Veſpaſian; the houſes of Balbinus and Pompey.

THere remain yet to be ſeen the tokens and prints (as it were) of Titus the Emperors bains, not far from the Church of S. Martin in the hils: for there be great ciſterns to receive water, which at this day be called Septem Sala, accotding to the number of thoſe ciſterns: and ſo far reached the houſe of Nero, called Aurea, i.e. golden.

Not far from thence, in the year of our Lord 1506 one Fœlix a Citizen of Rome, chanced to find in his vineyard the ſtatue of Laocoon, made by thoſe excellent workmen, Ageſander Polydorus and Athenodorus, Rhodians, who with wonderful cunning portraied and cut moſt artificially in one intire ſtone, Laocoon himſelf, his children, and the admirable windings and foldings of the ſerpents about them. And now at this day is to be ſeen at the Vatican, in the palace of Veſpaſian near the ſaid bains of Titus. See more of this you may in Pliny. As for the ſtory it ſelf, moſt learnedly and lively it is ſet out by Virgil, and there to be read. Behind theſe bains of Titus, between Eaſt and North, the ruins of others beſides are thought verily to be thoſe of Philip the Emperor.

Above the bains of Titus, ſome ſet Hadrians bains; for that this place is yet called Hadrianus.

By the teſtimony of Lampridius it appeareth that Balbinus his houſe was in Carinæ. There alſo was Pompeys houſe, in which Lenæus his freed-ſervant taught grammer.

CHAP. XII.

The cliff Virbius, the houſe of Servius Tullius, the golden one of Nero, and that of Virgil. Mecænas his tower and hortyards; the Temples of Fortune and Felicity.

THat part of the Eſquilia, which overlooketh the Church of S. Laurence in Fontana, is named Clivus Virbius: there alſo is the grove Fagutalis, wherein ſtood the manſion houſe of Servius Tullius.

Nero's houſe, called Golden took up all that ſpace, which from that quarter wherein now Saint Gregories Church ſtandeth, lay between Conſtantines arch, the Coloſſeum, the Carinæ Eſquiliæ, and Mecænas hortyards. His houſe before was in his own fire wherewith he burnt the City, conſumed alſo: and when he re-edified it anew, he called it Aurea. The ſpacious largeneſs whereof was ſuch, that it had about it three porches of a mile compaſs apiece. It contained alſo a pool like another ſea: walled it was about, and reſembled a very City. There were to it belonging holts and hamlets country-like, vineyards paſtures, woods, and beaſts both tame and wild, of all ſorts. The houſe and the porches were double guilded all over, and ſet out with precious ſtones. And in one word there was nothing wanting that might ſerve for pleaſure or prodigall riot.

In the entry of this houſe there ſtood an huge image giant-like, called a Coloſſus, 120 foot high. After Nero's death, dedicated it was to the ſun, and then changed the name. Now men think it was called Coloſſus after his name who was the firſt deviſer of all ſuch ſtatues.

Within the ſame houſe, Nero included alſo the chappell of Fortune. This goddeſs being made of the ſtone Phengites, when all the doors were ſhut, gave light to the whole houſe within: ſuch raies of radiant brightneſs caſteth this kind of ſtone from it. This goddeſs Servius Tullius firſt conſecrated, and of Segetes, i.e. ſtanding corn, called her Seia.

At the bains of Dioclesian, there is a ſtreet-way leading up to S. Antonies Church in Eſquilia, where ſtood ſometime a moſt noble tower of Mecænas within his own hortyards: for thoſe moſt pleaſant hortyards were in the plain of Eſquilia. Here-within was Priapus worſhipped: upon which ill-favored Idol Virgil hath plaied much in verſe.

Near the hortyards of Mecænas ſtood the ſaid Virgils houſe.

The Temple of Felicity, which took up a part of that plot where Nero's Gold-houſe ſhould ſtand was by him burnt.

Above thoſe gardens or hortyards of Mecænas was raiſed a wonderful piece of work, called Aggeres Tarquinii Superbi, i.e. Tarquinius bulwarks.

CHAP.

CHAP. XIII.

The Palace of Siſiminus; the plain and market place of Eſquiliæ; the grove Querquetulanus; alſo that of Juno Lacinia, and of Mars; the chappell and altar of Ill-Fortune.

THe palace of Siſiminus in Eſquilia, ſtood (as they ſay) where the Church of S. Mary the greater now is.

The plain or field Eſquilius, near the tower of Mecenas (called Inter montes) i. among the hils, is between the foreſaid bulwarks and the City wall. This plot of ground was in times paſt called Foculus; becauſe dead bodies were therein burnt. But when the ſtinking ſteam thereof was noiſom to the City, the Citizens and Auguſtus Cæſar by a generall conſent gave the field unto Mecanas, where he made his goodly hortyards and moſt dainty gardens. Of which Cicero, with other, ſpeaketh much.

In like manner, the market place Eſquilinum was in the ſame hill.

That ſide of the Eſquilia which looketh toward the grove Querquetulanus had in it the grove of Juno Lacinia.

In the ſame Eſquilia was the chappel and altar of Ill-Fortune.

In the way which goeth to the gate Interaggeres, even in the very bulwarks or rampiers of Tarquinius ſtood the arch of Gordian made of marble, garniſhed alſo and ſet out with ornaments of triumph. Of the ruins thereof was S. Gregories Church in Damaſus built.

CHAP. XIV.

The cliff Suburranus; the arch of Galienus; the ſhambles or fleſh-market of Livia, or, as ſome would have it, Livianum; the Præneſtine way, and the Trophees of Marius.

AT the top or upper end of Suburra was the Clivus Suburranus, ſo called of Suburra, yielding an eaſie aſcent from thence up into the Eſquilia.

Anon you meet with the triumphal arch of Galien the Emperor (where now ſtandeth the Church of S. Vitus) making a goodly ſhew of the Tiburtine ſtone, whereof it was made. Near unto it was the ſhambles or market-place, called Macellum Livia, or Livianum. This, as ſome think, took the name of one Macellus; who being a notorious thief, and practiſing much to ſteal into the City, was in the end apprehended, and by the Cenſors condemned: and his houſe being ſeized as confiſcat to the City was converted to a place wherein they ſold meat and all other victuals; and ſo it kept ſtill the name (as is ſaid) of Macellum. Some are of opinion, that the ſaid houſe was pulled down, and another built in the ruins thereof, which retained the name ſtill of the former.

From hence beginneth the port-way Præneſtina, and leadeth to the gate Eſquilina.

In this way you ſhall meet on the right hand with a huge bank of brick, half ruinat; upon which were erected two Trophies of marble; that is to ſay, certain poſts [like Quintins] ſtanding upright with ſpoils of enemies hanging thereupon; and they reſembled men that were taken priſoners. It is ſaid, that theſe Trophees were ſet up by Marius in his triumph for the Cimbrian war: which when Sylla had caſt down and overthrown, C. Cæſar (afterwards Dictator) erected again. The place of the inhabitants thereabout, is at this day called Cimbrum. As touching Trophees, look to read more in Plutarch, Valerius Max. and others.

CHAP. XV.

The houſe of the Ælii: the chappell Marianum; the region or quarter called Tabernola; the baths and dwelling houſe of Gordian; the Palace of Caius and Lucius; alſo the Palace Licinianum.

THe houſe of the Ælii ſtood in that place where now be the monuments Mariana and the chappel of that name.

The plain part of the Eſquilia, between it and the mount Celius, and the Baſilica Lateranenſis, is at this day called Merulana, for Mariana; and in old time, the region of Tabernola.

Near the Church of S. Euſebius, in the way of Præneſtina, was built the baths and habitation of Gordianus. The ruins of thoſe hot-houſes are yet to be ſeen, whereby a man may ſoon give an eſtimat, how fair, how ſtately, and large they were at firſt.

Between the gates Eſquilina and Nævia, not far from the walls, there be to be ſeen certain notable ruins: this they commonly call, the baths of Galutius. But in that place ſtood, in old time, that beautiful and famous palace which Cæſar erected under the name of Caius and Lucius his nephews. Hard by the Church of S. Balbina, whereas now is the Bear called Pileatus, ſtood ſometime the Palace Licinianum.

CHAP. XVI.

The water Martia or Trajana; and the Temple of Iſis.

THe current of the water Martia, paſſing by the gate Trajana through the plain of Eſquiliæ went as far as to the baths of Diocleſian, unto the hils next adjoyning. This in old time was called Anfera. It ariſeth out of the ſpring Piconia in the mountains of the Peligni, and paſſeth by the the Martians country and the lake Fucinus, and ſo runneth to Rome; the coldeſt and moſt wholſome of all other waters that run into Rome. This water Ancus Martius began firſt to bring into the City: afterward, Q. Martius ſurnamed Rex, took it in hand; and a long time after Agrippa repaired the conduit thereof. Of it read more in Pliny and Frontinus.

The Temple of Iſis is by P. Victor placed in the quarter Eſquilina.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Suburra; the houſe of Cæſar and Lælia; and the ſtreet Patricius.

Suburra is a ſtreet of all other moſt frequented: it beginneth at the Forum Romanum, and goeth on forward directly by the Forum Nervæ up to the hanging or riſing of the hill called Clivus Suburranus, whereof we have written before in this book; and it endeth where the way Præneſtina beginneth. Called it was Suburra, either for that it ſuſtained and bare up the Carinæ and the wall under it: or becauſe it lay under the old City: or as Varro thinketh, of the burrough or ſtreet Succuſanus. In this ſtreet Suburra was the houſe of Cæſar, ſo long as he contented himſelf with a mean eſtate.

In it were ſometimes certain ſtews and brothel-houſes, as Martial writeth.

The ſtreet Patritius windeth crooked from the hill Viminalis, and endeth at the bains of Diocleſian. Of it more hath been ſaid in the former book.

The houſe of Lælia likewiſe was in the ſame ſtreet, as Martial witneſſeth.

CHAP. XVIII.

Subburra in the Plain; and the Temple of Sylvanus.

THe mount Viminalis on the Weſt-ſide of it hath part of the Quirinalis oppoſite againſt it: and the vale lying between was named Suburra the plain.

In the ſame valley in times paſt were the ten Taberna; ſo called of the number.

The pit alſo of S. Proba was in the ſame hill; which Proba her ſelf made near to the Church of S. Maries in the field.

At the foot in manner of the hill Viminalis, over-againſt S. Agatha's Church there ſtood the Temple of Sylvanus, as appeareth by many good tokens.

CHAP. XIX. &c.

Of the hill Viminalis; the Palace of Decius; the Laver of Agrippina; the bains of Olympias and Novatus; the dwelling houſes of Q. Catulus, Craſſus, and C. Aquilius.

VArro reckoneth the hill Viminalis among the Eſquilia. Viminalis it was named of Jupiter Viminetus, whoſe altars were in that hill: or elſe of plenty of Oſiers there growing.

In the higheſt riſing and aſcent of that hill, there ſtood in old time, (where now is the Church of S. Laurence in Paniſ-perna) the Palace of Decius the Emperor, as may be ſhewed by the ruins thereof.

Not far from the ſame place, toward the Church of S. Vitalis, were the lavers or waſhing places of Agrippina mother to Nero.

The bains of Olympias were ſituat toward Suburra; the tokens whereof are now found in the brow of the hill.

Likewiſe the bains of Novatus were built upon the hill Viminalis, where the Church of S. Prudence ſtandeth.

The hill Viminalis had alſo three goodly houſes of moſt noble perſonages, to wit of M. Craſſus, Quintus Catulus, and Caius Aquilius: the marks whereof are evident to be ſeen in the ſide of the ſaid hill.

Upon the ſame hill in times paſt a certain feaſtivall ſacrifice was ſolemnized, which the dwellers and inhabitants there, call Fagutal.

CHAP. XX.

The bains of Dioclesianus; the Library Ulpia; the plain Viminalis; the gate Interaggeres; and the vale Quirinalis.

THe bains of Diocleſian are to be ſeen all ruinat on the ſide of the hill Viminalis: and by their ruins a man may eaſily gather how ſtately and magnificent they were ſometime. Theſe were begun by Diocleſian and Maximinian Herculanus: in the building whereof 40000 Chriſtians were held to work many years together in moſt ſlaviſh manner.

Theſe were afterwards finiſhed and dedicated by Conſtantine and Maximinian new Emperors. Of the vain and ſuperfluous expences which the Romans laid out upon Bains, read Seneca, who depainteth out their waſtfulneſs moſt excellently.

In the ſame bains was the Library Ulpia, which by Hadrian, or (as ſome think) by Trajan was thither tranſlated; wherein were the linen records, and thoſe huge volumes called the Elephantine books: in which the acts of the Emperors, and all the ſanctions and ordinances of Senat were, as Pollio witneſſeth.

Behind

Behind these bains, from above the rampier or bulwark of Tarquinius Superbus, was the plain field Viminalis, which spreadeth out as far as to the City wall. There is seen as yet the gate Interaggeres shut; albeit it seemeth more probable and like to a truth, that it stood in the plain Esquilinus.

In that very place there was a pit or well of spring running water, which the neighbours dwelling thereby called the pit of the Vivarium, or the park pit, within which park they kept enclosed divers and sundry kinds of wild beasts. The harbors and dens of these wild beasts are yet to be seen: whereupon it cometh, that those places or parks which are set out and appointed for feeding of Deer, we use to call Vivaria.

The space between Diocletians baths and Constantines arch is named the vale Quirinalis: in which they say, that Romulus met with Proculus.

In the same was the sacred chappell of Fortuna Publica.

CHAP. XXI.

The mount Caballus: the Etymology of Quirinalis: the tower Militiarum: the bains of Paulus: the chappell of Neptune: the bains of Constantine: the house and street of the Cornelii.

THe hill which at this day they name Caballus was in old time called Quirinalis, as by many signs and reasons may be proved; so as no man skilfull in the Roman story, need to doubt thereof.

This Quirinall hill, the sixt in order of the mountains of Rome, (as Varro testifieth) taketh that name of the Temple of Quirinus: after others, of the Quirites, who coming with Tatius from Cures, there pitched their tents and lodged. This mountain is shaped long, for it comprehendeth that little hill which is between the gate Collina and Collatina. Upon it standeth the Obelisk of the Moon, engraven with Ægyptian hieroglyphick characters. In breadth, from the North Southward, it reacheth to a tower, now called Comitium.

In the pitch and top of the hill above the Forum of Trajanus, you shall see the tower called Militiarum; where in old time the souldiers of Trajan kept their standing guard, and gave the tower that name.

On the same ridg were the bains of Paulus built: which place at this day by a corrupt name, is called Bagnana-Poli.

In the descent and hanging of the Quirinall hill toward Suburra stood sometime the chappell of Neptune, which appeareth by the pictures and other reliques there found.

From hence toward the North were the hot-houses of Constantine, as the ruins of the place do testifie.

The house of the Cornelii was built in the street so called, and at this day the name it keepeth still. But more hereof elsewhere.

CHAP. XXII.

The Temples of Saturn, the Sun, and Bacchus; Quirinus his Temple and porch; the old Capitoll; the Chappels of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva; the house of Pomponius Atticus.

IN the Cornelian street (whereof a little before we made mention) were two gyant-like images, called Colossi resembling two old men, naked, and holding Cornucopiæ in their hand. It is commonly received, that these were the statues of Saturn and Mars; for that certain it is how their Temples stood hard by: and many evidences there are, besides the very ruins thereof, which testifie so much.

Over-against the hot-houses of Constantine, upon the very brow of the hill, there standeth to be seen one half of a marble tower, which the people dwelling thereby call Mesa. This, men think, was the tower of the Sun, by the ornaments there reared and set up by Aurelian: for this Emperor worshipped the Sun above all other gods; and therefore you shall see stamped in his coin this inscription; Soli invicto, To the invincible Sun. His mother also, a Priest of the Sun, thereupon reared a Temple unto the Sun.

In the side of the hill near the foresaid baths are two horses seen standing; the handy-work of Praxiteles and Phidias. These were (by report) Tiridates the Kings, and translated to Rome.

That part of the Quirinalis which boundeth upon Vallis Martia was called the mount and Temple of Clatra and Apollo.

Not far from thence, behind this hill, there is another rising and ascent; where, by antique letters it is evident, that the old Capitoll stood, together with the chappel of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva.

Over-against these places, enclining toward the right hand, where now standeth the Church of S. Vestalis. Pomponius Atticus dwelt in an house which came to him by inheritance from his grandfire, and was called Pamphiliana. They write, that this was a most sweet and pleasant seat, by reason of a wood near unto it.

In the same place was built afterwards the Temple of Quirinus, kept alwaies shut, to signifie that it was an unknown secret: whether Romulus were enterred and lay in the earth, or were translated into the number of the gods in heaven.

There was a porch or walking place there of that name; where folk used commonly to meet, to dispatch businesses and contract espousals.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXIII.

The path-way or causey called Alta; the house of Sabinus; the street and statue of Mamurrus; the Court and gardens of Saluſt, and the field or plain Sceleratus.

THe high causey reaching from the baths of Conſtantine to the gate Viminalis along the ſide of Quirinalis was paved with fourſquare ſtone.

Upon that causey, at a place called the Pomgranat, Flavius Sabinus had an houſe, wherein, by report, Domitian was born.

It is avouched in old time there was a ſtreet of Mamurrus: and that his ſtatue there ſtood where now is S. Suſans Church.

Not far from that Church was the Court of Saluſt, and his moſt neat and fine hortyards, where the field called Sceleratus lay, and reached near the gate Collina. Of thoſe hortyards, as alſo of the hamlet Tiburtina, there yet continue ſome marks and remnants in the bottom of the valley, between the very hill and the way which bringeth to the gate Salaria. On that little hill is ſeen the very houſe of Saluſt, which the people there inhabiting call Saluſtrium. Of this matter ſee more in Cicero and others.

Beyond the hortyards of Saluſt, near the gate Collina, there is an high place like a mount: where in times paſt the veſtall votary Nuns, ſuch as were condemned for incontinency and inceſt, were buried quick; and thereupon all the plain about it was called Sceleratus, together with the way that leadeth thereto.

CHAP. XXIV.

The Temples of Salus, of Dius, Fidius, of Fortuna Primigenia, of Honor, Hercules, and Quirinus; alſo the Senat-houſe of women.

THe mount Quirinalis had very many Temples & Chappels, although the certain place where they ſtood is not ſo well known at this day, namely, one of Apis. That of Salus was painted by Fabius Pictor, and burnt in the time of Claudius. By Junius Bubulcus Dictator when he triumphed over the Æquians it was vowed: by him (Cenſor) put to making, and in his ſecond Dictatorſhip dedicated.

* Deus Trivominis Sabinorum.

* Sanctus, Dius, and Fidius, were the Sabins gods, which, when they left their native country and home, with all their other houſhold gods, they carried with them into mount Quirinalis. This god (forſooth) was in words and name three, in deed and truth but one, as they ſaid. Theſe three therefore had one temple built them upon this hill, and were called by one name, Sanctus. The opinion received of which godhead was ſuch, that an oath was thought to carry a great power of ſanctity and holineſs, whereby a man in that threefold name and one Deity, avowed and ſware thus, Mc Dius Fidius.

Domitianus, a Prætor or Lord Chief Juſtice within the City of Rome, built a Temple upon that hill to Fortuna Primigenia.

Beſides, in that mount were the Temples of Honor and Hercules.

Likewiſe the Council-Houſe of women was in the mount Quirinalis, at which in former times the wives and dames of the City met yearly upon certain ſolemn ſet daies.

Moreover, it is recorded, that the feaſt Agonalia was celebrated in Quirinalis.

CHAP. XXV.

The Court or Forum Archimonium; the pillar Tiburtina; the houſe of Martial; the Cirque of Floralia; the Temple of Flora; the ſhops of Minium, and the common aſcent called Clivus Publicus.

BEtween the hill Hortulorum (whereof ye may read before in the firſt book and the chapter next following) and Quirinalis there is a valley fourſquare, but lying ſomewhat in length. In that part thereof which lieth under the mount of Clatra and Apollo, was the Court called Archimonium. For the very Church of S. Nicholas, which at this day ſtandeth upon that place is named De Archimoniis.

Not far from it there is another place, to wit, Pila Tiburtina: There ſtood the houſe of Martial, as he himſelf witneſſeth.

Next to it followeth the round Cirque (Floralium) where yearly to the honour of the goddeſs Flora, the feaſtivall Floralia is celebrated. Now this Flora was a famous curtezan or ſtrumpet at Rome, who having by her whoriſh trade gathered a mighty deal of goods together, in her laſt will made the people of Rome her heir, with this condition, That every year they ſhould celebrate the memorial of her birth day. But the Senat thinking this a ridiculous mockery, to honour and dignifie ſo filthy a thing with ſuch a remembrance, they deviſed a goddeſs of flowers, forſooth, called Flora, and her upon thoſe holidaies they ſeemed to pleaſe and content, that ſhe would be good to the growth of trees and corn, and that they might do well in their flowring and blooming time. To this goddeſs we read that a Temple likewiſe was conſecrated: Anon you meet with the work-houſes where they make Minium, i.e. Vermilion. Near unto which was the Clivus Publicus.

CHAP. XXVI.

The hill Hortulorum, the Temple of the Sun, and the ſepulchre of Nero.

THis little hill (Hortulorum) containeth but a few things worth the writing. Among which is the houſe of Pincius a Senator, who gave the name both to a gate and a mountain, which in theſe daies are called, Mount Pincius, and gate Pinciana.

The reliques and marks of his houſe are ſeen in that very place, near the old wall. And about the ſame wals we meet with an huge building in form of an hemiſphere or half circle, which men imagine, was the Temple of the Sun.

Upon the ſame hill over-againſt the tomb of Marcellus in the very port way Flaminia, faſt by the monument of Domitian ſtood Nero's ſepulchre alſo.

Now this hill Hortulorum took the name of certain hortyards and gardens under it, which in old time, by reaſon they were continually ſo well watered were moſt fruitfull. Down this hill all they were wont (in times paſt) to deſcend into Campus Martius, who meant to ſue and ſtand for any Magiſtracy.

CHAP. I.

Of the flat plot of the City, and the Theatre in generall.

THat it may be underſtood more certainly in what place of the plain and levell part of the City every thing ſtood, let there be a ſtreight and right line drawn from the Capitoll, through Pantheon to Tybre, near the Church of S. Roch. So ſhall the City be in manner divided into two equall parts. The one ſhall lie from the front and ſide of the Tyber, the other from the Forum of Trajanus to the gate Flumentana, along the foot of the two hils Quirinalis and Hortulorum.

Begin we will therefore at the Theatre of Marcellus, and recount the places in order, as hitherto we have done. As for Theatrum, a Greek word it is, and in Latine may be aptly tranſlated Viſorium. The firſt Theatres were appointed among the Athenians, and thoſe in regard of husbandmen, who on feſtivall daies viſited the Temples of the gods: afterwards, at Rome they began to be taken up. The firſt, and that the greateſt of all others was built of timber by M. Scaurus: for, the concavity within would receive 80000 men. After it, were Theatres made to turn about and and ſhew their front one while this way, another while that. But as touching Theatres, ſee more in Caſſiodorus and Vitruvius, who have written plenteouſly thereof, and namely, by whom they were firſt ordained, and in what manner built.

CHAP. II.

The Theatre of Marcellus and the Library: the gallery and court of Octavia.

Auguſtus built many things under the name of others, as we find written by authors in ſundry works. And among the reſt was the Theatre of Marcellus his nephew or couſin by his ſiſter Octavia. A part hereof is yet to be ſeen between the Capitoll and Tyber, where now ſtandeth the palace of the Sabelli. It was able to contain 80000 men. See more thereof in Aſconius.

Hard by the very ſame Theatre was the gallery of Octavia, reared by the ſaid Auguſtus for his ſiſter Octavia's ſake. Therein were certain curious pieces of work wrought by Praxiteles, and namely, the raviſhing of Proſerpina. The portraiture of Bacchus & Satyrus. Alſo Apollo, Diana, and the nine muſes, the workmanſhip of Timarchides. Within this gallery or walking place, Pliny ſaith, there ſtood a chappel of Juno, and the image of the ſaid goddeſs. Faſt by the ſaid gallery ſtood the court or palace of Octavia, and in it Cupid portraied with lightning in his hand. It took up in times paſt as great a ſpace, as at this day the Churches of S. Nicholas in Carcere, and S. Mary in Porticu.

After the death of Marcellus, Octavia his mother ſet up a library near his Theatre. Now the firſt that ever ordained, That books of all learning ſhould be in ſome publike places beſtowed for to be read of all that would come; was at Athens Piſiſtratus the tyrant, and at Rome Aſinius Pollio.

CHAP. III.

The Cirque or ſhew-place Flaminius, and the Temple of Apollo.

THat this Cirque Flaminius ſtood in that place where at this day the dark ſtore-houſes and ſellars be, hard by S. Katharins church, the marks yet remaining teſtifie. Flaminius it was called, either becauſe it was built about the plain called Campus Flaminius, or elſe by Flaminius the Coſ. who was ſlain at the battell of the lake Thraſymenus. In it were the plaies and games exhibited, which they call Apollinares: and therein the horſe-runnings were performed. To it the Senat uſed oftentimes to come down from the Capitoll to ſit in councill. Neptune alſo had a chappell there.

Apollo's

Apollos Temple was in that very place, as it evidently appeareth, where now S. Maries Church is under the Capitoll, between the herb-market and the Cirque Flaminius, neer to the gate Carmentalis.

CHAP. IIII.

The Temples of Vulcan, Mars, Bellona, Hercules, and Jupiter Stator: the columne or pillar Bellica: the altar of Neptune: the gallery Corinthia: and the Colosse of Mars.

WIthin the Cirque Flaminius stood most famous Temples of the gods, to wit, of Vulcan, Mars, and Bellona, to wit, that which was toward the gate Carmentalis. Before the said gate there stood a marble pillar, which the Romans called Bellica, for it shewed when war was to be made. The Romans in old-time used and retained this manner in proclaiming war: The publike beadle, or one of the heralds called Fœcials, lanced a spear with some other ensigns of war, into that land upon which they meant to levy arms. But when after many conquests they had enlarged their empire and dominion, and that they were oftentimes to give defiance to nations far remote and distant, because they should not need to fling a spear or javelin, as I said before, into that land they did but stick one in the pillar abovenamed, on that side which regardeth that part whither they were to make their expedition.

To Hercules the Great, protector and keeper of the cirque Flaminius, they built a Temple in the same place: for his statue was there erected in the very entrance thereof, on that side where now standeth the Church of S. Lucy in the dark Apotheca.

M. Fulvius built another Temple of the allowance that he had of the Censors stock, to Hercules Musarum: for he had heard in Greece how Hercules was Musagetes, i.e. the leader and companion of the Muses. The same Fulvius translated the images of all the Muses out of the town Ambracia to Rome, and consecrated them under the protection and safeguard of that most potent and mighty deity, to the end that they might have mutuall help one of the other: namely, the quietness of Muses by the defence of Hercules; and the valour of Hercules, by the sweet voice of the Muses. This Church much decaied and disfigured by time, Martius Philippus, Augustus his father in law, i.e. his mothers husband repaired.

In the same Cirque they would have the Temple of Jupiter Stator to stand.

There also (as they gather by certain presumptions) was the altar of Neptune, which in old time ran bloud.

Octavius reared a porch or gallery, built and born up with brazen pillars, and thereupon named Corinthia. This stood between the Cirque and S. Nicholas Church, and was also called Chalcaria, i.e. brazen or copper.

The Colois or stately of Mars, at the Cirque Flaminius, was in the Temple of Brutus Callaicus.

CHAP. V.

The porch or gallery of Mercury: the Theatre of Octavius: his house, cloister, and gallery: and the Temple of Venus Victresse.

BEtween the Cirque Flaminius and the Tyber, in the very entry of the Church of S. Angell in Piscina, there is a porch or gallery, consecrated sometime to Mercury, or, as some would have it, to Juno. This being consumed with fire, L. Septimius Severus reedified. But the porch which standeth in the Jews street called Ceura, they say was builded by the Emperour Severus.

Between the gallery of Marcellus and the mount reared by Hadrian, Pompey was the first that built a Theatre to continue. For all others before were taken down when the games and shews were once done and past: and when need required, new were set up. A great part of this Theatre when Pompey had finished, comes Caligula and made an end of the rest. Afterward, Theoderick K. of the Ostragoths reedified it. This also received eighty thousand men.

Near unto this Theatrum there was a court or stately Hall called Atrium, the same which at this day they name Satrium; also the house of Pompey. & a porch before it. These edifices of Pompey, at what time as Philip exhibited the stage-plaies, were consumed with fire. Near to the same theatre the emperor Claudius of famous memory, reared an arch of marble for memorial of Tiberius Cæsar.

In the foresaid Theatre (men say) was the Temple of Venus the Victres.

CHAP. VI.

The bains Agrippinæ: Pantheon, and the porch thereof: also the Temple of good speed.

FRom the arch of Pompey, as you go northward, you shall meet with the baths Agrippina, the marks whereof are seen in that place which now of the inhabitants there, is called Cyambella. Now, Agrippina they were named of Agrippa who built them: See Pliny hereof in his discourses of Nature.

Near unto the foresaid bains, there is a Temple of greatest antiquity, and among other old Temples of the city, the noblest of all the rest, which at this day remaineth in manner whole and sound. Because it was dedicated almost to all the gods, they thought good to name it Pantheon. In form it was like the world, representing a sphere or globe. At this day they call it S. Maries the round. Of this the temple, Pliny and others have made mention, unto whom I refer the readers. In the very porch and entry of this temple, were the ſtatues of Auguſtus and Agrippa. The images of Mars and Venus. At the lappet of Venus eat, there hung as a pendant that moſt coſtly pearl of Cleopatra. Likewiſe there ſtood the image of Minerva, the handy work of Phidias. Moreover, Hercules at whoſe ſtatue the Carthaginians in old time uſed yeerly to ſacrifice mankind. They aſcended up to this temple as in the reſt, by many ſteps: for men in times paſt uſed to rear the temples on high and made but one way to go into them. A porch to this temple Agrippa joined: a peece of work worth all admiration, which of ſome was called Prothyron. For this word Porticus, betokeneth nothing elſe but an ornament or porch, πρὸ τῆς θύρας, i. before the dore. Herof alſo have authors written much. This temple firſt Hadrian the emperor of happy memory, and afterwards Antonius Pius, reedified.

Certain reliques and remnants four angled and ſomewhat long, of Good-ſpeeds temple, are evidently ſeen in the ſtreets of Minerva and S. Euſtachius. This god was long ago worſhipped, that all things might faſt out happily in the end. Portraied he was in habit of a poor man, holding in his right hand a charger, and in the left an ear of corn.

CHAP. VII.

The baines of Nero and Alexander: the Cirque named Agon.

BEhind S. Euſtachius church, between Pantheon and Lombards-ſtreet, the remnants are ſeen of the baines and vaults of Nero.

Neer unto theſe Alexander built others new (by conveighance of water into them, which they they call Alexandrina) and thoſe very fair and delectable: Wherof Lampridius hath written much.

Neer unto them (ſome think) were the baths of Hadrian: and they would have them to ſtand in that very place where now is S. Aloiſius church.

In the plain part of the City there appear moſt evident tokens of a long and ſpatious Cirque: which they call at this day Agon. It took that name either of the games Agonalia inſtituted by K. Numa in the honour of Janus, which in that ſhew place are repreſented the 9 day of January; or becauſe all manner of ſuch ſhewes and diſports, called by the Greeks Agones, were wont there to be exhibited. Some would have it to be built by Nero or Alexander, upon this reaſon, that other ornaments of theirs were to be ſhewed there. For the maner of the Princes and Emperors was, ordinarily to beſtow their monuments and memorials in one place.

CHAP. IX.

The temple of Neptune, Terentus: the Altar of Dis or Pluto: the mariſh Caprea.

ON the ſtrand of Tybre, where now S. Blaſes Church ſtandeth, ſometimes Neptunes temple ſtood. The ſame was rebuilt by Hadrian. Therein were the painted tables hung, were repreſented the ſhipwracks.

Terentus is a place in Mars field, ſo called, for that in it the altar of Dis was hidden: or becauſe the water of the Tybre running thereby, eat away and wore the banks of that ſide: or laſtly by occaſion of Evander, who arrived with a fleet in that place, and there abode. There alſo in time of the Alban war, they hid the altar of Proſerpina under the ground, that they only might have knowledg thereof, where it was.

In the ſame Mars field (ſome think) was the fen or mariſh Caprea, where Romulus in a tempeſt which ſuddainly aroſe, was taken away. Of which matter Livy writeth.

CHAP. X.

The houſe Corvina: the broad way or gate: and the temple of Iſis.

THe ſecond part of the flat City, reached along the foot of Quirinalis, from the Forum of Trajanus to the gate Flaminia. In which part neer the Capitol, was the houſe Corvina, built by that name and family, and to this day keepeth ſtill the old name; for commonly called it is Macellum Corvorum.

From that houſe unto the bars or railes in Mars field, extendeth the way Lata, retaining yet the antique name: and there ſtandeth the church of S. Maries in the broad way.

In the ſame way ſtood ſometime by report, the temple of Iſis neer the rails above-ſaid, where now is the church of S. Marcellus. Now this Iſis was a goddeſſe of the Ægyptians. She was honoured and worſhipped alſo at Rome, together with Oſiris ſurnamed Serapis: of whom the publick plaies in the quarter Flaminia, Iſeum-Serapeum bare the name. It hapned in the temple of Iſis that inceſt was committed; whereupon the Emperor Tiberius cauſed the Prieſts of that temple to be crucified, & the place it ſelf to be demoliſhed. Other temples of this goddeſſe there were at Rome, for Caracalla tranſlated all her ſacred rites and ceremonies to Rome, and daily with exceeding great reverence obſerved the ſame.

CHAP. XI.

The arch of Camillus : the temple of Minerva ; and the ſwine market.

AS a man goeth down from the broad-gate aforeſaid toward the Pantheon, he ſhall ſee a moſt ancient arch. Some think (but untruely) that erected it was for Camillus : for many a fair day after his time, theſe arches were in no requeſt and uſe : and therefore it belonged to ſome other L. Generall. Between this arch and Pantheon, Cn. Pompeius built a temple to Minerva, wherein he compriſed in a compendious ſum, the memoriall of his acts and exploits. Other enſignes alſo in the honour of the City of Rome, he there ſet up, and thoſe he garniſhed and adorned. Whereof read Pliny.

At the foot of the mount Quirinalis, in the hort-yards and the Columnenſes, neer to the aſcent & riſing of the hil which leadeth now into the mount Caballus, there was ſomtime the market-place Suarium, ſo called of ſelling of ſwine there. For Varro witneſſeth, that in old time they had certain ſet and appointed places for the ſelling of certain things, and thereof the markets tooke the name. Thus of oxen, the market Boarium ; of fiſh, Piſcarium, of ſwine, Suarium ; of worts or herbs, Holitorium, was called, &c.

CHAP. XII.

Of the field called Martius, or Tyberinus.

FOraſmuch as in the former book it hath been ſufficiently declared as touching Mars field, where it lay, it ſhall be needleſſe to make any repetition thereof in this place : but why it was called Martius, would be here in briefe conſidered. Named ſo it was, becauſe it was conſecrated to Mars : for when the Tarquins were expelled out of their Kingdom, what ground or ſtanding corn they were poſſeſſed of, they divided amongſt thoſe Citizens who were not landed at all, reſerving only this field Martius : which becauſe it was conſecrated to Mars, that in it the games and plaies ſhould be ſolemnized and the youth exerciſed, they thought that the fruit alſo there growing ſhould likewiſe be counted ſacred and accurſed, and ſo deemed it unlawful that any diſtribution thereof ſhould be made, but threw it all into the Tybre, wherof aroſe the Iland called Tyberina, of which we will ſpeak in the laſt book. In this field therefore (beſides the native beauty of the place and the delectable ſight of the medows) were erected the ornaments and ſtatues of brave & renowned perſons : yea, and out of the very Capitoll (when the place began to be peſtered and over-ſtraight by reaſon of ſo many ornaments which thither were daily brought, many of them were from thence tranſlated into Campus Martius. This field was called of men in old time, Tyberinus, like as Tybre alſo was named Martius.

CHAP. XIII.

The porch, the temple, Column, and Palace of Antonius Pius : the rails or encloſure, called Ovilia.

BEtween the Sciarra & Pantheon ſtreets, neer to Saint Stephens Church in Trullio, there ſheweth a ſtately porch, which moſt men ſuppoſe was that of Antonius Pius, for that his temple ſtandeth ſo neer. The Column alſo of Antonius is not far off. This he raiſed of an exceeding height with winding and turning ſtairs, like that of Trajanus, whereof we have ſpoken before. Between this Column and the porch, the ſaid Emperor had (by report) a goodly palace. Between the ſaid Column and the water Virgo, they ſay, the rails or encloſure within Mars field ſtood, called Septa. Now this place was encloſed within wooden rails, and ſtrongly fenced with poſts on every ſide, wherein the people of Rome when at the creation and election of magiſtrats they were to paſſe their voices were kept cloſe : and for the reſemblance of ſheep pens, Ovilia of ſome they were called. By Livy they are ſet down, neer the waies Fornicata and Flaminia.

CHAP. XIV.

The hill Citatorum : the Villa Publica, temple of Neptune, and the bridg in Mars field.

BEtween Antonines Colnmn and S. Laurences church in Lucina, there is raiſed a mount, called now Citorius, for Citatorum ; not it was a mount indeed, but becauſe the people of Rome, when in the chuſing of magiſtrats they were to give their voices, as they were cited, went thither as it were unto ſome hill. Some ſay it was called Acceptorum, of taking the peoples ſuffrages : others Septorum, for the vicinity of thoſe Septa beforeſaid. This little mount, there be that would have to riſe and increaſe by the ruins of ſome porch or ſtately gallery ; or elſe of the common Hoſtelry, called Villa Publica. For there was in times paſt a place called Villa Publica, a large building in manner of a court or hall ; wherein were received and entertained all embaſſadors of enemies, who might not be allowed either to enter into the City, or go into the publick lodging or Hoſpital called Græcoſtaſis.

Neer to the Septa, M. Agrippa (as Denis writeth) built a goodly temple with a moſt beautifull porch to it, in the honour of Neptune.

At this foreſaid hillock called Citatorum, and the Column of Antonius, there was a bridg faſt by by the Septa, whereupon they that were cited, when they had given their voices, passed by and went their waies: and so were severed from the rest that were to give their suffrages, because they should not be entermingled amongst them, nor be able to shew unto them, on whose side they had passed their voices.

In the same Mars field, it is recorded that in times past stood the temple of Piety, even whereas now the church of S. Savior is.

CHAP. XV.

The water Virgo: the lake and chappel of Iuturna, as also that of Piety.

THe water Virgo, which reteineth still the pleasant sweetness to the tast in drinking, and keepeth yet the old name, beginneth to gather to an head neer the bridg Salarius, and being carried in a most deep gutter entreth into the City at the gate Collina, and so is raised to the hill Hortulorum: where, by arched work it is conveighed through Mars field, and yeelds all the way to the inhabitants, water for their use; and endeth at the length in the hortyards of Lucullus.

Moreover in Mars field, there was (as men say) a fountain and well or cistern of Iuturna, sister of K. Turnus, yeelding most holesome water. This water-Nymph, they avouch (and that right well) to have been called Iuturna, a juvando, i. of helping; because she was thought to help the sick. The very place is at this day by a corrupt word, named Lavreglio.

CHAP. XVI.

The arch of Domitian: the obelisk of Mars field: the Amphitheatre of Claudius the Emperor.

THe triumphant arch, so dismembred (as it were) and bereft of all his ornaments, standing between churches of S. Sylvestre and Laurence in Lucina, and taketh up a peece of the way or street Flaminia, is attributed to Domitian the Emperor. And hereupon besides others presumptions) they appropriate it to him, for this emperor reared many such arches in every place.

The Obelisk also there is in this Mars field, which Augustus transported from Hieropolis a City in Ægypt to Rome. Besides, the native ensigns and wonderfull hieroglyphick inscriptions which it brought with it of the own, therein to be seen, Augustus adjoined other ornaments no lesse ormirable. But hereof it is better to read Pliny.

Claudius the Emperor built neer the Septa in Mars field an Amphitheatre, which he decked & adorned with fair statues and most beautiful columns.

CHAP. XVII.

The vale Martia; the palace: the porch of Augustus: the Naumachie of Domitian and the temple of the family Flavia.

THe vale Martia taketh the name of Campus Martius: it lyeth between Tybre and the hil Hortulorum: within the which, in a place lower then all the rest about it, appear the Naumachies of Domitian; where in old time he exhibited shews of naval fights. In which place beforetime likely it is, that Augustus had his Naumachie; which being cleansed and scoured by Domitian, reteined afterwards his name. Read Suetonius.

Neer to the Naumachie, was the temple (as it is thought) of the kinred Flavia.

In this place, Julius Capitolinus proveth that the porch and palace of Augustus was built.

CHAP. XVIII.

The Mausoleum of Augustus: and the two obelisks neer it: also the tomb or sepulchre of Marcellus.

IN the vale Martia, between the way Flaminia and the bank of Tybre, hard by S. Roches church, Augustus made a Mausoleum, to serve for a sepuchre as well to himself and all the Emperors, as also for his whole house and name. This building is like unto a turret standing at the gate called Populi, which sheweth it self spoiled now of all the ornaments that set it out. Men would have it to be the sepulchre of Marcellus. And Augustus, named this sepulchre of his, Mausoleum, for the resemblance it had of that of Mausolus K. of Caria, which Artemisia his wife built for him. Read Cassiodore Strabo, and others thereof.

Close unto the Mausoleum of Augustus, were two obelisks, as the ruinat remnants thereof do testifie.

CHAP. XIX.

The way Flaminia: the Trophees of Marius, other goodly ornaments of the field Martius in general.

CNeus Flaminius the collegue of M. Lepidus, having vanquished the Ligurians, paved the causey or street Flaminia. This was led from Placence, through Narnia, Fulignenum, Nucera, Callium to Fortunes temple, to Pisaurum, and so forward to Ariminum. See Livy and Suetonius.

Between the Mauſoleum of Auguſtus, and the hill called Hortulorum, were the Trophees of Marius over Iugurtha. Trophees as Varro witneſſeth, were ſo called of τροπή a Greek word, which ſignifieth, flight; for that the manner was to hang up the ſpoils and diſrobings of enemies put to flight and ſlain, upon trunks and poſts.

In Mars field, were the ſepulchres of Sylla, Hirtius, and Panſa, of Iulia, Britannicus, Druſus the Emperor Claudius, and other right hardy and valiant knights, beſide infinit ornaments more, whereof we have written before in this book.

CHAP. I.

Of the river Tybre.

IT ſhould follow by due courſe and order, to treat of Ianiculum and all that quarter of the City on the other ſide of Tybre: but becauſe theſe parts are ſeparate from the reſt of the City by the river Tybre between; thereof alſo it is meet to ſay ſomewhat briefly. And firſt verily the reaſon of that name ſhould be ſhewed. Some think therefore, that the river was called Tyberis ἀπὸ τῆς ὕβρεως. For the Sicilians when as in old time they had overcome the a Carthaginians in battel, and taken a number of them priſoners, enjoined them, for the better fortification of their own City, to caſt a trench about it, and to let water thereinto: and this ditch in reproach of their enemies, they called ὕβριν. And the ſame men upon a time afterwards, when as they encamped neer Rome, gave this very name unto this river alſo, whereas before it was called Albula. Some think it was named ſo of Tyberis a King of the Tuſcans, ſlain upon the banks thereof. Varro is of opinion, that it took the name of Tiberius, a neighbour Prince of the Veientians. In holy writings we read it Tyberinus. In vulgar ſpeech they call it Tyberis: in poetry, Tybris. In old time it was termed Rumon, as it were, gnawing and eating the banks thereof. Alſo at one ſide of the City it was named Terentus, as a man would ſay, wearing the banks. It ſpringeth from the Apennine, above Arnus. At the firſt it is but ſmall and ſhallow, but before it entreth into Rome, it (having received 40 other rivers) is encreaſed to ſuch bigneſs, that ſhips of burden and the greateſt hulks, may come up in it as far as Rome. This river divideth Tuſcan from Vmbria, the Sabins countrey and the Latins, entreth at the North part of the City, and ſo paſſeth through Southwards, between the gates Hoſtienſis and Portuenſis, leaving Ianiculum on the right hand and the City on the left, and ſo neer unto Hoſtia is diſcharged into one mean broad ſtream, and falleth into the Tyrrhene ſea. Upon the banks thereof, as if they were conſecrate to ſome divine power, it was not lawfull to ſet up any building. Certain warders and keepers there were appointed, for the chanell and the banks. But of this river, Pliny and others have left much in writing.

CHAP. II.

Of the bridges built upon Tybre.

THe Tybre, as is aboveſaid, being ſo deep as that it is navigable, and beareth the greateſt ſhips, hath no foord in any place that can be waded through; and therefore neceſsary it was to make bridges over it, and ſo to join that part on the farther ſide of Tybre, to the reſt of the City. Hercules, after he had killed Geryon, built a bridg, where afterwards ſtood that which they called Sublicius. Alſo before the foundation of the City, there was a bridg over Tybre, called Sacer; upon which they ſacrificed men to Saturn by throwing them down into the river. But when Hercules afterwards had put down that maner of ſacrificing, he gave order, that mens images made of reeds and bulruſhes (which they called Argeos) ſhould be caſt down in ſtead of them. But after the City was built, there were other bridges made to the number of eight; to wit, Milvius, Ælius, Vaticanus, Ianiculenſis, Ceſtius, Fabricius, Palatinus, and Sublicius. And all theſe, ſave the ſublician only, Totilas overthrew.

CHAP. III.

The bridge Milvius.

THe bridg Milvius, which men now call Molvius, ſtandeth upon the way Flaminia, a mile and more from the City. Built it was in the troubleſome times of Sylla, by Scaurus when he was Cenſor. Many a time they ſay it was caſt down, and as often ſet up again.

CHAP. IIII.

The bridg Ælius, now S. Angel, the Vatican or Triumphal the Ianiculenſis or Aureliauus.

THe bridg at this day called S. Angel, in times paſt Ælius, took that name of Ælius Hadrianus, for he built that brdg, and neer unto it a ſepulchre, which they call Moles Hadriani.

Beneath

Beneath this is another which giveth paſſage into the mount Vatican and the plain thereof, and thereupon they named it Vaticanus; alſo Triumphalis, for that over it they went up in triumph to the Capitol, to give thanks to Iupiter and rejoice. The piles are yet to be ſeen in Tyber, overagainſt the ſpittle or the Capitoll of S. Spirit. The third bare the name Ianculenſis of Ianiculum neer unto it, and Aurelianus of the port-way Aurelia, or the gate ſo called. Antonius Pius paved it over with marble, and being demoliſhed in the civil wars, was called the broken bridg. Afterwards Pope Xyſtus the fourth reedified it, and gave unto it his own name.

CHAP. V.

The brigdes Fabricius and Ceſtius.

BEneath the bridg Aurelius one furlong, over-againſt the Theatre of Marcellus, in the very midſt of the channell of Tyber, there appeareth a ſhelf or Iſland, this was united to the City by the bridg Tarpeius, ſo called firſt of the rock Tarpeia neer unto it, afterwards Fabricius, of L. Fabricius, who by that bridg conjoined the City and Iſland together. The ſame at this day is called the bridg of four heads, taking the name of four marble images with four faces apeece, ſtanding at the entry of the bridg, but that bridg which cloſeth the ſaid Iſland with the part within Tyber, was called Eſquilinus or Ceſtius in times paſt, but now S. Bartholmews bridg.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Iſland Tiberina.

OF this Iſlands beginning, we have treated before in the deſcription of Mars field. Livy and Dionyſius alſo ſet down this ſtory at largh. It reſembleth the form of a bireme gally, and where it is broadeſt, it is not above a dart ſhoot over, in length it containeth about two ſtadia or a quarter of a mile. This was in times paſt called Lycaonia, and was hallowed to the honour of Æſculapius, whoſe image from out of Epidaurus was thither brought. Of Æſculapius and his temple read Pliny.

A temple alſo of Jupiter ſtandeth in it, dedicated by C. Servilius the Duumvir, which had been vowed by L. Furius ſix yeers before the Gauls war.

In the ſame Iſland were ſick folk preſented unto Æſculapius (in the field.) And neer unto the temple of the ſaid god, was a lazar-houſe, for that this god was the inventer and maintainer of Phyſick.

In it alſo ſtood the chappell of Faunus, neer to the very river: but ſcarcely remain there any tokens therof. This Faunus (as men ſay) was reported to have been the firſt that conſecrated chappels and temples to the gods, and for this cauſe, all ſuch places conſecrated to the gods were called Fana. By the teſtimony of Cornelius Tacitus and Suetonius the ſtatue of the emperor Julius ſtood there.

CHAP. VII.

The Senators bridg called alſo Palatine, and that which is named Sublicius.

BEneath the abovenamed Iſland, as it were a darts caſt off, was the ſeventh bridg, Senatorum pons, of the Senators, alſo Palatinus, of the mount Palatine neer adjoining: and at this day named it is the bridg of S. Mary in Ægypt, by reaſon of S. Maries church neer by.

Now followeth the laſt bridg Sublicius, and which alſo is counted the moſt ancient of all others. This was firſt made of timber by Ancus Martius at the very foot of the Aventine mount: framed only with a floor of planks without any iron ſpikes and nails or props to ſhoar againſt it, ſo as in times of war and trouble it might be taken in peeces one from another. Now Sublicius it was called a Sublicis, i. great ſtrong poſts, But afterwards Æmylius Lepidus made it of ſtone, and thereupon named the marble bridg. Upon it in old time ſat beggers craving of alms of the paſſengers. From it alſo leud and wicked malefactors, were thrown down headlong into Tyber. This brigd as well as other, was often demoliſhed and built up again by one or other.

CHAP. VIII.

Of that ſide of the City which is beyond Tyber. The City and temple of the Ravenats and Fors Fortuna: the baths of Severus: the hort-yards of Cæſar: the water Alſietina, & the meadows of Mutius

THe region beyond Tyber in old time had the name of Ianiculum, the hill which overlooketh and commandeth the greateſt part thereof. We find it alſo called of men in thoſe daies the City of the Ravenates, who with a fleet having aided the Romans, were permitted to dwell in the Ianiculum, for fear leſt at any time that mountain and hold ſhould be ſeized and kept by the enemies. Now for as much as this quarter was enhabited by baſe people, ſuch as followed vile occupations, there were in it but few things worthy of any remembrance. Severus therein built certain baths: Cæſar made hort-yards and prepared alſo a fair pool called the Naumachie for ſhipfight there. Alſo the temple of Fors fortuna, was (in Tib Cæſars daies) dedicated in that quarter. The water called Alſietina, was derived out of the poole Alſietinus, by the high way or cauſey-

Claudia into the foresaid Naumachie, and served all those parts. This water was also called by some Augusta. See Frontinus, who hath written much of the Roman waters.

Mutius, who willingly had exposed and offered himself to die for the love of his country, was for that good service endowed by the people of Rome with land on the other side of Tyber. The place at this day is yet called Prata Mutia. Neer unto the Arsenal and ship-docks on the side of Tyber, were the plaies and games of Fishermen in times past celebrated.

CHAP. IX.

The sepulchre of Numa, and Cæcilius the Poet. The Tribunal of Aurelius, the Ianiculum, and the hort-yard of Marcellus.

THat the sepulchre of King Numa was under the hill Ianiculus a chist of his, with his books long time after digged there, do sufficiently prove. See Livy, Solinus, and others.

The Tribunall Aurelia, and the Arsenal was on that side of the Tyber, as appeareth by those authors.

The hill Ianiculus took the name of Ianus who there dwelt, & therein was afterwards buried. He also built a town or City there, as they say, so called. This Ianiculus was also called Antipolis as Rome Saturnia.

Commonly also it is received, that Cæcilius the Poet was under the same hill Ianiculus buried. Martial the Poet, as himself witnesseth in his first book, had most pleasant and delectable hort-yards in the same Ianiculus.

CHAP. X.

The hill and field Vaticane, the temple of Apollo and Mars, the Naumachie, the cirque hort-yards, and Obelisk of Cæsar.

THe mount Vaticane and the plain thereto, were without the City, in the parts beyond the Tyber, and in that very place, where at this pay is the church of S. Peter, and the Popes palace. Called it was Vaticanus, of the god Vaticanus by whose instinct & inspiration it was beleeved in old time that prophesies were delivered. And this god they called Vaticanus, for that in power was the beginning of mans voice, for as much as infants, so soon as ever they come into the world, presently pronounce and utter the first syllable of this gods name,  Va*.

Va from hence cometh Vagire in Latine.

The temple of Apollo was in Vaticane, in that very place, as men think, whereon at this day is S. Petronels or Parnels church, also another of Mars, wherein standeth S. Maries in Febribus, upon the port way called sometime Triumphalis. Gellius writeth, that Iulius Paulus the Poet had hort yards in the Vaticane.

The vale Vaticane is there also to be seen, wherein Nero enclosed a compasse of ground like a ring for to ride and break horses in. The conventicles also and wine-taverns there he adorned. Moreover, Nero had hort-yards in that place, which he set forth for divers and sundry punishments and tortures of Christians. All this place thus enclosed, he called the Cirque. Also the pools made for ship-fight, called Naumachiæ were there, and the Obelisk of Cæsar in the way Triumphalis is yet to be seen standing upright.

CHAP. XI.

The way or street Triumphalis, the water Sabbatina, the sepulchre of Scipio.

OF the Triumphall way, there hath been some mention made before. Called so it was, for that the solemn pomp of triumph used to go that way up into the Capitol. This as well as others was paved with flint stone. It went on still to the back porch of S. Celsus, towards the plain field of Flora: and so forward to the temple sometime of Juno, now S. Angelo, and from thence to S. Georges church in Velabrum. In the pontifical hort-yards there be many antiquities found, brought thither from other places: and namely, the protraiture and counterfet of Nilus, also of all sorts of creatures living and encreasing there. Likewise of Tyber, with the yeelding her teats to be sucked of the founders of Rome. Apollo with his bow and arrows; the statue of Laocoon, whereof hath been spoken before, Cupid hard by Venus. Many other things before appear in the gallery, and those hort-yards.

The water Sabbatina, was derived to Rome from the Sabbatine pool, called Angillaria: and afterwards when the conduct and conveighance thereof was by Hadrian restored, it was brought into the palace of S. Peter, to serve the priests there.

In Vaticane plain, not far from the mount reared by Hadrian, there stood a Pyramis or steeple in times past, under which they say P. Scipio Africanus lay enterred.

CHAP. XII.

The mount of Hadrianus, and the meadows called Quintia.

A*Elius Hadrianus* reared a huge and mighty mount for his own sepulchre neer the bridg Ælius, overagainst the Mausoleum of Augustus. In which were bestowed first his own ashes, and afterwards the relicks of all the Antonies. This is at this day the fort of the Popes. The same also is called the tower of Crescentius, because one Crescentius, a factious captain, held it a long time. See more in Procopius.

The

The meddows Quintia in the plain Vaticanus, took the name of Quintius Cincinnatus. Read Pliny hereof. Now they be called Aprata.

CHAP. XIII.

Of those things which either have been, or remain now without the gate Flumentana.

THe first thing presented to our sight when we are out of the gate Flumentana is the port-way or causey Flaminia: which, as we have before shewed, was by Cn. Flaminius brought along as far as Ariminum. Within the City he paved it with flint or peble: without he laid it with gravell. And in that order be all the port-waies laid about Rome. Upon this way Augustus made four bridges, whereof at this day there remain scarcely any tokens. Neer unto the causey Cæsar had a farm or manor house, which he called ad Gallinas. The reason of that name Livy sheweth. To the way Flaminia, another named Claudia joined upon which were the Hort-yards of Ovid.

The way Æmylia, made and paved by Lepidus the colleague of Flaminius, leadeth from Ariminum as far as Bononia. Now, two causeies there were of that name, the one which met with Flaminia: the other which Scaurus laid and made, which went through Pisæ and Luna to the Sabatii. In likemaner there was a way called Tyberina and Cassia, without the gate now called Viridaria, which passed along time by Sutrium, Tetrella, and Viterbium into the way Vulsinensis.

Certain places there be in the way Flaminia somewhat hollow and flat like saddles, called therfore Clitella.

Without the gate Collatina there is a causey of the same name.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of those things that are reported to have been without the gate Collina.

THe port-way from the gate Collina is called Salaria, because the Sabines at it brought salt into the City. There upon stood the bridg Salarius. And it reached to Numentana. In it was the temple of Venus Erycina, vowed by Fabius the Dictator, and dedicated by L. Portius. There stood the image of Venus Verticordia, so called, for that she averted mens minds from wanton lust. Likewise the temple of Honor, and an altar in it. Finally, the monument or tomb of Licinius the barber of Augustus.

CHAP. XV.

The things that either were, or at this day are without the gates Numentana and Intraggeres.

WIthout the gate Numentana, there beginneth a causey of the same name, by which men go to Numentum. The same is called Figulensis, of the potters furnaces there standing. The goddesse Nænia, which was wont to wait & attend upon funerals with dolefull plaints and lamentable mones, is reported to have had a temple without this gate. In like maner, other gods and goddesses, which are supposed to hurt mankind, they erected temples, but without the gate, because they should do the lesse harm: and namely, to the Fever, to Mars the revenger, to Nemesis and such other. Upon this way Numentana there appeareth a most ancient temple of Bacchus about S. Agnes church, and over the same standeth the bridg Numentanus, built by one Narsetes an Eunuch. Between this way and Salaria, was a withdrawing house in the countrey of [Phanotus] Neros freedman, in which Nero killed himself. Without the gate Interaggeres, was a tower or castle called Custodia, where the souldiers of Diocletian kept a corps de guard. There also is a park called Vivarium (now Vivariolum) to be seen, where divers wild beasts were kept, more for pleasure and delight, then profit and use.

namely of ill fortune and sloth.

CHAP. XVI.

Of those things that without the gates Esquilina, Nævia, Cælimontana, and Gabiusa, either have been or now are.

FRom the gate Tiburtina, there goeth a way of the same name leading to the City Tybur. Upon it there is a bridg Mamæus, commonly called Mamulo and bearing the name of Mamæa, Alexander the Emperours mother, who repaired it. A place there is by it called Puticola, of a multitude of pits there. Also the bridg Lucanus, without the said gate standeth over the river Anio. And without the same gate, the two riverets called Anio the old and new do gather a current and runto Rome.

Without the gate Esquilina are waies Labicana and Prænestina. In this way the water Appia hath his head and beginneth, which by Appius Claudius was brought into the City.

The water Virgo likewise, which in time past was shewed by a maid to the souldiers, is the way, and from thence is conveighed to the City.

But the Roman waters see Frontinus, who describeth right excellently, the source and beginning the conveighance and carriage, the end also and use of every one of them.

At the end of the way Calimontana, beginneth another called Campana, which closeth with Latina, the Between the gate Calimontana and Latina, standeth the gate Gabinsa. From which there there went away ſome time called Gabina, leading to Gabii (but it runneth ſoon into Preneſtina for that the Gabians dwell upon it.

CHAP. XVII.

Of thoſe things which were or are without the gates Latina and Capena.

THe gate Latina gave both name and beginning to the cauſey Latina, which through Levicanum, now called Val-montone, and Latium reacheth to Campaine. In which there ſtood in old time, the temple of Womens-fortune, and the image of the ſame goddeſſe. Of which writeth Valerius Max. In the ſaid way the water Tepula gathereth to an head and current. From the gate Appia, beginneth a cauſey of that name, paved by Ap. Clandius as far as to Capua, whereof look in Strabo.

At the gate Capena, was the temple of Mars the warrior, or Grandivus; and therein the ſcutcheon of Mars. Hard by the ſame temple was the ſtone Manalis brought into the City of Rome in time of a drought, and preſently there aroſe a ſhowr of rain; whereupon he was called Manalis. In the way Capena, ſtood the oratory or chappell of Dea bona: and neer to it, they ſay, that Clodius and Papirius were ſlain. Neer to the gate Capena, was the altar of Apollo, the ſacred grove of Honour, and the temples of Hope and Minerva. Like wiſe of Tempeſt, built by Marcellus. Moreover, another of Ridiculum: becauſe Annibal having there encamped, was enforced to depart from thence mocked and ſcorned. Upon the way Appia was the bridg Valentinus, built by the Emperor Valens, and thereupon, neer the hill Maſſica, ſtandeth the town Sinneſſa.

This way had certain notable ſepulchres, namely of Collatinus, the Scipios, the Servilii, Metelli Tullii, of Ennius, Pompeius, the Horatii, and other. And in that part is to be ſeen the plain, whereupon the Horatii fought that famous combat to the utterance. In it alſo there is a water and welſpring, conſecrated to Mercurie. To it upon a time when the people of Rome ran, every man dipped therein his branch of laurell, and therewith beſprinkled them that were next, with an invocation to Mercurie; that as many as had this aſperſion and ſprinkling, might be aſſoiled of their ſinnes, and of perjurie eſpecially. The grove alſo of Egeria was this gate. The way Laurentina fell into Appia: wherein S. Sebaſtian (by report) ſuffered even in the very place where they uſed to ſolemniſe the feaſt Terminalia, to the god of Meers and Bounds Terminus

CHAP. XVIII.

Of thoſe things that be without the gate Hoſtienſis, and others in gen era

FRom the gate Hoſtienſis beginneth the way Hoſtienſis which leadeth to Hoſtia, built by Ancus. This was called in old time, the gate of the three twinns brethren, or Trigeminorum: and without it, Livy ſetteth the purſe or marchants hall, Emporium.

In that part of the City on the other ſide of the water, were three gates, Portuenſis, Aurelia Fontinalis. At Portuenſis, beginneth away of that name, and leadeth to the port town Oſtia: where there was a temple of Portunus, the god of havens: and wherein the feaſt Portunalia was celebrated to the honour of that god.

From the gate Aurelia, the way alſo Aurelia taketh beginning; which along the ſea-coaſt of Thuſcia, leadeth to Piſa. The ſame was called Trajana of Trajanus who repaired it: wherein were the hort-yards of Galba the Emperor; and there alſo was his ſepulchre.

[At the gate Fontinalis, was the feaſt Fontinalia celebrated at Rome, namely, to the goddeſſe of Fountains, as ſaith Sext. Pompeius.

To the Reader.

FOr as much as Titus Livius is prolix and full of variety: and howſoever otherwiſe willing enough to ſpeak our language, yet moſt loth to forbear and forget certain Roman words wherwith ſo long time he had been acquainted: alſo for that now & then he ſaith one in his Engliſh tongue and in his French and Italian another; whereby he may be thought either to trip, or to have forgotten himſelf, and the fault imputed to his teacher: in theſe regards (me thought) I owed thus much for their ſake and converſe with Engliſh Livy, as to ſatisfie them in that behalf. A twofold Index therfore I have digeſted: the one directing and leading readily to the moſt material and principal matters conteined in the whole body of the Hiſtory: the other expounding thoſe things that may ſeem at firſt ſtrange to the moſt: and withall, ſhewing here and there the reaſon of the foreſaid diſagreement, hoping that as uſe will make them more familiar in thoſe ſtrange phraſes: ſo deeper and farther conference with him in the primitive Latine (the only touchſtone of his true ſpeech) ſhall excuſe and acquit me of juſt blame, who have endeavoured that he might deliver his mind in Engliſh, if not ſo eloquently by many degrees, yet as truly, as in Latine.

A Second Index,

Containing the expoſition of thoſe terms in Livy which are not yet familiar in Engliſh, and of ſome places omitted in the Marginal notes.

Whereunto the Reader may have recourſe, when he meeteth with any ſuch difficulty in the Hiſtory.

A A

Aulus, the ſurname to divers families in Rome.

Ædils, certain inferior magiſtrats in Rome: who were of two ſorts; Plebeii and Curules. Plebeii, of the Commons only, two in number more ancient then the other, choſen by the people alone to ſecond and to aſsiſt the Tribunes of the Commons as their right hands. This name they took of the charge they had of temples, chappels, and oratories; albeit they regiſtered the Sanctions and acts of the people called Plebiſcita and kept the ſame in their own cuſtody; and were clarks of the market: alſo they exhibited the games and plaies called Plebeii. Curules, were likewiſe twain elected out of the order and degree of the Patritii: ſo called of the ivory chair wherin they were allowed to ſit, as officers of greater ſtate. They ſet forth the great ſolemnities called Ludi magni, or Romani; were overſeers of the buildings throughout the City as well publick as privat, in manner of the ἀσυμνοι in Athens; they had regard to the Publick vaults, ſinks, conveiances, and conduits of the City waters; looked to the Arſenal, &c. Moreover, they had power to attach the bodies of great perſons; and were charged to ſee unto the proviſion of corn and victuals. At the firſt, none but Patritii might be advanced to this place: but in proceſs of time, Commoners alſo attained thereunto. Theſe as well as the Plebeii were Sacroſancti, i. unviolable.

Ærarii, they were, who being citizens of Rome, were by the Cenſors deprived of giving their voices in their Century or Tribe; paid all tribute with citizens according to the valuation of their goods: and ſerved in the wars of their own charges: and either becauſe æra pendebant, or, æra non merebant, it ſeemeth they took that name.

Agmen quadratum: Agmine quadrato ducere, is taken in a three-fold ſence. Firſt, The ſame that infeſto exercitu, infeſto agmine, or, inſtis ſignis: which ſignifieth the ordinary manner of enemies marching with banners diſplaied, either to a battail, or to the ſiege and aſſault of a fort: and this manner of phraſe addeth a grace only to the ſentence. Secondly, To march or fight in a four ſquare battaillon, though not alwaies with equal ſides & right angles: and the ſame not charged with the carriages at all. Thirdly, When an army is ſpread and diſplaied at large, encloſing the impedimenta or baggage in the mids, for ſafety and ſecurity.

Agraria, were laws preferred by the Tribuns of the Commons, as well for diviſion of lands (conquered from the enemies) among the Commons; as to reſtrain the poſſeſſions of the Nobles within a certain limit and compaſs.

Ambitus, The inordinat and exceſſive deſire to be in office of ſtate, appearing by indirect and unlawfull means; either to their friends and kinsfolks, or to the people: againſt which, many laws in Rome were provided; namely, Acilia, Babia, Æmylia, Licinia, and others.

Ancilia: Ancile was a buckler or ſcutcheon, that (as they ſay) fell from heaven into the hands of K. Numa in time of a plague: and he being advertiſed by Egeria, That it was for the health of the City, and ought to be kept ſafe; cauſed 11 more to be made unto it, ſo like, as they could not be known from the pattern: which hereby was preſerved. The keeping hereof was committed to the twelve Salii.

Annales, were brief memorials, Chronicles, or commentaries, containing the names of conſuls every year, the date of times, and all memorable occurrents hapning therein. The high Prieſts, called Pontifices maximi, had the charge by their place to gather the ſame into tables, and to ſet them up in their houſes for to be ſeen: and hereupon they were called Annales maximi, à Maximis Pontificibus; and not of their greatneſs, as thoſe huge volumes, named Libri Elephantini.

App. Appius, a forename appropriate to the Houſe of the Claudii in Rome.

Appia via, A notable ſtreet or high-way; begun by Ap. Claudius, reaching from Rome, as far as Capua: and afterwards by Julius Cæſar and Trajan, it was extended to Brindis in Calabria. Of all other it ſeemeth to be the principal, by the teſtimony of Papinius the Poet, who writeth thus of it:

Appia conctarum fertur Regina viarum.

Called it was Triumphalis (as alſo the gate Capena;) becauſe through it the triumphs ordinarily paſſed at the ſaid gate.

Ara maxima, The great altar reared by Hercules, and took the name of a great heap of ſtones about it.

Arbor infœlix, Is commonly taken for a tree that naturally beareth no fruit.

Argiletus imus, Is the baſe or low part of a ſtreet in Rome; in regard of the upper end thereof, called Summus: in like ſort as Janus ſummus & imus.

Area, is taken for ſome void place, whereupon nothing groweth, quia aret: as Forum boarium in Rome. Area quæ poſito de bove nomen habet, and differeth from Campus, for that it is leſs. Alſo a plot of ground made levell and clean for to build upon: as in Suetonius 26. Forum Cæſar de manubiis inchoavit, the Area whereof, (id eſt, the trimming and levelling of the plot) coſt H-S. millies, id eſt, 100 millions of Seſtertii. Laſt of all, the broad yards before temples, not covered but compaſſed about with columns, like a cloiſter with an altar in the mids, be called Area.

Aruſpices, were wiſards or ſouth-ſayers, directed by the bowels and inwards of beaſts killed for ſacrifice, called alſo Extiſpices, and in Greek ἱερῳσκοποι, who prying into them, had eſpecial regard of the liver; whereupon their whole Art and learning was termed ἡπατοσκοπία, albeit they obſerved alſo the heart, lungs, ſpleen, and kidnies.

As, or Aſſis, uſually in Livy is taken for a Roman poiſe, or coin in braſs, the tenth part in value of their ſilver Denarius. At firſt it was a pound weight of twelve ounces: but afterwards, the Sextans, id eſt, the ſixt part therof, was valued worth the whole: and howſoever otherwiſe it altered in poiſe, it went alwaies for 3 farthings or thereabout of our engliſh money.

Augurium. See Auſpicia.

Aurei Romani, Peeces of gold coin currant in Rome: in round reckoning equivalent to our ſpur-roial of 15 ſh. For 100 Seſtertii made aureum, which amount to 15 ſh. 7 d. ob. the 4 part of mina, i. a lib. in ſilver, and of an ounce of angel gold.

Auſpicia: Auſpices were properly the obſervation of the birds, either by their ſinging and flying in the air: or by their geſture and manner of feeding in their cavea or coup: whereby their Augurs & Pullarii knew in their learning, the pleaſure and will of the gods, whether they favoured their enterpriſes or no. The birds that gave ſign by their voice and ſinging, they called Oſſines. quaſi ore canentes, as the crow, raven, and owl: and therof came Augurium, quaſi avium garritus. Thoſe that ſhewed ought by their flight & wings, were named Alites or Præpetes, as the buzzard, eagle, crane, grype, ſwan, and broad-winged fouls. παντὶ ἰέντες. The good ſigns were called Siniſtra auſpicia quaſi ſiniſtima, quod ſinant fieri. whether they came from the left hand or the right. In pullets or chickens kept in cages, they obſerved whether they came forth willingly to their meat (for to abſtain from it was thought unlucky) whereas their feeding heartily, was a good ſign, and called ſoliſtimum tripudium, quas terripavium & terrapudium, when ſome of the meat falleth out of the mouth, & ſerram pavit, i. beateth upon the ground; as it muſt needs do, when they pecked either corn, or gobbets called offa.

B

Baliſts, were certain wars-like engins for to ſend out and level mighty ſtones, to batter and ſhake City wals, made with ropes of ſinews and womens hair eſpecially twined together: as appeareth by Venus Calva at Rome, unto whom, by occaſion that the women of the City parted with their hair for that purpoſe, a Temple was dedicated. According to the weight of ſtones or bullets that this engin would carry, they were called Centenaria, or Talentaria baliſta.

Baſilica, were ſtately edifices or halls at Rome; at firſt ſerving to plead in under covert, wherin they differed from Fora: and alſo to miniſter juſtice, of βασιλεύς, which ſignifieth a Judge, as well as a King: but afterwards they uſed to meet there in conſultation; alſo to negotiate and traffique: and theſe had not only benches and bars like law-courts, but ſhops alſo for the better ſort of wares and merchandiſe.

Bellona, The goddeſs of war; whoſe temple ſtood before the gate Carmentalis, and neer adjoining thereunto was a column named Bellica: from which the Romans were wont to lance a dart or javelin towards thoſe parts where they intended to make war: whereas in former times they ſent their heralds to the very confines of their enemies, to perform that ceremony.

Bigati, were the Roman Denarii, having the ſtamp of a chariot drawn with two horſes, called Biga.

Baotarchæ, The chief magiſtrats of the Bœotians.

C

C. Caius. Cn. Cneus. } The forenames of ſundry families in Rome.

Calends, was among the Romans, the day of the new Moon, which fell out with them ordinarily the firſt of every month: ſo named ἀπὸ τῶν καλεῖν, id eſt, a calando, becauſe the petty Pontify uſed then to call the people to the court Calabra, and there to pronounce unto them how many daies were to the Nones of each month, &c.

Candidati, were they that ſtood in election and ſued for dignities of magiſtracy: during which time, they wore whiter and brighter gowns than ordinary, that they might be the more eaſily ſeen and diſcerned a far off among others.

Cataphracti, as well horſe as foot, were they that were armed at al peeces with compleat harneſs: and ſuch horſmen were named Defenſores.

Catapults, were engins of war to ſhoot arrows or ſuch like offenſive weapons, far off: and by that name was called not only the inſtrument it ſelf, but the arrow or whatſoever was was ſhot out of it: as Turneb. writeth in his 15 Adverſar. cap. 1.

Cenſors, Magiſtrats of State in Rome: whoſe charge was to value and eſtimate mens goods, and enrol them accordingly in their ſeveral ranges. Alſo to demiſe unto certain Farmers, called Publicans, the publick profits of the City for a rent, and to put forth the City works unto them, to be undertaken at a price. Likewiſe to overſee mens manners, whereby oftentimes they would deprive Senators of their dignity, take from gentlemen their horſes of ſervice and their rings; diſplace Commoners out of their own tribe, diſable them for giving voices, and make them Ærarii.

Centuries, were ranges and degrees of men according to their worth, as they were aſſeſſed and enrolled by the Cenſors.

Centuriata comitia, were thoſe aſſemblies and elections, wherein the people of Rome gave their voices and ſuffrages according to their behaviour & wealth, by Centuries. And ſuch were at all times moſt favourable to the nobles.

Circenſes ludi (as one would ſay) Circu-enſes. For in the beginning before the great liſts and ſhew-places (called Cirques) were built, the plot of ground wherein were performed the horſe-runnings and other maſteries, was flanked of the one ſide with the river, and environed on the other with ſwords. Vide Turneb. Adverſar. lib. 3. cap. 5.

Ciſtophorus, A peece of ſilver coin in Greece and thoſe parts neer adjoyning, leſs than Drachma or Denarius: ſo called of the ſtamp, repreſenting a man carrying a panier or casket with holy reliques, in Cybeles myſteriis, in Bacchi orgiis, or Cereris imitiis. If it be true, that 7500 of them go to the Euboick talent, which containeth 4000 Denarii, it is juſt our groat ſterling: but if Denarius have proportionem ſeſquiquartam to it, and that 4 Denarii are 5 ciſtophors, (as Glarean collecteth out of Budæus) it cometh to our teſton of 6 pence.

Cloacina, ſuppoſed to be the image of Venus, found by K. Tatius in the great vault or ſink conveighed under the city, called Cloaca maxima. And for that it was not known what goddeſs it reſembled, he gave it the name of that place. Others ſay, it is written Cluacina, of the old word Cluo (to fight:) for that the Romans and Sabins (ready to ſtrike a battail) were by means of myrtle branches conſecrated unto Venus, pacified and reconciled, in that very place where afterwards the ſaid goddeſs was by that name worſhipped.

Coemptionalis ſenex, Paulus Manutius upon the familiar Epiſtles of Cicero, giveth this attribute to Scaptius in the end of the third book of Livy, whereas in all editions it is, Concionalis. Now theſe Coemptionales ſenes (ſaith he) were thoſe old men, in whoſe tuition and authority, men by their laſt will and teſtament left their widows or daughters; and without whom they might not paſs in Dominium virorum per coemptionem, i. be married according to the ceremony called Coemption, whereby the husband and wife ſeemed to buy one another.

Cohort, was ordinarily a band of 500 ſouldiers; although once or twice in Livy we read of Quadragenaria cohortes.

Comitium, was a publick place or Hall within the Forum Romanum, where the people uſed to aſſemble for audience of juſtice, pleading of cauſes, and other occaſions: whereupon Comitiales dies, were ſuch daies upon the which they might ſo aſſemble and meet together.

Comitia, or Comices, were the ſolemn aſſemblies of the people at Rome, ſummoned by the magiſtrats lawfully; to chooſe officers, to enact new laws or cancel old, by their voices: whereof were three ſorts.

Curiata, inſtituted by Romulus. Centuriata, by S. Tullius. Tributa, brought in by the Tribuns of the people: and the firſt author thereof was P. Voliro.

Curiata and Centuriata, were Auſpicata, i. performed with the ſolemnity of obſerving the approbation of the birds, and the Senators.

Tributa, were held by the Commons only, penes quos non erant auſpicia, and required neither Auſpicia nor authoritatem, i. the allowance of the Patres. And as in Comitiis Centuriatis, the richer and greater men had the vantage: ſo in Curiata and Tributa, the poorer ſort (for their number) went away with the better.

In the Curiata comitia, at the firſt (until S. Tullius his reign) paſſed the election of KK. and other magiſtrats, judgements in capital matters, and laws. But in later times, they ſerved only for two laws: i. de imperio, or, de re militarium; in which the conſul or others (choſen to their magiſtracy in Centuriatis comitiis) had authority of command in the army: the other, de adoptione; and theſe laws were called Curiatæ.

In the Centuriata comitia, from the time of Ser. Tullius, paſſed the elections of conſuls, Decemvirs, Tribuns conſular, Cenſors, Pretors, and ſuch greater magiſtrats; and confirmed they were by Curiata. Alſo, judgment of capital matters, & the laws named Centuriatæ. In this, there was one centurie drawn forth by lot out of all the reſt, to give their voices firſt, and that was called Prærogativa. After which, were called to their ſuffrages, the Centuries of the firſt and ſecond Claſſis, and they were named Primo-vocatæ: the reſt which followed, were called Iure-vocatæ.

Tributa, ſerved for the creation of Tribuns, Ædiles of the Commons, and other inferior magiſtrats. Alſo the laws as touching peace, or enfranchiſing allies, judgments penal and fines, and thoſe ordinances concerning the good of the Commons, called Plebiſcita.

Some have thought amiſs, and Curiata and Tributa comitia, were both one: but Curiata were more ancient, and of greater ſtate as being Auſpicata, and ex authoritate Patrum. Herein only they agreed together and differed from the Centuriata, that in delivering their voices, the Tribes and Curiæ were intermingled: wheras the Centuries were ſorted and gave their voice according to their degree, age, and ability in the Cenſors book.

Congius, or Chus, A meaſure among the Romans containing 6 Sextarii, and every Sextarius about 20 ounces: ſo that Congius receiveth X. libraleſ menſuras; as appeareth by the old pourtraict thereof in braſs, with theſe two characters, X.P. i. ten pound. Whereby in round reckoning it may go for our wine gallon or ſomewhat better. And for that great perſons were wont at firſt to give dole unto the common people, of wine or oil by the Congii; all other donatives and largeſſes of that kind, were afterwards called Congiaria.

Conſul, one of the ſoveraign yeerly magiſtrats in Rome, ſucceeding in the place of KK. ſo named a Conſulendo either of asking counſel of the people and Senate in State matters, and withal giving his own advice and providing for the good of the weal-publick: or elſe of judging, for ſo Conſulere ſignifieth; as when we ſay, boni conſulere. And Livy ſaith, that Prætores, Conſules, and Judices may be taken one for another. Two of them were uſually choſen every year, as appeareth by the law of the 12 Tables: Regio imperio duo ſunto: iique præeundo, Judicando Conſulendo, Prætores, Judices, Conſules, appellantor, &c.

Corona, hath divers ſignifications in Livy, Corona urbem cingere, i. to inveſt a City round about with armed men, and to give the aſſault from all parts at once. Sub corona vendere ſervos, i. to ſell ſlaves in open market, either having garlands on their heads as the manner was; or environed about with a guard of ſouldiers, which alſo is called Corona militum. Sundry garlands or chaplets there were moreover, called Coronæ, wherwith ſouldiers were rewarded by their captains, or they honored by their ſouldiers; (beſides thoſe that were preſented to Generals by their friends and well-willers, or offered to the honour of the gods:) as Obſidionalis or Graminea, which was a wreath of a cuich graſs called Gramen, given to him that delivered an army from ſtreight ſieges, and was by the whole army beſtowed upon that ſavior. Civica, made of oke branches, for him that in battel ſaved the life of his fellow citizen. Muralis, reſembled the battlements of walls; which he received of his captain, that firſt ſcaled the walls and mounted over in the aſſault of cities. Caſtrenſis, in form of a pallaiſade or rampier made with pales or ſtrong ſtakes: the honor of him who firſt entred the enemies camp. Navalis or Roſtrata, pourtraied with the ſtems or beak-heads of ſhips, called Roſtra: his reward that firſt boorded the enemies ſhip, and gave the firſt means of a naval victory: Theſe were the principal. For, others there were not ſo ordinary, as namely, Exploratoria garniſhed and ſet out with the ſun, moon, and other ſtars; beſtowed upon them that did ſpecial ſervice in eſpial and diſcovery of the enemies quarters.

Curiæ, were pariſhes in Rome, 30 in number, inſtituted by Romulus. Certain halls beſides, appointed for aſſemblies and convocations about Church matters and Religion: whereof ſome were old, called ſimply Veteres; others new, named Novæ. As for Curia Hoſtilia, it was the ordinary ancient place of publick counſel within Rome.

Curio, the Prieſt belonging to each Curia or pariſh aforeſaid: and Curio Max. the chief ſuperintendent over them all.

D

D. Decius, a forename: for Decius, although it were the gentile name of a houſe, grew afterwards to be a forename, as Paulus: and likewiſe forenames at the firſt, came to name families, as Poſthumius.

D. Decimus, a forename likewiſe, as of that Brutus ſurnamed Albinus, who killed Cæſar.

Decemviri, were magiſtrats, officers, or fellowſhips, ten in number.

Decemvirs legibus ſcribendis, were ten men choſen to make laws in Rome: who afterwards uſurped the ſoveraign authority, and tyrannized.

Decemviri ſacrorum, were certain Prieſts, who had the keeping and peruſing of Sibyls books of deſtinies, and thereout gave order for ſacrifices and expiation of prodigies.

Decemviri; ten Judges or miniſters of Juſtice, ſelected out of the great court or counſel of the 100 Centumvirs, and they were called, Decemviri de litibus judicandis: aſſiſtant they were to the Pretor or Lchief juſtice.

Dictator, a ſoveraign magiſtrat above all others in Rome, from whom no appeal was granted, mere abſolute and King-like: but that his time of rule was limited within ſix months ordinarily: ſo named, either becauſe he only ſaid the word and it was done, or becauſe he was Dictus, i. nominated only by one of the Conſuls, and not otherwiſe choſen, uſually in ſome time of great danger of the ſtate. He was called alſo Prætor Maximus: and namely, when he was made for the ceremony of ſtriking up or driving a nail: alſo Magiſter Populi, as Cicero 3 de fin. Moreover, he was ſometimes appointed to ordain and hold ſolemn feaſts, in regard that it had rained ſtones.

Duumviri, magiſtrats two in number, of divers ſorts.

Duumviri capitales, judges to ſit upon life and death: from whom it was lawfull to appeal to the people.

Duumviri ſacrorum, out of the Patritians, ordained for dedication of temple, preparing the ſacred beds for the gods, called Lectiſternia; and for the books of Sibylla: theſe afterwards were increaſed to five, and ſo to ten. See Decemviri.

Duum-

Duumviri Navales, two wardens of the navy, ports, and sea-coasts.

E

Epulones, were certain Priests whose office was to prepare and set out the solemn feast for Jupiter called Epulum, and for other gods. Of them were three, called Triumviri Epulones, and after seven, Septemviri Epulones.

F

Fœciales were the Heralds: of whom there was a colledge of 20, the principal of them was Paterpatratus, as it were their Dean. And according to Plutarch, he ought to be a man that had children of his own, and his father living: for having the charge of making peace and alliances, it behoved that he should be a person accomplished, and as well to look before as behind ἅμα πρόσω καὶ ὀπίσω, to regard what is past and what is to come: the one was signified by his father, the other by his children.

Fasti signifieth sometimes festos dies, i. holidaies: and in that sence Ovid entituleth his books Fasti, wherein he setteth down the ordinary feasts of every month. Otherwhiles they are put for law-daies, wherin the L. chief justice or Pretor might use these three words, Do, Dico, Addico, which betoken to give leave to the party for to plead, to minister law and justice between plantif and defendant, and to pronounce the sentence and award.

Flamines, certain Priests among the Romans: they took that name of Filamen, a filet of wollen yarn, that they used to wear upon their heads. Three of them there were Patritii, and those were called Majores, namely, Dialis, for the service of Jupiter. 2 Martialis, of Mars. 3 Quirinalis, of Romulus deified. Of Commoners were 12 more, called Minores, deputed to inferior charges, and the meanest of them all attended the service of Pomona the goddess of apples and such fruits.

Fortune a great goddess in Rome, entituled with many and sundry surnames.

Fors Fortuna, a goddess of Rome, whose temple was in Transtyberina region, where she was honored & worshipped of idle persons, such as professed nothing, but lived of their rents only, and namely, for that she came unlooked for and undeserved.

Fortis Fortuna, i. strong fortune, so called for her power, especially in battail. Publica, when she favoured the common-wealth. Mascula, good to the male kind, and Muliebris, to the female. Virilis, kind to folk of ripe years. Primigenia, gracious to the first begotten or the eldest. Equestris, either for running to help with great speed, or assistant in horse-service. Obsequens, pliable and easily intreated to accomplish all their vows and desires. Parva, for advancing mean and obscure persons to wealth and worship. Seia, for the kind and seasonable ripening of corn and fruit. Prospera, which was alwaies present and vouchsafed her helping hand. Mala, when contrary-wise she was backward and evermore crosled their designs. Viscata, for that many a one hath been by her enticements snared & entangled. Redux, ἐνέλπις, Bene Sperans, Respiciens, Propria, Virgo, Calva, Convertens, gratis τύχη ἐνεπτῶ, quasi æstuans, cæca, Vitrea, &c See Alexander ab Alexandr. Marlian.

Forum Romanum, or Latium, The great common place at Rome, wherein causes were pleaded, and audience given to publick Orations. Under the name of Forum were other places also and courts, as also markets, distinguished by their proper adjuncts, as Forum Boarium, Olitorium, &c.

Furca, Whereof slaves were called Furciferi, was a kind of fork or gibbet which slaves carried upon their shoulders when they were scourged by their masters, either about the Forum or Cirque: whereupon afterwards they were crucified and executed: howbeit, some think they bare it only for a publick shame.

G

Gabinus cinctus was a kind of habit and wearing of a gown after the Gabines fashion, when it was cast over the shoulder so backward, that it seemed to compass and gird round the whole body. In that manner the Consul clad, used solemnly to set open the dores of Ianus Temple, before he went to the wars.

Genius,] Genii were supposed to be μέσιται and pararii, brokers (as it were) between men & the gods, or rather interpreters and Salutigeruli, messengers between, of a middle nature betwixt the one and the other, Cœlius Rhodigin. lib. 2. chap. 3. But according to Empedocles, each one was thought to have his angel from the very day of nativity, unto whom they used to sacrifice upon their birth day, as to their protector. Also every place had their peculiar Genii, and then were they called Lares, as Rurales, and permarini in Livy.

Galli, Priests of Cybele that guelded themselves in a frantike fury, and used in their service to her, for to strike and beat upon tabers and drums.

H

Hasta, Besides the ordinary signification, signifieth the Centumviral or Decemvirrall jurisdiction in supply or assistance of the Prætorian, for that they set up a spear to be seen at the place of judgement. Also it betokeneth port-sale, when they sold either goods or slaves to him that would bid most at such a spear. Moreover, the putting forth of the Cities works, called * Ultro tributa, to certain Publicans or undertakers by the great, at a price, and it was called Subhastatio.

* ἐργολαβίαι.

I

I Anus is a God in Rome, ſometime repreſented Bifrons with two faces, ſignifying the time paſſed, and that to come: otherwhiles Quadrifrons, & betokeneth the four times of the year; having in his right hand a character reſembling 300, in the left another, ſhewing threeſcore and five, according to the daies of the year. But in the plural number Iani, betoken certain hals or great fourſquare buildings, with four proſpects and croſs thorowfares, whereof were divers in Rome.

Ides, Eight daies in every month; of an old word Iduo, to divide: for that they commonly fall about the midſt of the month, namely, upon the thirteenth or fifteenth daies, according to Horace, Idus tibi ſunt agenda, qui dies menſem Veneris marinæ, findit Aprilem.

Interdicted of water and fire, were they who for ſome crime were baniſhed. Which judgement, although it was not by expreſs ſentence pronounced, yet by giving order, that no man ſhould receive ſuch an one into his houſe, but deny him fire and watet (the two neceſſary elements of life) he was condemned (as it were) to a civil death: and this was called Legitimum exilium. But voluntary exile was, when a man to avoid the payment of a grievous fine, or impriſonment, went out of the way of his own accord, and left his native countrey.

Iugerum, which commonly I tranſlate Acre, ſeemeth among the Romans, to be in meaſuring of land the Baſis, ground, and foundation of all other meaſures in that kind; like as, the Aſs or Aſſis, of weights: of which it borroweth the terms in ſub-diviſion and multiplication, whereof the leaſt is Semiſcrupulum. Now is the Scrupulum in land meaſure fifteen foot ſquare, according to which, it may ſoon be gathered, how much Iugerum containeth, conſidering it hath that name, a duobus actibus junctis: by which reckoning it beareth 28800 foot of ground within the ſquare. But for that, others think that Iugerum is aſmuch as unojugo boum uno die exarari poteſt, i. one daies work of a yoke or teem of oxen: for want of another fitter word (except I would call it a journel) I have expreſſed it by our familiar term of an acre, which is not much under or over a daies work in plowing of oxen here in England.

Interregnum, or Interregency, is properly the time between the former King deceaſed, and the creation of a new: and he that ruled in the mean ſpace, was called Interrex. Which terms continued afterwards in the free ſtate when there were no Kings, in the caſe of vacancy of head-magiſtrats.

H-S. This Character compounded of two capital II, and the letter S. thus coupled together, is Seſtertius, that is to ſay, a ſilver coin among the Romans, conſiſting of two Aſſes and an half, and thereupon it hath the name Seſtertius as a man would ſay, Semis tertius, i. two, and half the third: and therefore you ſee the numeral note of two, and S. for ſemis, which is half. It is the fourth part of the Roman Denarius, and in value among us is three half pence farthing cue. But Seſtertium in the neuter gender, betokeneth aſmuch as mille Seſtertios, i. a thouſand Seſterces, ſo that decem Seſtertia ſignifieth ten thouſand Seſtertii, and decem Seſtertium is as much: for you muſt in this maner of ſpeech underſtand millia for the regimen of the Genitive caſe. But if you add unto Seſtertium the numeral adverb, it ſheweth the ſame Seſtertium in the neuter aboveſaid, multiplied a hundred times ſo much as the ſaid numeral beareth. For example, decies Seſtertium, is decem Seſtertium, a hundred times told, and as much to ſay as decies centena millia Seſtertium, which is a million of Seſterces in the primitive ſignification: whereby a man may ſoon reckon how much is millies Seſtertium and the reſt, either under or over decies. The ſame is to be ſaid of Numus and Numum, for it is the ſame that Seſtertius and Seſtertium. Moreover, decies, millies, and ſuch like adverbs, whether you put Numum or Seſtertium thereto, or no, is all one: ſo that by this form of ſpeaking, ejus bona fuerunt vicies, is meant thus, his goods amounted unto two millions of Seſterce peeces. Thus much for Livy and other Hiſtorians and writers in proſe: for I am not ignorant that Poets for the verſe ſake confound theſe two words many times, and put Seſtertii for Seſtertia, as Georgius Agricola hath well obſerved.

Iupiter Indiges, Indigetes were theſe called, aut quia nullius rei indigeant, becauſe they need nothing, or quaſi in deis agentes, i. converſing among the Gods, having been ſometimes men; or by reaſon that they might not indigitari, i. be named; or rather for that they were eaſy to be entreated; and laſt of all, quaſi in loco degentes & ideo propitii, i. the tutelar gods and protectors of this or that place: which I rather encline unto.

Iuſtitium, was the ſtay of civil juriſdiction and pleas for the time, upon ſome ſuddain troubles, as Tumultus Gallicus &c. Which vacation, if we will be ſomewhat bold, may be called not unfitly a Lawſteed, as Solſtitium the Sun-ſteed.

K

K. Kaius. } The forename of many Romans.

L

L. Lucius. } The forename of many Romans.

Latinæ ſc. feriæ, Certain holydaies Conceptivæ, i. appointed by the Prieſt or Magiſtrate, as occaſion required, and not ſet feaſts. The ſolemnity was publiſhed and held by the Roman Conſuls newly created, upon the mount Albanus to Iupiter Latialis: and a ſacrifice was there there offered which they call Latar, for the health of the Latine people: at which, the manner was to give a dole of fleſh called Viſceratio to the Latine States.

Lectiſtern, is in ſome ſort declared in the fift and two and twenty books of T. Livius, and is as much to ſay, as the ſolemn ceremony of trimming and ſetting out a bed, not for repoſe but repaſt, according to the ancient maner: wherein they laid the images of their gods, reared upon bolſters and pillows: the principal whereof was that in the honour of Jupiter at the Epulum Jovis, wherupon Jupiter was laid, Juno and Minerva ſitting of either ſide by him.

Lectus is uſually to be underſtood in Livy for the bed whereupon they laid themſelves at eaſe when they took their refection, and Triclinium is taken for Conclave, i. the parlor where they were wont to ſup, becauſe the uſual manner was to ſet three ſuch beds or pallets together: (whereof the room had the name) and a table raiſed ſomwhat higher from the floor, and placed ſo, as it ſerved all three pallets, and was open at one ſide for the ſervitors to come unto it, and either ſet meat thereupon, or to miniſter what was called for. Upon each of theſe beds there ſate or leaned ordinarily three perſons: ſo as nine was the full number of gueſts at the boord, according to the rule, No fewer than the graces, nor more than the muſes. For Horace in this verſe, Sæpe tribus lectis videas cœnare quaternos, ſeemeth to glance at the niggardiſe of that would rather want meat than gueſts, and ſo ſet twelve at the table which was but for nine, whereby alſo they were pent up together too ſtreight.

Legati, are uſually taken for Embaſſadors ſent from one Prince or State to another. Alſo for Lieutenants in an army, having the charg of a legion under the General, and in his abſence, the charge and command of all. Who likewiſe were ſent as Nuntioes or meſſengers of credence from the Generals in the field, to make true report unto the Senat, of the ſucceſs of their affairs. Moreover, they are oftentimes put for deputed-delegats, or commiſſioners aſſiſtant to the Coſ. or L. General, in matters of ſtate; having their principal directions from the Senat, but commiſſion to deal in the particulars after their own diſcretion: much like to thoſe that be called Legati à latere.

Libitina, the goddeſs of funerals; and after a ſort, the ſuperintendent over ſepultures; ſuppoſed to be Venus Epitymbia. In whoſe Temple were all things to be ſold neceſſary for the interring and burial of the dead. Whereupon they alſo who were employed to carry forth and bury corpſes, were called Libitinarii as well as Veſpillones; in Greek νεκροφόροι and νεκροδάπται. It is put for death in Horace, when he ſaith, Non omnis moriar, magnaque pars mei, Vitabit Libitinam: and in Livy, as well for the miniſters as furniture to ſepultures belonging. The Chappel to this goddeſs ſtood without the City, and a gate there was Libitinenſis, at which they carried forth their dead. For at Rome they might not commonly bury or burn a dead corps within the City, unleſs it were upon a ſpecial priviledge: and the law of 12 tables provided therfore in theſe expreſs words, In urbe non ſepelito neve urito: but in ſome barren part of their land, each man beſtowed the aſhes or bodies of their dead. The practiſe whereof is evident by many examples in hiſtories; and at this day are monuments ſtanding of their tombs reared neer the great cauſey Appia, and elſewhere about Rome. The conſideration hereof, with ſome other circumſtances of a place in the 3 book of Livy, gave me occaſion haply to tranſlate amiſs. There hapned to be a great mortality in Rome and the territory about it, not only of men but of cattel alſo; at what time as the Volſcians and Æquians were encamped within three miles of Rome, with a purpoſe to give the aſſault to the City; but they were ſuddainly ſtriken with a fear that they durſt not approach neer, tectaque procul viſa atque imminentes tumuli avertere mentem eorum, &c. where I have engliſhed imminentes tumuli, tombs & graves neer at hand, in oppoſition of tecta urbis [Romanæ] procul viſa: and the rather, becauſe it preſently followeth, In deſerto agro, inter tabem perorum atque hominum: where tumuli may wel be put for tombs and monuments; and [imminentes] neer at hand: as Livy and others do take thoſe words. But if any man would have it meant rather of the 7 hills of Rome commanding and overlooking thoſe houſes aforeſaid, I will not be againſt it, but rather my δευτέραι φροντίδες ſhall go with him: and pardon me I hope he will, if either there or elſewhere I have ſeemed to nod and take a little nap, Nimque opere in longo fas eſt obrepere ſomnum: ſeeing that I have taken my ſelf in the manner, and not ſlept untill my neighbour awaked me.

Lictors, in Livy, are miniſters or ſergeants attending upon the magiſtrats of Rome; namely, Dictators, Conſuls, Prætors: for thoſe only were called ſomtime magiſtrats κατ' ἐξοχὴν, as ſuperior to the reſt: ſo called (as Feſtus thinketh) quod faſces virgarum ligatos ferant, for that they carried rods tied up in bundles; which rods were of birch, willow, hazell, or the Carpine-tree, [a kind of Plane or Maple] and within them ſtuck an axe, all to ſignify whipping and death. Theſe officers made way before thoſe magiſtrats, and were miniſters alſo of the execution.

Lituus, was the Augurs ſtaff, much like a biſhops croiſier, crooked at the end.

M

Magiſter Equitum. Maſter or general of the horſemen. This was an office or dignity among the Romans, incorporate as it were in the Dictator alone, who ever had the abſolute naming and chuſing of him: and ordinarily narily he was subject to him, howsoever Minutius was by strong hand and a violent course of the people, made equal to Q. Fabius his Dictator. Commander he was under him of the Cavalry: also his Lieutenant-general and coadjutor with him in all executions. The same that Tribunus celerum in the time of the KK.

M. Marcus.

M'. with the note of Apostrophus, Manius. } The forenames of certain Romans.

Manipulus, in an army, was at the first a petty company of ten souldiers following one javelin, having a wisp of herbs or hay fastned to the upper end, as a man would say, an handful of men: used after, for a small band or squadron of souldiers: and Manipulares were they termed, who served in one such Manipulus.

Matuta, otherwise called Leucothea or Ino, the daughter of Cadmus. Into her temple, at the time of her solemn feast, might no maid servant enter: and if any did, they were sure to be beaten forth by the dames or wives there assembled; in remembrance of one Antigera, the chamber-maid of Ino, with whom her husband Athamas, as she thought, was more familiar than she liked well of.

Megalesia, were plaies or games at Rome, not (as the letter seemeth to import) Magni, which were Romani, but in the honour of Cybele the goddess, named also Idæa, Magna mater i. the great mother of the gods.

Multa decem millium æris gravis, &c. was no doubt, a fine of brasen mony set upon a mans head, after the weight of so much; every As weighing a lib. of 12 ounces. For before that silver was cast and stamped for coin, Æs grave plaustris ad ærarium convehebant (as Livy saith) when they paid tribute or subsidy to the City chamber, as they were assessed.

Mundus Muliebris, the Elegancy of women. Nam quem κόσμον Græci nomine ornamenti appellaverunt, cum non perfecta al solutaq; elegantia mundum.i. the world. Plin. first book fourth chapter.

Murcea or Murtia, one of the names attributed to Venus, quia prater modum, non moveret sed faceret hominem murcidum.i. nimis desidiosum & inactuosum: contrary to that other goddess Agenoria. quæ ad agendum excitaret. And hereupon it is that Murtea is put for the goddess of sloth and litherness.

N

Novæ tabulæ, was an easment proposed in favour of debters at Rome, whereby the old debt-books and obligations were cancelled, or the Nomina dashed out. Among the Athenians this practise was called Sisacthia.i. an easing of burden, or Chreocopia, a cutting off or striking out of debts.

N. Numerius, a forename to some houses of Rome.

Nundinæ, were the market daies appointed every ninth day at Rome, for the peasants of the country to repair unto the City, to sell commodities or to buy their necessities. And hereupon Trinundinum, is the space of 27. daies, comprehending three market daies.

Nones, were daies in the month so called, because they began the 9th day ever before the Ides: honored by the Romans both for the birthday of K. Servius, and also for the chasing out of the KK. for otherwise it was not festival (as Ovid saith) Nonarum tutela Deo caret.

O

Ovales or Ova, were eggs set upon the goles in the solemnity of the horse-running, at the plaies Circenses, to reckon or score up (as it seemeth by Livy) the races, which were performed with 24 courses, to represent four and twenty hours of the day. Neither was it for nought, that choise was made of egs, rather than other things: for as egs are laid by birds (the swiftest of all other living creatures) so they also were to contend and strive to be most active, &c. or else because Castor & Pollux (those renowned horsemen) came of an egg, as Poets fable.

P

P. Publius, a forename to some Roman families.

Panætolium or Panætolaik, was a solemn diet or counsel, wherein all the states of Ætolia assembled to consult of publick affairs.

Patres, were at Rome 100 Senators or Noblemen, counsellers of state; chosen in this manner: 3 out of every one of the 30 Curio, and those make 90; 3 more out of each tribe, (which then were but three) and one by Romulus himself: and as this number made the body of the Nobility or Senat at the first; so, out of every Curia, he chose ten of the most personable and active yong men, to the number of 300, (which he called Celeres) to guard his person. From whence came the order of the knights or gentlemen of Rome; a mean degree between the two estates of Nobles and Commons, as it were the seminary, to replenish the Senat, when the places were void, and to augment the number of them. These were called Patres Conscripti, Ascripti, & Selecti. And like as the former were named Patres Majorum gentium; so the latter sort, Minorum gentium; alluding to the several ranges of the gods, who were some of them, Majorum gentium, such as ever were counted in heaven; termed also Selecti: others, Minorum gentium, who had been men, and were after canonized gods. The off spring and progeny of the Patres, were Patritii, in opposition evermore of Plebei, i. Commoners.

Porticus, were either the porches & other stately buildings before temples, as belonging unto them: or else goodly galleries and walking places apart by themselves; under which men retired in the rain, and where they used to walk to cool themselves in summer.

Præda, booty, pillage, or saccage in the own kind, as it was gotten from the enemy, to wit, slaves, prisoners, beasts, goods, armor, &c. Manubia, the mony raised of such pillage or prey, sold.

Prætor, one of the superior magistrats of Rome. In the City he ruled as L. chief justice: in the province he commanded as L. governor and deputy; and was General in the field as well as the Consul. At first, the name of Consul, Pretor, and Judges, was all one.

Prærogativa centuria, were those centuries in Comitiis Centuriatis, which by lot had the first place in giving their voices: the rest that followed, were called Primo-vocata and Iure-vocata, and delivered their suffrages in their course.

Prætexta toga, a robe embrodered of purple, common to men and women, Ingenuitatis insigne, & ornamentum. Cicero in Verrem. 3. Whereby it appeareth, that it was allowed but to certain persons; and, as P. Manutius writeth, to 6 sorts.

1 The children of the Patritii, until 17 years age. 2 All Senators upon festival daies. 3 Wardens at the games or plaies called Compitalitii. 4 All magistrats, as well in the City, as in the colonies or borrough Towns incorporate, called Municipia, and Masters of Confraternities. 5 All Priests, and among them, the Augurs. 6 They that triumph. And this differed from the rest, being wrought with gold and damask work.

It seemeth that these differed likewise one from the other, in the manner of the guarding: laid broader or narrower: as also in the rich or deep colour, wherupon they were called Dibaptra: or that some of these robes were all one purple, other but parcel. And wheras the gentlemen of Rome are said Purpuram induere, it is to be understood either of angusti-clavus, or else of some lighter colour, as the violet, and not of that rich red purple, which is scarlet. For that robe which was done upon our Saviour Christ, * one of the Evangelists called κοσκίνω, and other two, ποφύρεαν.

Pullarius, the Chickmaster or pullitier: one that had the charge and overseeing of the sacred chickens, kept in a pen or coup for auspicia: who by observing their gesture or feeding betimes every morning, related what was foretokened thereby good or bad. See more in Auspicia.

Pro-consul. Pro-pretor. Pro-questor. Some have thought, that they should be writtē otherwise thus, Pro consule. Pro pretore. Pro questore. but they are in mine opinion out of the way: for in deed Pro-consul is he, who having bin Consul, went out of his magistracy at the years end, and nevertheless was sent forth into his Province again with full Consular authority: whereas Pro-consules (to speak precisely) is the Viz-consul, namely, one that having never been Consul created, but some privat person, yet upon an urgent occasion, might for the while supply the place of the Consul. The same is to be said of the rest. And hereof you may read in the oration of Cicero, pro lege Manilia. Howbeit in my translation of Livy, I have somtime used Viz-pretor and Viz-consul, for Pro-pretor and Pro-consul: because that manner of composition frameth well with our terms in English. Moreover, we read once in Livy of a Pro-dictator, in the proportionable signification to the other.

Q

Quadrigati, were the Denarii Romani, having the stamp of a chariot drawn with four horses, called Quadriga.

Quadrans, a peece of base brass coin or poise at Rome, the fourth part of As, which is a cue and a c.

Quæstors, were inferior officers in Rome, as treasurers to receive and lay out the City-mony, whereof there were Urbani, Provinciales, and Castrenses.

Quæstorium, a plot or quarter in the Roman camp, where the treasurer lodged and other officers of the camp.

Q. Quintus, the forename of sundry Romans.

Quindecemviri, the same that Duumviri first, and Decemviri sacris faciundis. Their number was 15, and albeit they were encreased by Sylla Dictator to 60, yet they retained stil the name of Quindecemviri.

Quintana was a gate in the Roman camp, at which, provision was brought in to serve the market. Read the annotation in the end of English Tacitus.

Quinqueviri Mensarii, were certain men, five in number, appointed upon occasion to discharge the debts of the commons, so called of Mensa, a table set out in publick place; upon which they either counted or weighed their mony.

Quinqueviri muris reficiendis, were five officers at Rome chosen extraordinarily for repairing of the walls and turrets of the City.

Quinquatrus or Quinquatria, were certain feasts and games at Rome in the honor of Minerva. They continued five daies, and began the fift day after the Ides of March. i. the 20 of March: and these were called Quinquatrus Majores. For others named Minores, fel about the Ides of June, and that was the minstrels holiday, as appeareth in the ninth of Livy. * Math. 27. * Marc. 15. Iohn 19.

Quintilis, the month of July, before Iulius Cæsars time.

Quirinalia, was a festival day to Quirinus, appointed for them to sacrifice, who had neglected or missed to do divine service in their parish at the feast Fornacalia: and it was called the fools holiday; for that they were ignorant of the time of the former feast, or knew not their own Curia.

Quirites, the name appropriate to the citizens of Rome: and so they loved to be called within the City: but in the camp, if the General gave them that term, it was taken for a great disgrace unto souldiers and men of arms.

Rorarii, were light armed footmen, reſembling our forlorn hope: ſo called à rore. i. Dew. For like as there falleth commonly a driſling dew before a good ſhour of rain: ſo theſe Rorarii skirmiſhed looſly, before the legionary ſouldiers came to the battail.

Roſtra, were three-tined pikes of braſs, ſet in the noſe or beak-head of war-ſhips to offend the enemy, as appeareth by Virgil, Roſtriſq; tridentibus: and thereupon by Synecdoche, the ſtems of ſhips were ſo called. And for that the publick pulpit for orations at Rome, was reared and adorned with ſuch, it alſo was called Roſtra.

Rudera, [Cum milites religione tacti rudera jacerent.] To make ſenſe of this place, I have tranſlated Rudera, peeces of braſs mony: for that I cannot ſee what ſhould be meant by rubbiſh ſtone in that place, which was not demoliſhed by Annibal, for any thing that I can find; but only robbed of the ſilver & gold within the chappel of Feronia: in ſtead whereof were found aris acervi: by reaſon that the ſouldiers, who had ſome ſence of religion & touch of conſcience (whereof their leader Annibal had never any) caſt from them [Rudera.] Now, probable it is that Rudera, is corruptly put for æra, the later end of the word: or if we admit Rudera: it is well known that Rudus as well as æs ſignifieth braſs and braſen mony, as appeareth by Ruduſculum the diminutive: for as of æs came Æſculum, ſo of Rudus (no doubt) Ruduſculum: and like as of Æſculum, Æſculanus, a god of the Painims, father of Argentinus (becauſe copper & braſs mony was before ſilver coin:) ſo, of Ruduſculum, the gate Ruduſculana in Rome, ſet out with braſs. Now that Ruduſculum is put for a ſmall peece of braſs coin, it is proved by the form of words in buying and ſelling, and in manumiſſion (Ruduſculo libram ferito) which is all one with ære Libram percute or feri. By which I collect that Rudera in this place may ſtand for æra, i. peeces of coin. For there went afore, æris acervi, which Horace putteth for heaps of braſs mony, and not for braſen images. And well it may be, that the ſouldiers upon ſome devotion, threw into the Church their oblations of ſuch mony as they had in their belts or bandoliers. This conjecture & conſtruction of mine may ſerve, untill ſomewhat here may be made of rubbiſh ſtone, or better expoſition come in place. The word (I am ſure will bear it,) and the context in all ſence and congruity, doth require it.

Salutare Deos] after a devout and reverent manner they bowed unto the Idols or gods of the heathen as they paſſed by, and withal, touched their hands: which Lucretius ſheweth in theſe verſes,

——— Tum portas propter, aliena
Signa manus dextras oſtendunt attenuari
Sæpe ſalutantum, tactu præterque meantum.

Sceleratus Vicus, a ſtreet in Rome named beforetime Cyprius, which in the Sabine language ſignifieth [good:] but upon occaſion of a wicked act committed therein, it was by the contrary, called Sceleratus.

Seceſſion, was a general inſurrection and revolt of the commons in Rome, wherein they left the City, until ſuch time as they had the authority of their Tribuns ſtrengthned and confirmed: yea, and certain laws enacted and eſtabliſhed by a ſolemn oath, with a curſe denounced to all them that went about to abrogate or aboliſh the ſame: which thereupon were called Sacratæ leges.

Sex. Sextus.
Serg. Sergius. } All, forenames to Ro-
Serv. Servius. } mans

Sextilis, the month of Auguſt, ſo called by the Romans before Auguſtus Cæſar his daies, for that it was the ſixt in number: as Quintilis the fift, beginning at March.

Suburra. 97 a. In Iuventutem graſſantem in Suburra. It might well be that yonkers there made a fray or committed ſome riot and felony: for it was a ſtreet moſt of all others frequented; and beſides, in it kept ſtrumpets and curtiſans, like enough to give occaſion of much quarrel & miſrule among youth, as appeareth by Iuvenal and Martial in this Diſtichon.

Fama non nimium bona, puellæ,
Quales in media ſedent Suburra.

Suffrages, were the voices of the people given by Centuries, Curiæ, or tribes, which in Rome went affirmatively under this form, Uti rogas, i. be it according to your bill: and negatively thus, Antiquo, i. I deny or reject it.

Sordidati, were they that changed their weed in reatu. i. (whiles either themſelves or their friends were in trouble and danger of judgment) that is to ſay, put off white, which was the ordinary colour, and did on black: but if they changed their apparel upon ſorrow and mourning for the loſs of friends or any publick calamity, they were called rather Pullati and Atrati.

Sella Curulis, a ſeat or chair of eſtate. One of the regal ornaments at Rome, belonging to the Kings firſt: afterwards, during the free ſtate, uſed by Dictators, Conſuls, Pro-conſuls, Pretors, and Propretors, Cenſors and Ædiles, namely, thoſe called curules, for diſtinction from thoſe that were Plebeii: and laſt of all, by the emperors in the time of the monarchy. This chair was made of Ivory: on which the aboveſaid magiſtrats uſually ſat, not only in the Senat-houſe when they conſulted or gave audience, or when they beheld the publik games & plaies, & rode either in triumph, or otherwiſe in the ſtreets, mounted upon their Chariots; but alſo at home within their private houſes, & wherſoever elſe it pleaſed them: & this badge or enſign of honor they had both in time of their magiſtracy, & afterwards: &

as ſuch Senators were called Curules (for the reſt, who had not attained to thoſe dignities, they named Pedanei, as ſome think, for that they went on foot to the Senat or places before mentioned) ſo thoſe magiſtrats likewiſe aboveſaid, were entituled by the name of Curule. And Curulis was that chair called either of Currus a chariot, for that they ſate thereupon within their chariots; or, quaſi Curva, becauſe it was made crooked or curbwiſe, like unto our folding chairs.

Senator, A Counſellor of ſtate. A name it was of honor, and not of age, as the word implieth: for to that place men attained often times very yong. Senat was the body of that degree and common Councel, oppoſite unto Plebs at Rome, namely, when it was biceps and the whole people comprehended under Senatorius ordo and Plebeius.

Sextans, a ſmall braſen peece of mony at Rome, which being the ſixt part of As, cometh to a cue or half a farthing.

Sextarius was the Baſis of meaſures in Rome, as As of weights: and look how As was divided into twelve ounces, ſo Sextarius into twelve cyathi, and in meaſures Sextans was the ſixth part of Sextarius, which weighed twenty ounces, much about a wine pint and a half among us.

Of Sibyls books ſo often mentioned in Livy, which being three in number, were bought of Sibylla by King Tarquin the proud, at the price of nine, after ſhe had burned ſix of them before his face: which books were kept diligently in the Capitol: and wherout the Decemvirs by their learning made report of the will and pleaſure of the gods, See A. Gellius, 1 book 19 chapter.

Signum, was the general name of all the enſigns in the field. But Aquila more particularly was the main ſtandard to a whole legion: ſo called, for that upon the top of a ſpear was reared and faſtned an Eagle in ſilver at full relief, and the ſame ſometime was gilded ſtanding upon a baſe or footſtal of the ſame mettal. The other enſigns, as well of cohorts, which were bands of five hundred men uſually, as of centuries, i. companies of hundred, named more eſpecially Vexilla, and were generally called Signa, had the portaiture of Minotaures, wolves, bores, horſes, dragons, with ſundry other devices according to the fancy of the Colonels or captains, containing alſo the name of the cohort or Century, and the legion to which they belonged.

Talentum Atticum, As wel ponderale which was weighed, as numerale or nummarium, which was counted in mony, was of two ſorts: The leſs, of ſixty pound Attick, and every one of them conſiſted of a hundred Drachmæ or Denarii Romani. If Mina then, be three pound two ſhillings ſix pence, ſterling, the leſs talent Attick amounteth to 187 pound ten ſhillings of our Engliſh mony. The greater, or ſimply the great, talent, in Livy, is fourſcore minæ, and hath proportionem ἐπιτρίτου or Seſquitertiam, ad minus, which cometh to two hundred and fifty pound ſterling. Now was the Euboick talent (whereof Livy alſo ſpeaketh) half of Talentum majus Atticum.

T. Titus. A forename to many houſes of the Romans.

Teſtudo, A target-fence, which the legionary Romans ſouldiers, made either in the open field when they were overcharged with their enemies, or in approaching the walls of Towns to give aſſault. In the former, after they had encloſed within them their baggage and light armed men, they reſted themſelves upon their knees, with their targets cloſe couched together over their heads, to avoid the enemies ſhot: and after they had well breathed they would riſe up all at once again, freſh and luſty to a new skirmiſh. In the later, they had the like target-roof, but pent-houſe wiſe, one overlapped the other after the manner of tiles, and ſo they ſcaled walls without offence from above.

Templum hath in Livy three ſignifications. 1. a ſacred houſe or chappel dedicated to ſome god or goddeſs for divine ſervice, as the temple of Jupiter in the Capitol, &c. 2. An open place, from whence a man might ſee all about him, as having nothing to hinder his proſpect, and which likewiſe might be ſeen from all parts, whereof cometh the verb Contemplari, i. to behold. And ſuch did the Augurs chuſe for to take their ſigns of bird-flight. 3. Any place hallowed, although not for divine ſervice, yet for debating of ſerious human affairs, as their Curiæ and Counſel-Chambers, yea, and the Roſtra at Rome.

Thalaſſio, An Auſpicate or lucky word uſed at Bridals or weddings in Rome, like to this among the Greeks. ὑμὼ ὦ ὑμέναε, ὦ ὑμὼ Hymen, O Hymenæe, hymen, &c. Catul.

Thenſa, wherof Livy writeth in the fifth & ninth books, were certain petty chariots or dreyes of ſilver or ivory, carrying the images and ornaments of their gods in great pomp upon certain high daies: and they who led the horſes drawing the ſame, wore their richeſt apparel, holding in their hands and training the falſe reins ſtretched out at length in ſolemn wiſe, whereupon Feſtus thinketh they took the name Thenſa quaſi Tenſa.

Trabea was a roial robe or mantle of eſtate, all of deep purple or ſcarlet only, at the firſt: but afterwards, embrodered richly with gold. Livy ſeemeth to confound it with Veſtis purpurea, Picta, Palmata, and Triumphalis. And in truth, all one they were in the principal ſubſtance and matter thereof, namely purple or ſcarlet: but different in the ſetting out, being embrodered with gold, more or leſs, diſtinguiſhed alſo with white among (for that was a roial colour) as may appear by the diadem, which was a white wreath, or band done about the head of Kings, or in the manner of the work: for either it was palmata, ſo called called à latitudine claverum, i. of the broad buttons of gold, ad inſtar palmarum, i. to the bredth of ones hand, as Feſtus thinketh: or branched and damasked with flour-work, like to the date-tree: or elſe picta, i. of tiſſew or embrodery.

Tribuns of the Commons were certain Magiſtrats, as Provoſts or Protectors of the Commons, to reſtrain and keep down the exceſſive power of the nobility; choſen and confirmed by the general oath of the people, whereby they were Sacroſancti, i. ſacred or inviolable, and no violence might be done to their perſon. They had a negative voice and power of inhibition, called Interceſſio, whereby they might croſs and ſtop the proceedings of the Senat, or any magiſtrat, ſave only the Dictator: even the very Conſuls, whom in ſome caſe they might command.

Tribuns military in Conſuls authority, or Conſulary, governed the ſtate of Rome many years in ſtead of Conſuls.

Tribuns military in the army, were Colonels over a thouſand.

Tribuni erarii, were the keepers of the City chamber or common Treaſure, as it were, the maſters of the exchequer.

Tribes in Rome, firſt three, containing each of them ten Curiæ: but afterwards they were five and thirty, containing all the natural citizens of Rome.

Tribu moveri, was a kind of ignominy and diſgrace, when a man was diſplaced by the cenſors out of his own tribe into another more baſe than it, and namely, è ruſtica in urbanam; of which urbana there were four, Suburrana, Eſquilina, Palatina and Collina: into which King Servius diſtributed thoſe that were manumiſed, and Rullus afterwards forenſem turbam.

Triumviri capitales, Three Judges delegat to ſit upon life and death, touching felonious crimes. They were called alſo Quæſtores parricidii, &c.

Triumviri Monetales, Three officers for the mint of mony, either braſs, ſilver, or gold. They are repreſented in old coins by theſe five letters ſtamped thereupon, Æ.A.A.F F. for ære, auro, argento, flando, feriundo: that is to ſay, for the melting, coining, and ſtamping of braſs, ſilver, and gold. They were afterwards four in number, and named Quatuorviri.

Triumviri or Treſviri nocturni, Three overſeers of the night-watch, for fire &c.

Triumviri Menſarii, Three Commiſſaries deputed for the time, and as occaſion required, in ſtead of bankers or treaſurers to receive a ſtock of mony, and to lay the ſame out upon extraordinary charges, as in the time of the ſecond Punick war when the City chamber was without mony. Which ſtock was put into their hands out of private mens purſes, by way of a voluntary benevolence and contribution, as appeareth in the ſix and twentieth book of Livy.

Triumviri [Extraordinarii] Three likewiſe to levy ſouldiers and able men for to bear arms (without the uſual order of muſters) throughout Italy, upon ſome ſpecial occaſion.

Triumviri coloniis deducendis, three commiſſioners who had authority to enrol new inhabitants into any colony: alſo to ſet out and divide the City lands gotten by conqueſt, at their diſcretion among them.

Triumvirs alſo there were three, Wardens to overſee the ſacrifices, the oblations and offrings to the Gods.

Taurilia, certain feaſtival games inſtituted (as Feſtus ſaith) by King Tarquin the proud, for to pacify the infernal gods; upon occaſion of a contagious malady that hapned to women great with child, endangering both them and thoſe they went with: which aroſe upon the corrupt fleſh ſold abroad in the market of oxen and bulls, killed for ſacrifices: whereupon the mony emploied about thoſe ſolemnities, was called Tauricum æs.

Solitaurilia or Suovitaurilia, was a ſolemn ſacrifice at the luſtration, review, or purging of the City every fifth year; and this was called Luſtrum conditum. It was performed by killing a bull, a ram, and a bore. At which ſolemnity all that were able to bear arms, aſſembled in order of battail.

Triumph, a ſolemnity in honor of them who have vanquiſhed their enemies: ſo called, for that their ſouldiers reſounded, Io triumphe; (as Varro thinketh) or of θριαμβος for διθυραμβος one of Bacchus names, the firſt inventer thereof: or of τρεῖς ὀμφοὶ three voices: becauſe it was granted by the ſuffrages of ſouldiers, Senators, and common people: as it may appear in Livy, by the triumph of L. Paulus Æmylius, who had like to have been diſappointed thereof, by his own ſouldiers.

V

Venus Erycina, Ovid. 4. Faſt. à ſiculo nomina colle tenet: ſhe was ſo called of a promontory in Sicily, called Eryx, where there was a goodly temple built in the honour of Venus; and afterwards at Rome alſo in memorial thereof.

Verſus Feſcennini, certain licentious and unchaſt ſongs, uſed among the Painims at weddings; the manner whereof, came firſt from the city Feſcenninum (as ſome think:) or as others, Quia faſcinum putabantur arcere, becauſe they were thought to have vertue to withſtand witchcraft and ſorcery.

Veſtales virgines, were certain profeſſed Nuns vowing virginity, who had the keeping of the ſacred fire of Veſta. Nec tu aliud veſtam, quam puram intellige flammam. Ovid. This Veſta was brought from Troy with the image of Minerva, called Palladium, and other holy reliques.

Vltro tributa, ἐργολαβίαι, were certain City works, for which the cenſors did bargain with the Publicans or undertakers, at a price.

Verbena,

Verbena, although it ſignifieth a ſpeciall herb, called Verbenaca, i.e. verven in Engliſh, and in Greek περιστερεών, becauſe doves delight much to be above it: yet the word is attributed to divers other herbs put to holy uſe among the Painims, which are called Sagmina in Latine, and in Greek ἱερόβοτανα. But Dioſcorides deſcribeth one ſort thereof which runneth by the ground, and groweth not ſo high as our vervin doth, and it ſeemeth to be that which the Phyſicians, Herbariſts, and Apothecaries call Gramen ἀγρωστὶς in Greek, dent de chien in French: and the coich graſs in Engliſh: according to which ſaith Livy, Fa-cialis ex arce puram graminis herbã attulit.

Victoriatus, i.e. quinarius nummus, A piece of Roman ſilver coin, half Denarius, and a double Seſtertius, having the image of Victory ſtamped upon it, either ſtanding on foot crowned with a chaplet of bay, or elſe carried in a triumphall chariot drawn with four ſteeds, holding forth in her right hand the foreſaid garland, as is to be ſeen in divers antiquities of coin.

Veteres ſignifieth a place in Rome called Veteres: Curiæ in reſpect of Novæ, or certain ſhops called Argentariæ of bankers, in regard of others alſo, named Novæ.

A Table of all the Orations in Titus Livius, by way of diviſion of the general into particular members, fitted for all ſorts of ſpeaking or writing, and digeſted according to the ſeverall places of the three principall heads of all Cauſes in Oratory, to wit, the Deliberative, the Demonſtrative, and the Judiciall.

To reconciliation and peace-making, between Romans and Albans, by Metius Suffetius Prince of the Albans, to Tullus Hoſtilius King of the Romans. 14.H

Of L. Lentulus the chief of the Roman Embaſſadors to the army and the Conſuls that they would of their own accord yield themſelves unto the Samnits at the place called Caudinæ furcæ, where there was no hope of eſcaping. 257.C

Of Decius Mus the Conſul to the people, that there might be Augurs and Pontifies choſen out of the Commons. 290.H

Of Acedux the Spaniard to the captain of the Saguntins, for the ſending back of the hoſtages into their own Cities, whom Annibal had demanded of all the States, and beſtowed in ſafe cuſtody at Saguntum. 359.F

Of Minutius the Maſter of the horſe unto his ſouldiers for joyning camp with Fabius, when he perceived that both he and his were ſaved by the proweſs of the ſaid Fabius, after himſelf had unluckily fought againſt Annibal. 363.G

Of the Roman captives in the overthrow at Cannæ to the Nobles of Rome, that they might be ranſomed. 378.H

The perſwaſion.

Of Varro the Conſul, to the Campan Embaſſadors, that after ſo great loſs and foil of the Romans they would ſo undertake war with the Carthaginians, that neither Annibal might think himſelf conqueror, nor the Romans conquered. 383.G

Of Fabius Maximus to the people, That the command in war being taken from Otacilius, they ſhould conſider what Generall ſhould make head againſt Annibal. 414.G

Of P. Sulpitius the Conſul to the people about removing the war into Macedony, and to aid the Athenians againſt Philip. 626.I

Of Ariſthenus, a Prince of Achæa to the Achæans, for the demands of the Roman Embaſſadors, that they would ſtand for them againſt Philip. 658.H

Of M. Porcius Cato, in maintenance of the law Oppia, which C. Oppius a Trib. of the Commons in the Punick war had made for reſtraint of womens apparell againſt the Nobles and Tribunes of the Commons, who went about to abrogate the ſame. 684.H

Of Annibal in the councill of King Antiochus concerning the contracting of peace with King Philip, and the whole courſe of war, which Antiochus prepared againſt the Romans. 739.C

Of reconciliation by Q. Cæcilius Metellus to M. Lepidus and M. Fulvius Conſors, who for many years together had born a deadly malice and enmity one againſt another. 1088.K

Of M. Servilius for L. Æmylius Paulus, that he might have triumph granted over the Macedonians by him conquered, when his own ſouldiers withſtood the ſame, for that they were ſcanted in the pillage: and Servius Sulpitius Galba oppoſed himſelf againſt it. 1226.H

Dissuasion

To the High and Mighty Princeſs, and his moſt Gracious LADY,

CHRISTINA,

By the Grace of God Queen of the SWEDES, GOTHS, VANDALS and the adjoyning Provinces.

Madam,

IT hath happily faln out, that your wonderful Humanity and Learning, rarely to be found in ſo great a Majeſty, have given me advantage of omitting one of thoſe two ſubjects which uſually are the Contents of Dedicatory Epiſtles. For I have ſo many reaſons to declare why I preſent this Supplement to your Majeſty, that if I were forced likewiſe to declare the Argument of the Work, to what End, and in what Manner it is contrived, I could not accompliſh it without a long and tedious Epiſtle. But now thoſe Your two Virtues I mentioned, have freed me of this Neceſſity, ſeeing out of your Humanity you condeſcended to read the Work while it was in Compoſing, and by your Learning more fully underſtood, then I or any other could expound what was ſuperfluous, and what wanting in it. I will not therefore accuſe the meaneſſe of my Wit or Learning, or any other thing, that this my Deſign hath no more happily ſucceeded, (Let thoſe men pretend ſhortneſſe of time, multitude of buſineſſe or incommodities of ſickneſſe, who aim at other Glory beſides that of Obedience) it ſufficeth me, I am conſcious, that in writing this, I have obſerved the benefit of your Studies, and in making it Publick been Obedient to Your Will. For when in compiling the Relicks of LIVY's HISTORY, which at that time you diligently read, I had finiſhed this Work as a Bridge over a broken Paſſage, You were pleaſed (according to Your excellent and well known Goodneſſe) to expreſſe Your liking of my Endeavors; and, as Your Self thereby had reaped Benefit, ſo to judg them fit of Publick View, that others might likewiſe be profited by them. Wherein You manifeſted both your Wiſdome and your Bounty: Your Bounty, in that what was ſolely intended for your own ſervice, you were willing ſhould be uſeful unto all: Your Wiſdom in that, in this new beginning and encreaſe of Learning, which by your example and Help the North doth greedily receive and happily improve, you have encouraged other men to exerciſe their Wit and Induſtry in publiſhing more Accurate and Learned Writings, when they ſhall have underſtood with how much Candor and Clemency You accept this rude and unpoliſhed Piece of mine. When therefore I ſee not only thoſe who are born unto your ſervice, but many alſo of ſtrange Nations moſt willingly entertain and execute your Commands: Should I at all be backward in my Duty, who, if not alone, yet amongſt a few of your moſt Faithful and neareſt ſubjects, am in a peculiar manner obliged by your Majeſty? I am indeed His who created all things, neither from any other do I expect a True and Lasting Felicity; neither do I bear a mind inferior to so great a Hope: But as to the Offices of this Life I am by him bestowed upon your Majesty, as by infallible Arguments, to your self not unknown, may be demonstrated. Wherefore my constant and resolved Rule of living (which, if I attain not unto, as I am willing and ought to do, yet I aim at and endeavour) is, to attends God's will only in those things which are expresly commanded or forbidden; in Actions indifferent and arbitrary to be guided by your Majestie alone; which I the rather strive to perform, because I know it is your Pleasure. And truly this were a sufficient tie of my Obedience and Reverence, if you had not otherwise both by your Virtues and Deserts obliged me, both which are so ample and of so effectual an Influence, that it is hard to say whether in Contemplation of them I am more willing to serve you, or for other Reasons more strictly bound to it. I find my self now involved in a very doubtful Case, and on both sides much perplexed: For if I say what I have intended, as my desire is, and as is Just and Right, I may happly not be relished by your Majestie, who do more freely exercise your Virtues, and fasten your Favours, then willingly hear them repeated. And if in the Mention thereof I shall omit any thing, I shall fail in my Duty, and Detract from Your Praises, which (with as fervent a desire and good will as I prosecute them) had I liberty to expatiate, I could in no wise according to their Dignity set forth, much less being streightned within the narrow limits of an Epistle. Nevertheless I am confident, that the Temper of the business (which your self cannot disallow) is agreeable, as to the present purpose, so to both our Dispositions. For I abhor Flattery as doth your Majestie; neither am I more willing to speak any thing in such a strain, then Your self to hear it. And, according to your discerning Spirit, you are not ignorant that I am of this mind, that if it were in my choice whether to offend You in doing You Good, or please You by Flattery, I should without scruple chuse the former, which few Subjects can do and few Princes endure. Hinder not therefore my desires which cannot offend on that part: Give us leave to acknowledge what we have received; and if miserable men are freely allowed to complain, why should your Majestie forbid us modestly to boast of our Happinesse under such a Prince as Your self? Neither ought this, the only Reward of your good Deeds, or the Fruit of our Thankfulness to perish; we then again a fresh receive benefits when we repeat them. But I see what is happened, whilest I beg leave to Write I loose both Time and Space. What therefore I am about to say, shall be into a few Periods digested, and I shall of every kind speak somewhat only in Summe. As to those your Virtues wherewith you have magnificently Adorned this Empire; that I may briefly declare what I think, I shall borrow a Sentence from our beloved Tacitus; in which Author, You know, Tiberius reproacheth C. Cæsar, That he had all the Vices of L. Sylla, but not so much as one of his Virtues: which may justly be inverted as to Your Majestie, that You have acquired all the Virtues of Your Predecessors, omitting what Vices were in them, insomuch as You have augmented their Ancient Honours by Virtues new and heretofore unknown to this Kingdom. I believe that former Ages wanted not excellent Kings, yet, however it came to pass, the Swetick affairs never ascended to any illustrious or durable greatness in their dayes; the Praise of that work properly belongs to the Gustavides, of whom not any one ever Reigned without some Memorable profit to the Countrie: for even the Error of some have proved of good use; the Case of Ericus and Sigismund instructeth Posterity wherein Kings may offend: and others are admonished by the severity of Charles, how unsafe it is to provoke Princes to Anger. But what Pen or what Oration can sufficiently declare

the Immortal benefits reaped from the two Gustavi? They were both so great, that if you compare them with others, you will easily prefer them before others; but if you compare them between themselves, you will rather conclude that this was Greatest and the other Greatest, then discerne which of the two excelled. For it is a great Error and blindnesse of judgment to measure the Greatnesse of Kings by the outward Splendor of their Actions, and respect that only.

It happens often to these Stars on Earth as to those in Heaven, that some indeed are the greater though others seem to be so. But this is manifest, that God had Ordained by two Princes especially to advance the glorie of this Kingdom, even by GUSTAVUS the Great, and his Daughter CHRISTINA. He indeed was the more endowed with Warlike Virtues, yet so as when he had leisure from the Field, he did most Accurately and Skilfully manage affairs at Home: God having reserved Your selfe, Madam, to a greater work, the Recoverie, Establishment and Ornament of Peace, hath every way accomplished You for so great a Task; yet so, as while there was a necessitie of War, You could not complain of any thing wanting in Your self to the highest Praise in such an Employment. For whereas little is to be attributed to bodily exercise, You were found eminent in all those Virtues of the Mind which are required in the best Emperors, as Counsel in Perlexities, Constancy in Adversity, Moderation in Prosperity, Diligence, Wisdom, Faithfulness in all things; whereby after many and famous Victories, You concluded Peace with Denmark in the first year of your Reigne, and in the fourth year a most glorious and advantageous one with the German Emperor. Which peace how and by what means you have adorned, I cannot in this Hast declare; I shall only name the encrease of the City, many Towns built and well constituted, Justice established, the People eased in their Taxes, Manners amended, the Honor and Reward of Learning encreased, the Universities enriched, Schools erected, Merchandize flourishing, many Manufactures newly invented, the Ground manured beyond the simplicity of the Ancients; your care and diligence adhibited toward the Commodity of Travel, measuring of High-wayes, building of Inns, and indeed toward all things which we see, which we are sensible of, and the benefit whereof we enjoy; so that I may justly account those my Countrymen of Germany happy who shal hereafter rest under your Protection: whom I would have, with my self and all other Your Subjects, think no sign surer of God's Anger or Favour toward them, then as he shall long preserve, or suddenly take away such a Prince from amongst them. If there be any who dare not lift up their Eys by reason of the misery of times past, or are so hindred by the Interposition of clouds that they could not hitherto behold this Bright Star, be comforted with its Aspect, and refreshed with its Heat: They may justly be encouraged to expect all things happy and prosperous near at hand, not only by the greatnesse of so Benigne and Favourable a Light, but also by the Constancy thereof. For the Splendor of it is not derived, as that of a Candle or Torch, which failing, the remaining substance appears fouler; but like that of the Sun, True, and Pure, and Innate, neither to be consumed by Time, or extinguished by Violence: which now shineth openly to those who dwell afar off, and will so dispell all Clouds from before their Eyes, that you shall find none so blind as cannot see it, or impudently injurious to their own judgments as to denie they see it. But though it be troublesome to me to draw my mind from this sweet and pleasing Contemplation, I shall not endeavour to comprehend the mention of these Virtues within the narrow Limits of this Paper, this Time, or this my little Wit, which ought in whole Volumes to be declared to all Nations and Ages. I shall make bold to be more Prolixe in the Commemoration of your benefits bestow-

By the Grace of God Queen of the SWEDES, GOTHS, VANDALS and the adjoyning Provinces.

Madam,

IT hath happily faln out, that your wonderful Humanity and Learning, rarely to be found in ſo great a Majeſty, have given me advantage of omitting one of thoſe two ſubjects which uſually are the Contents of Dedicatory Epiſtles. For I have ſo many reaſons to declare why I preſent this Supplement to your Majeſty, that if I were forced likewiſe to declare the Argument of the Work, to what End, and in what Manner it is contrived, I could not accompliſh it without a long and tedious Epiſtle. But now thoſe Your two Virtues I mentioned, have freed me of this Neceſſity, ſeeing out of your Humanity you condeſcended to read the Work while it was in Compoſing, and by your Learning more fully underſtood, then I or any other could expound what was ſuperfluous, and what wanting in it. I will not therefore accuſe the meaneſſe of my Wit or Learning, or any other thing, that this my Deſign hath no more happily ſucceeded, (Let thoſe men pretend ſhortneſſe of time, multitude of buſineſſe or incommodities of ſickneſſe, who aim at other Glory beſides that of Obedience) it ſufficeth me, I am conſcious, that in writing this, I have obſerved the benefit of your Studies, and in making it Publick been Obedient to Your Will. For when in compiling the Relicks of LIVY'S HISTORY, which at that time you diligently read, I had finiſhed this Work as a Bridge over a broken Paſſage, You were pleaſed (according to Your excellent and well known Goodneſſe) to expreſſe Your liking of my Endeavors; and, as Your Self thereby had reaped Benefit, ſo to judg them fit of Publick View, that others might likewiſe be profited by them. Wherein You manifeſted both your Wiſdome and your Bounty: Your Bounty, in that what was ſolely intended for your own ſervice, you were willing ſhould be uſeful unto all: Your Wiſdom in that, in this new beginning and encreaſe of Learning, which by your example and Help the North doth greedily receive and happily improve, you have encouraged other men to exerciſe their Wit and Induſtry in publiſhing more Accurate and Learned Writings, when they ſhall have underſtood with how much Candor and Clemency You accept this rude and unpoliſhed Piece of mine. When therefore I ſee not only thoſe who are born unto your ſervice, but many alſo of ſtrange Nations moſt willingly entertain and execute your Commands: Should I at all be backward in my Duty, who, if not alone, yet amongſt a few of your moſt Faithful and neareſt ſubjects, am in a peculiar manner obliged by your Majeſty? I am indeed His who created all things, neither from any other do I expect a True and Lasting Felicity; neither do I bear a mind inferior to so great a Hope: But as to the Offices of this Life I am by him bestowed upon your Majesty, as by infallible Arguments, to your self not unknown, may be demonstrated. Wherefore my constant and resolved Rule of living (which, if I attain not unto, as I am willing and ought to do, yet I aim at and endeavour) is, to attends God's will only in those things which are expresly commanded or forbidden; in Actions indifferent and arbitrary to be guided by your Majestie alone; which I the rather strive to perform, because I know it is your Pleasure. And truly this were a sufficient tie of my Obedience and Reverence, if you had not otherwise both by your Virtues and Deserts obliged me, both which are so ample and of so effectual an Influence, that it is hard to say whether in Contemplation of them I am more willing to serve you, or for other Reasons more strictly bound to it. I find my self now involved in a very doubtful Case, and on both sides much perplexed: For if I say what I have intended, as my desire is, and as is Just and Right, I may happly not be relished by your Majestie, who do more freely exercise your Virtues, and fasten your Favours, then willingly hear them repeated. And if in the Mention thereof I shall omit any thing, I shall fail in my Duty, and Detract from Your Praises, which (with as fervent a desire and good will as I prosecute them) had I liberty to expatiate, I could in no wise according to their Dignity set forth, much less being streightned within the narrow limits of an Epistle. Nevertheless I am confident, that the Temper of the business (which your self cannot disallow) is agreeable, as to the present purpose, so to both our Dispositions. For I abhor Flattery as doth your Majestie; neither am I more willing to speak any thing in such a strain, then Your self to hear it. And, according to your discerning Spirit, you are not ignorant that I am of this mind, that if it were in my choice whether to offend You in doing You Good, or please You by Flattery, I should without scruple chuse the former, which few Subjects can do and few Princes endure. Hinder not therefore my desires which cannot offend on that part: Give us leave to acknowledge what we have received; and if miserable men are freely allowed to complain, why should your Majestie forbid us modestly to boast of our Happinesse under such a Prince as Your self? Neither ought this, the only Reward of your good Deeds, or the Fruit of our Thankfulness to perish; we then again a fresh receive benefits when we repeat them. But I see what is happened, whilest I beg leave to Write I loose both Time and Space. What therefore I am about to say, shall be into a few Periods digested, and I shall of every kind speak somewhat only in Summe. As to those your Virtues wherewith you have magnificently Adorned this Empire; that I may briefly declare what I think, I shall borrow a Sentence from our beloved Tacitus; in which Author, You know, Tiberius reproacheth C. Cæsar, That he had all the Vices of L. Sylla, but not so much as one of his Virtues: which may justly be inverted as to Your Majestie, that You have acquired all the Virtues of Your Predecessors, omitting what Vices were in them, insomuch as You have augmented their Ancient Honours by Virtues new and heretofore unknown to this Kingdom. I believe that former Ages wanted not excellent Kings, yet, however it came to pass, the Swetick affairs never ascended to any illustrious or durable greatness in their dayes; the Praise of that work properly belongs to the Gustavides, of whom not any one ever Reigned without some Memorable profit to the Countrie: for even the Error of some have proved of good use; the Case of Ericus and Sigismund instructeth Posterity wherein Kings may offend: and others are admonished by the severity of Charles, how unsafe it is to provoke Princes to Anger. But what Pen or what Oration can sufficiently declare

the Immortal benefits reaped from the two Gustavi? They were both so great, that if you compare them with others, you will easily prefer them before others; but if you compare them between themselves, you will rather conclude that this was Greatest and the other Greatest, then discerne which of the two excelled. For it is a great Error and blindnesse of judgment to measure the Greatnesse of Kings by the outward Splendor of their Actions, and respect that only.

It happens often to these Stars on Earth as to those in Heaven, that some indeed are the greater though others seem to be so. But this is manifest, that God had Ordained by two Princes especially to advance the glorie of this Kingdom, even by GUSTAVUS the Great, and his Daughter CHRISTINA. He indeed was the more endowed with Warlike Virtues, yet so as when he had leisure from the Field, he did most Accurately and Skilfully manage affairs at Home: God having reserved Your selfe, Madam, to a greater work, the Recoverie, Establishment and Ornament of Peace, hath every way accomplished You for so great a Task; yet so, as while there was a necessitie of War, You could not complain of any thing wanting in Your self to the highest Praise in such an Employment. For whereas little is to be attributed to bodily exercise, You were found eminent in all those Virtues of the Mind which are required in the best Emperors, as Counsel in Perlexities, Constancy in Adversity, Moderation in Prosperity, Diligence, Wisdom, Faithfulnes in all things; whereby after many and famous Victories, You concluded Peace with Denmark in the first year of your Reigne, and in the fourth year a most glorious and advantageous one with the German Emperor. Which peace how and by what means you have adorned, I cannot in this Hast declare; I shall only name the encrease of the City, many Towns built and well constituted, Justice established, the People eased in their Taxes, Manners amended, the Honor and Reward of Learning encreased, the Universities enriched, Schools erected, Merchandize flourishing, many Manufactures newly invented, the Ground manured beyond the simplicity of the Ancients; your care and diligence adhibited toward the Commodity of Travel, measuring of High-wayes, building of Inns, and indeed toward all things which we see, which we are sensible of, and the benefit whereof we enjoy; so that I may justly account those my Countrymen of Germany happy who shal hereafetr rest under your Protection: whom I would have, with my self and all other Your Subjects, think no sign surer of God's Anger or Favour toward them, then as he shall long preserve, or suddenly take away such a Prince from amongst them. If there be any who dare not lift up their Eys by reason of the misery of times past, or are so hindred by the Interposition of clouds that they could not hitherto behold this Bright Star, be comforted with its Aspect, and refreshed with its Heat: They may justly be encouraged to expect all things happy and prosperous near at hand, not only by the greatnesse of so Benigne and Favourable a Light, but also by the Constancy thereof. For the Splendor of it is not derived, as that of a Candle or Torch, which failing, the remaining substance appears fouler; but like that of the Sun, True, and Pure, and Innate, neither to be consumed by Time, or extinguished by Violence: which now shineth openly to those who dwell afar off, and will so dispell all Clouds from before their Eyes, that you shall find none so blind as cannot see it, or impudently injurious to their own judgments as to denie they see it. But though it be troublesome to me to draw my mind from this sweet and pleasing Contemplation, I shall not endeavour to comprehend the mention of these Virtues within the narrow Limits of this Paper, this Time, or this my little Wit, which ought in whole Volumes to be declared to all Nations and Ages. I shall make bold to be more Prolixe in the Commemoration of your benefits

bestowed on me, as being not so well known to the World, and more properly belonging to the Causes of this Dedication, as likewise not unworthy Monuments of your Virtues. But I must first acknowledge the Providence of God which I have alwaies found most manifestly present in this businesse. When for many years in Germany I continued in such a condition of life (for many reasons thereunto perswading me) as not resolutely addicted to any particular Profession, yet ready to accept of any which should lawfully offer it self: in all that while no man determined my liberty with obligation to any calling. In the mean time I spent not that my leisure in idlenesse, but bestowed it in those Studies to the which (by what afterward hapned, I evidently understood) I was from my infancie ordained. The time now grew on, Madam, wherein I was to be dedicated to Your Majesties Service, and Benedict Skytte came to Argentoratus, whom Your Majestie hath deservedly honoured with many Favors, and lastly with the Dignitie of a Senator. By him invited I came to Your Universitie, where instructing the Youth with care and diligence, though I had an earnest desire to see Your Majestie, yet I preferred the necessitie of my present Office, before the sweetnesse of an happinesse not yet due to me. When I had now three years been debarred of any Conference with your Majestie, having lately taken upon Your Self the Administration of Your Realm, upon occasion of a Funeral You came to Ubsal. And from that time I shall begin the Commemoration of Your Favours towards me. The last Office of Love was then performed to my Patron John Skytte Senator, whose praises according to the Dutie of my Place, I endeavoured to set forth in a Funeral Oration; and this was the first Speech I made in Your hearing: But when by the cheerfulness of your most Serene Countenance, You discovered both Your understanding of what was spoken, and Your Favour to the Speaker, I was so infinitely possessed with Pleasure and Admiration, that thenceforward I resolved to esteem You not only as a Queen of Me and Your Kingdomes, but Princesse of all Virtues and Wisdom. The same Favour I received two years after, when as often as you came to Ubsal, you heard my Discourses upon any Subject you propounded. Intending afterward to accumulate more Favours upon me, You invited me to Court, not only beyond my Hope, but besides my Thoughts of any such thing: what You there bestowed upon me, can scarce by a long Oration be declared: You made me Keeper of Your Librarie, then which I know none so soon after its first beginning, more plentiful in Books, which hath been a main help to me in Compiling this Supplement. You gave me the Title of your Historiographer, that when you should think fit I might deliver to Posterity the Memory of things done or to be transacted. You afforded me Lodging in your Court, not only very convenient, but (which is rarely found in so frequented a Place) very private and quiet also, and a Stipend, which by experience I have found, very subject to Envy. And whereas these may be esteemed Favours of the highest rank, you have, by what after followed, caused them to be esteemed small ones: For when you desired the Knowledge of the Greek Tongue, that you might from their own Mouths understand the sense of the most excellent writers in Civil and Moral VVisdom, you did so by degrees induce me to the Office of your Instructer therein, being ignorant of your Purpose, that at length I understood I had taught much indeed, when on the sudden I found you had Learnt so much. By this your Art in that small time you could allow out of two years to such a Study (being a Queen actually Reigning, waging VVar, often holding Parliaments, every day Councels, and constantly distracted with other businesse) you made such an improvement that after Trial in Polybius and Plutarch, you read Plato also, and that with such understanding, that little wanting my help, you could hastily Translate him into Elegant Latine in most

sig-

ſignificant Expreſsions, and of Your ſelf obſerve and for true reaſons Correct the Error of Tranſlations made with the great pains of Learned men. Whereby I reaped ſo great and various fruits of pureſt pleaſure, as I could not but often ingenuouſly confeſſe to my moſt intimate acquaintance, That whatſoever Time, or Labour, or Study, or Care I beſtowed in this employment (for Trouble, I call my Conſcience to witneſſe, I never felt any) I thought all abundantly recompenced with that reward I could every hour receive from you. For to omit other benefits, what an advantage was even in this, to be every day in the preſence of ſo great a Prince, to be ſeen and countenanced by You, to obtain the Title, Place and Honour of a Favourite? Truly my Happineſſe ſeemed ſo great to me, that I began to be afraid of it. For though, by the Grace of God, I ever put off theſe my worldly Accoutrements, as knowing I muſt one day leave them or they me, yet out of impotency of mind I might by too great happineſs have grown inſolent, but that by certain Arguments I learnt in time to know that ſo great a fortune was not conferred as Due to any man's Merits, but as the free gift of your Grace and good will. And in this ſo high and great an Happineſſe there are many excellent Circumſtances particularly conſiderable, I am tied only to my own Vocation, employed only in mine own Studies, that is, I am ſo free that I am not employed and wearied in any ſervice not proper to my own Office and calling. Neither have you a care of my Time and Health only, but alſo of my Modeſty and Baſhfulneſſe: I appear not but at the time of your Studies, neither then do I break in without command, to ſtand as an idle and dumb Spectator, vainly looſing time, or boldly vaunting of my Liberty and Familiarity Neither is my work baſe or vile, we do nothing which requires either Secrecy or Excuſe; whoſoever will not betray his own ignorance muſt needs confeſſe the employment, on my part worthy of a man, on yours becoming a Prince. Hitherto I have related part of the Favours you have beſtowed on my Perſon; it remains likewiſe I ſhould acknowledge thoſe Favours (as much more beſtowed on me) which you have conferred on others by my Interceſſion: In which confeſſion I have cauſe to fear, that I ſhall not only contract Envy to my ſelfe, but give Occaſion to others to accuſe your Majeſtie, as being two Facile in granting what is requeſted. To theſe I ſhall anſwer, That I do indeed acknowledge and admire your Goodneſſe, which hath far exce[illegible] my Deſerts, and that others alſo may obtain equal or greater Favours if they ask them with the ſame Reſpect that I have done: as firſt, I never deſired any thing but what was Juſt and Equal; nor ſecondly, any thing misbecoming the Office and Majeſtie of my Prince; thirdly, by all thoſe Boons I have obtained for others, I know not that I am a penny the richer. But in this ſtrait, wherein it is eaſier to think of more things then to write them, many things come into my mind which I am forced to pretermit. This I ſhall ſay, I am in doubt whether I am more beholding to your Majeſtie for ſmall favors beſtowed at my Requeſt, or for the great ones; for as theſe carried the greater Price, the others did more manifeſt your Humanitie. That your mind capable of higheſt things would condeſcend to ſo little ones. We Read of a King, who when a Philoſopher asked of him a Groat, ſaid, It was too little for a King to give; when he preſently asked a Talent, ſaid, It was too much for a Philoſopher to receive. Your Majeſtie hath more magnificently uſed the ſame Method, in Your ſmaller favours, regarding what was fit for me to receive; in the greater, what became Your ſelf to give. With the like Clemency You have had compaſſion on ſome miſerable men (whom I therefore commended to Your Majeſtie becauſe none had pity on them) and done that which I dare yet ſcarce ſpeak, both for the Greatneſſe of the Thing, and for the Greatneſſe of the Thanks due, which cannot

cannot at present be expressed. But I may happly be accused of Folly, that I should think your favours may be more Elegantly declared or praised by any man's Oration, then by your own Deeds and Works; or that I should think you stand in need of my Commendation for having bountifully remitted to the City of the Vangiones the greater part of their Taxes, by which benefit I believe the City was preserved, and shall do well and justly if they honour your Majestie as a second Foundress; You have hereby for ever obliged the Commonwealth of the Vangiones, and me in particular, making us your everlasting Debtors. For I know not who of Right oweth most to you, they who received the benefit or he who procured it at your Hands. Is there any thing can be equalled to, or preferred before what I have already said? Yes surely, even this, In that you have promised to make me a better man, not, as all men are improved, by Laws and Manners, nor, as many, by Example, but, as yet none, by Your care and Diligence in Conversing with me: For you have promised to make Enquiry with me (that is to direct and shew me) how Wise and Prudent men ought to be qualified, and by what signes they may be discovered; which when I have learned, I make no question of being much better then now I am. And I so much value this your Promise, that I would not free your Majestie from your Obligation for half your Kingdom: And I shall not refuse, whensoever You Command, to declare the Reasons of this my Resolution. And to perform this, will, I suppose, be neither unpleasant to You, nor yet Difficult, seeing You tend forward to the height of that Wisdom, which even among the Learned you shall find more who pretend to teach then do indeed truly know & understand it. In this thing I may wel boast whereby I am more happy, not only then ordinary men, but the servants of Solomon himself, who are justly esteemed happy in having opportunity of hearing his Wisdom, but would have been much more happy if he had taken peculiar Care to have instructed them in his own Person; which we read not he ever did. But I perceive that contrary to my will and the nature of my Argument, the very Paper admonisheth me to make an end. I shall therefore now be silent, humbly adoring your Majestie, and giving You to understand, That not only this Book is Dedicated to Your Majestie, but my whole self with all my Soul and the Affections thereof, with what I am, or have, or can do, being for Your sake simply willing to do any thing whatsoever without exception, unless what is against Conscience, or beyond my Abilities to perform.

THE SUPPLEMENT OF LIVIE'S HISTORY

By J. FREINSHEMIUS.

THE FIRST BOOK.

In place of LIVIE'S XI^th Book.

Collected out of Authors whose Names are in the Margin annexed.

THE Power of the Samnites was now by many Battels much broken, neither was any doubt made of happily finishing the War, in case the Enemy in this low and weak condition were prevented of time sufficient to recollect and strengthen his spirits. Therefore Q. Fabius the Consul, now in the heat of his Youth, and assuring himself the glory of putting an end to this War, having made a sudden levy, marcheth incontinently with his Army into Campania. For the Samnites being an hardy people, and by all their overthrows brought rather into Despair then Fear, while the former Consuls carried back the Legions to Rome attending on their Triumph, laid hold on that opportunity, and what with the Relicks of their former Armies, and some new Levies, had gathered together a considerable force, and because they knew the Plague was at Rome, and had heard that the present Consuls were men not much to be feared, either for any experience in Marshal affair, or for any great Authority they had, they grew confident, invaded, depopulated, and wasted the Territories of the Campanians whom they had alwayes hated, but now more vehemently, looking on them as the Authors of the dangers and calamities they now sustained. The Roman General had a heart no way misbecoming the dignity of his Fabian-Family, but the small account he made of a Nation so often beaten by his Country-men, and his earnestness of being in action, did at this time quite bereave him of all Counsel and Deliberation. He marcheth swiftly towards the enemy, and having discovered the Samnite scouts, who upon sight of the Roman troops retired back to their own main Body, and judging this to be a flight of the whole Host, without any consideration had either of the place or the condition of his men, he commands in all hast that may be the Battel to be begun, as if the hope of Victory consisted only in Expedition: But the Samnites having notice of their approach, were very circumspect, had seized on advantageous places, marshalled their Army, and incensed the minds of their Souldiery with their commanders Orations; and consequently the Event of the Battel was accordingly; for the Samnites being in good Rank, and well prepared, made no great business to rout the Romans, being very weary with their journey and furious march, out of all order, as if they came rather to plunder then to fight. Three thousand of Fabius his men were lost, a greater number wounded, and only by the benefit of the Night was the total destruction of his Army prevented. Then retiring to a more commodious place, as well as in such a Consternation may be expected, they fortified their Camp, where there was little better comfort or confidence then in the field, the Weary had no conveniencie of rest, the Hungry wanted food, and the Wounded had no application of Medicines, for issuing out with their weapons only, they had left all their carriage and baggage in the former Camp:

So that the whole night was passed away with the Groans of the dying, and the Complaints of the living, every one with horror and despair waiting for the next day as their last. For being tired with labour, distempered with long watchings, weakned with wounds, terrified with an unlucky overthrow, and their number much diminished, they thought it impossible to resist the enemy, whom when they were sound and entire both in body and mind, and filled with hopes of Victory, they were not able to encounter upon even terms. Things being at this ill passe, the Remedy (as it often happens) proceeded from the enemies mistake, who daunted with the Rumour of the other Consul's approach, and fearing lest while he assaulted Fabius his Camp, the new forces would surround him, contented himself with what successe he had above his hope obtained, and diverted his course another way. The Enemy being removed, the Romans likewise betook themselves to a safer Refuge: when these tidings were brought to Rome, the City was exceedingly moved, not so much with the losse, as the disgrace of the business, and took it deeply to heart, That the longest war they were ever troubled with, when it was now just at a period, should by the rashness of one Consul be revived again, and that more formidably then before, by reason of the great hopes and confidence which the Samnites would assume in contemplation of this their success. Neither was this the sense of the Tribunes of people alone, whose proper art it was by their frequent Orations to fill the Citizens minds with envy and hatred, but even the Fathers, upon discuss of the business, pronounced very heavy and severe sentences, and a Decree was made by the Senate, That Fabius the Consul should be commanded at a certain day appointed to come and plead his cause at Rome. He was no sooner at Rome, but a swarm of accusers flew about him; and indeed the fault could not be excused, and what was only left of moment on his behalf, even the esteem of old Fabius, was made use of as an argument against him; for they thought him least of all men to be pardoned, who being extracted from so Illustrious a Parent, and brought up in the midst of his Fathers triumphs, had, by his Imprudence with so foul an overthrow, cast a stain not only on the Roman Glory, but on the renown of his own Family, and the many victories of his Ancestors obtained. Their minds being thus exasperated (that it was not likly the Desendant should have a fair hearing) were first by the consideration of his Fathers eminent Piety, and afterward with his Oration totally appeased. For he fearing least for this miscarriage his person would be removed from his Command, insisted not at all in excusing the Crime, but modestly recounting his own and his forefathers merits, desired there might not be in his old age so ignominious a Character imprinted 'on the Fabian Family: Neither did he require that for the sake of so many other Fabii, who 'almost from the foundation of the City, had by their virtue and counsel augmented the Roman 'Empire; nor that for the sake of those three hundred Fabii, who by their own deaths, and 'almost the total loss of the Fabian Name, had protected the Commonwealth, the error of one 'single person should be forgiven, if it were found remedilesse, and that a greater commodity 'would accrue from the punishment then the preservation of his son. But whatsoever was in 'this young man to be feared, is already come to pass, whereas unless we cut off our own hopes, 'I cannot say by an unjust, but by an untimely severity, Those many good deeds which his spirit 'and lively Genius, which likewise his virtue (by me, in your esteem, none of the worst Tu-'tors, being disciplin'd and directed) doth fairly promise, are yet justly to be expected. It hath 'turned to the improvement of many mens wisdom and circumspection, that they miscarried in 'the beginning of Affairs, who being admonished of their error, have often recompenced small 'losses with larger success; and I doubt whether it ought not rather to be imputed to the Envy 'of Fortune then to any man's fault, that the constant felicity both of the Commonwealth, 'and our Family, is by a small detriment thus interrupted; though indeed it is rather to be ac-'counted the good will then the envy of the Gods, by whose providence it is come to pass, that 'with this overthrow, not so fatal to the City as effectual to our instruction, we are put in mind 'of our humane condition, to abate that deadly pride which is usually the effect of excessive 'Prosperity. Whatsoever the matter is, Countrymen, I did certainly foresee some ill luck, when upon 'the Convention of the Senate, I did earnestly solicit you would not create my son Consul. For 'when I considered that my Father, Grandfather, Great-Grandfather, and other my Ancestors 'had frequently, and my self five times born that Office, I began to mistrust whether the Gods 'or Men would willingly. and with an equal mind, suffer the supreme Honour to continue in the 'same Family. And I wish my prayers had then prevailed, or that you would be pleased still 'to continue the benefit bestow'd, lest what against my will, you confer'd on my son as a To-'ken of Honour, prove an occasion of unheard of Infamy to us both; nay, lest your selves be 'suspected of Rashness, for posterity will judge, that either you conferred the command on 'Q. Fabius without cause, or that without cause ye deprive him of it, if by a contrary Judg-'ment ye shall destroy your former Sentence. But if you will please to decree things more fa-'vourably, both your own Authority, and the reputation of the Fabian Family shall yet stand 'sound and his youthful folly, as it was committed with some loss to the Commonwealth, shall 'be amended to its greater emolument and profit. But who dares promise these things? Truly, 'Countrymen, I will, even I will engage my self to the Commonwealth for my son, and happy 'may it prove to the Senate and People of Rome, and our own private Family; I will also go 'Legate to the Consul, and partake of whatsoever fortune he shall happen either to find or 'to make. My spirits are yet vigorous, neither, considering mine age, is the strength of my body 'much 'much decayed, I can performe a ſouldiers duty, I can ſtand in Battel, and if to all things elſe I 'were impotent, yet with the Memory of my Former victories I can both terrifie the Enemy 'and Encourage our own Souldiers; and, which is of greateſt concernment, I can with Coun-'ſell and Caution temper and direct the impetuous Heat of the Conſull's youth which is the on-'ly Cauſe of the laſt Misfortune; If I knew not the Diſpoſition of my ſonne, and were not 'aſſured he would embrace any good direction, I would not certainly now neer the end of my 'life hitherto led without Blemiſh, after the bearing ſo many Conſulſhips both to my owne 'likeing and yours, after ſignal victories and illuſtrious Triumphs, I would not hazard all my Glo-'ry purchaſed with ſo many yeares travel and danger, at home and abroad, by truſting it to the 'Raſhneſs of one in conſiderate young man.

This Oration did both move the mindes of all who were preſent, and alſo ingenerate a Confidence of better ſucceſs for the future. Old Fabius was by an Unanimous conſent created Legate, all preparations were made with what diligence care and Expedition might be; and the Conſul took the field with no leſs favour and Hope of the People, then he had lately returned with their indignation and reproaches. Henceforward both in their march and in their Camps nothing was omitted either of good Diſcipline, or what the art and experience of an old General could ordaine, and thoſe Companions whom Q. Fabius the Father had by good turnes, or by the admiration of his virtue obliged to himſelfe, were very ready to perform whatſoever was enjoyned them; the Souldiers alſo greedy to blot out their former diſgrace, and confiding in the Counſel of a Leader, under whoſe conduct they remembred the Samnites to have been often beaten by themſelves: and their Fathers did earneſtly deſire opportunity of encountring the Enemy. On the other ſide the Samnites were no leſs elevated with contemplation of their late victory; ſo that one Party ſtriving to retaine their purchaſ'd Glory, the other to repair what was loſt, they joyned iſſue moſt vehemently with all the force and might on both ſides; And now behold the Romans in a worſe condition then before, C. Pontius Herennius the Enemies General having hemm'd in the Conſul with a ſelect band; when Maximus obſerving the danger his ſon was in, ſetting ſpurre to horſe flings himſelf into the thickeſt of the Enemies Troopes: He was followed immediately by a Party of Horſe, who beſide the motion of their own Courage were aſhamed to ſee one Old man aſſault with a reſolution to overcome ſo many ſpirightful young Lads in the flower of their ſtrength. This ſudden ſtorme govern'd the Fortune of the whole Battel; The Roman Legions animated with the boldneſs of their Cavalrie, at firſt well received the Enemy, and ſtraightway repell'd them: Herennius in vaine reſiſting, who, that day performing all the Offices both of a good General and a good Souldier, endeavouring to rally his files to retaine the Cowardly, and withſtand the aſſailants, could neither hinder the Flight of his men, nor afterward find opportunity of eſcape for himſelf. Four thouſand Samnites were taken with their General, The Battel and the flight ſwallowed up 24000. The Enemies Camp was likewiſe ſeized on with vaſt plunder in it, which was quickly much encreaſed by Forrage of their Grounds, and taking in of Towns both by ſtorme and upon Mercy; This great change of Affaires was wrought by the acceſs of one onely Perſon, inſomuch that the lately Victorious army is now routed by the Conquer'd party, and the Conſull carries away captive that General by whom he was formerly himſelfe ſhamefully beaten, which was a pleaſing ſpectacle to the Romans, and a great Ornament to his Triumph, which by the ready good-will of the People he made into the City the next yeare. While the Fabii thus order'd things in Samnium, the other Conſull D. Brutus (whoſe Province was among the Faliſci) had the like happy ſucceſs: For being aſſiſted by Sp. Carvilius his Legate (for 'twas thought fit to joyne a Legate alſo with him, a man as skilful in war, ſo one that had experience of the Enemy, againſt whom laſt year he did fourtunately mannage affaires) he did waſt no ſmall of the Reſidue of Etruria, and overcame in a ſet battel the Faliſci daring to encounter with him. Theſe newes being brought to Rome, when the time of Conveneing the Senate was come, and it ſeemed not fit for the Common-wealth to withdraw the Conſulls from their charges, an Interregnum was agreed upon; The Regent L. Poſthumius Megellus, in a Court of his own holding, was himſelf declared Conſull; a precedent till that day unhear'd of, unleſs in the Perſon of Appius Claudius, which nevertheleſſe no good man approved. But Poſtumius behaved himſelf in his Magiſtracy with as much arrogance as he aſſum'd it; Being vainly puff't up with the Nobility of his Extraction, and this his third Conſulſhip, he did utterly deſpiſe his Colleague for this year, C. Junius Brutus as one much below him, being but a Plebeian. When the Provinces came to be diſputed on, he would not ſuffer Brutus to be compared with him. nor lots to be caſt; out of all Order claiming the Adminiſtration of the Samnitick warre as his Due, inſomuch as according to his own ſaying, he had in his two former Conſulſhips done great things againſt that Enemy. The buſineſs being canvaſ'd with much contention in the Senate, when C. Junius perceived he was not able to maintaine his Right againſt the Grace and Power of his Colleague, did at length declare he would deſiſt, leſt by the diſcord of the Conſulls the Publick good might be hindred. The Peſtilence did ſtill continually rage both in City and Countrey, for which having tried all remedies now for three yeares, they could not either with their divine or humane applications allay it. Wherefore conſulting either with the books of the Sybills or the Oracle of Delphos (for this alſo is reported) they ſent Ten Ambaſſadours to fetch Æſculapius to Rome from Epidaurus where it is ſaid he was borne; For though the Anſwer were doubtful, neither could the Fathers foreſee the event of things, they thought fit to obey the Gods who would themselves open a way for their fortunes to proceed by. A very strange thing then fell out, but of most undoubted truth, by reason of the sincerity of so many Authors affirming it, as likewise appeares by the structure of the Val Maximus. Chappel in Tibur then erected and consecrated; When the Roman Embassadours had deliver'd their Message, the Epidaurians entertain'd them kindly, but because it did not appear what was convenient to be granted them, they were conducted to the Temple with liberty to *Plutarch. The Altars of this God among the Gracians was most commonly in open and high Places; the Epidaurians also five miles from their City had a Temple of greatest Fame in those dayes, and very rich by the gifts of men who believed their health to proceed from thence; Being brought hither, while they stand in admiration Livie, 45. 28. Parian Auth. de viris illust. c. 22. of the Largeness of the Statue which was cut by the excellent skill of Thrasymedes the Parian; Behold an huge Serpent creeping out of a secret place fills all their mindes with horrour and Devotion: For the Priests with great veneration cryed out, The God himselfe is in this Snake, and being sometimes seen in this shape, it alwayes imports a good and healthful Omen. Two dayes Pet. Diacon. Hist Miscella. 2. 11. was he seen in the Temple and then again withdrew himself; the third day through the midst of the throng of Spectatours and Adorers he went directly to the Port where the Roman vessel Liv. Epit. 11. attended them; and entring into the Ship, he rolls himself up according to his spiral manner, in the Cabbin of Q. Ogulnius President of the Embassy. There is an antient story that the Pausan. same Æsculapius having assumed the forme of a Serpent was carried from Epidaurus to Sicyon by a Yoake of Mules, one Nicagora, the wife of Echetimus driving the waine.

The Romans rejoyceing at the good Omen, as having the God himself present among them, hoised sail, and in a few dayes with a prosperous Voyage, crossed the Seas and arrived at Antium; where the Sea being troublesome, and their navigations hindred; the serpent which had Aust. de viris Illust. Ovid. Val. Maximus. kept it self still and quiet all the voyage, creeping out the Ship, glided to the Porch of the most eminent Church in that City, and there abode three whole dayes together: The Romans much fearing they should never draw him from thence, seeing he had not in so long time returned to his wonted sustenance; but at length having regained, him with much cheerfulness they conveyed him to Rome: The whole City ran out to the sight of so incredible a wonder; on the Ovid. banks of the river as he passed by many altars were erected, incense and sweet odours prepared, and sacrifices slain. They were now just come to that place, where Tibur a little dividing it self, suffereth an Island to appear in the midst of it; when the Serpent forsaking the Ship betakes Suetan in Claudio. c. 25. himself into that Island by swiming, and was not afterwards any more seen by man; hence was the place call'd the Island of Æsculapius. The Fathers all agreeing that the Gods had chosen that place, decreed a Temple to be there erected to Æsculapius. The sickness whether by Tab. marmorea apud Mercurium de arte gymnastica. l. 1. this remedy, or that it had otherwise run its full course did suddenly cease; the Temple was quickly inriched with many extraordinary offerings, and its renown wonderfully spread abroad by those who profest to have received help in their diseases from this God. L. Posthumius the Consul carried the same pride with him into his Province which he had exercis'd against his Col- Diony. apud Vales. league at home: For whereas Q. Fabius Gurges, the last years Consul, did by order from the Senate mannage affairs in Samnium as Proconsul: Posthumius arrogantly writes to him commanding him to depart the Province, in as much as himself was sufficient to wage that War. Fabius answering with the Dercee of the Fathers, and that it was not safe for him to desert a business imposed on him by the Senate; the Romans upon this news feared lest by the discord of the Commanders, the Common-wealth would be damnified: Wherefore 'twas thought fit to send Legates to the Consul, to desire in the Senates name that Fabius might be suffer'd to continue Dion apud Valesium. with the Army in Samnium. Posthumius having returned an absurd and broken Answer; added withall a speech of singular impudence: That during his Consulship, he was not obliged to obey the Senate, but they him; and that his actions might correspond with his words, forthwith dismissing the Legates, he marcheth with his Army to Cominium, which City Fabius did then besiege; resolving (if by no other means he could) by fight to remove his Rival: The Roman Armies had afforded the enemy a foul spectacle, if Fabius had resisted with the same he was assaulted; but he being better temper'd both by nature and his Fathers documents departed the Province, having profest that he yeilded not to the Consuls fury, but to the good of the Common-wealth. Posthumius in a few dayes reduced Cominium, whence leading his Army to Venusia, and taking that also, he carried about the War to other Towns; many whereof partly by force, partly by treaty were brought under his power. In this Expedition ten thousand of the enemies were slain, six thousand two hundred casting down their arms, yeilding themselves to the mercy of the conquerours. The Consuls atchievements were no way contemptible, but the grace of them were spoiled by his pride and Insolence: Wherefore when he did by Letters advise the Fathers that the City aud Territory of Venusia was very convenient for a Colony therein to be planted, the counsel indeed was accepted, but without mention made of the Author of the Victory and the counsels, other men had the conduct of the Colony of twenty thousand men; for so I find it in Authors of no small credit: A great number indeed and almost exceed- Horatius satyr. 2. 1. ing belief, but that it seems reasonable, that in the midst of Nations, yet unsubdued they should think of placeing a considerable force, as a double guard both against the Apulians and the Lucanians. Now the stubbornes of Posthumius, as besides other grudges and offences, it contracted him much envy; so it tended much to encrease Fabius his Favour and good opinion with with all men, ſo, that when he came to the City, and had made relation of his performances, his triumph was readily aſſented unto. Being now Proconſul he did on the Calends of Auguſt make his triumph over thoſe Samnites who are called Pentri: Old Fabius followed his Chariot on horſ-back, whom the people beheld, and by their acclamations acknowledged not only an Aſſiſtant, but the author of the Victory. He accumulated all the glory of the enterprize upon the peoples Conſul, uſing himſelf as the name, ſo the modeſty of a Legate; beholding his ſons honour with as much complacency, as when, being yet a little one, he did in his own triumph carry him about in his Chariot. Part of the plunder was by the Conſul divided among the ſouldiers, the reſt laid up in the Treaſury; and C. Pontius the Samnite being firſt led in Triumph was afterward beheaded: A ſtout man he was and of worthy memory, who in thoſe dayes did a long time ſuſtain the Roman violence, gave them many conſiderable overthrows, but of all the moſt ſhameful one at the Caudine Spinnies: He was reported to ſay, That had he been reſerved to thoſe dayes wherein the Romans ſhould have learn't to receive money, he would no longer have ſuffered them to bear ſway. It ſeems then the fortune of the City was not better defended by their induſtry in Arms, then their innocence of manners: In the mean time Poſthumius fretting no leſs at the honour had been granted his Rival, then that the like had been denyed him, by weakneſs of mind oppoſing his own contumacy, to the authority of the Fathers, did both exaſperate the wound of his own ſpirit, and imitate thoſe imaginations againſt him, which ought by modeſty of ſpeech and carriage to have been aſſwaged. He abſtained not from complaints againſt his enemies, nor from reproaches againſt the Senate, and to ſpite the Fathers, he deſtributed the whole prey among the ſouldiers, and disbanded his army before a ſucceſſor could be ſent him. He triumphed likewiſe contrary to the pleaſure of the Senate, which, though ſome refer to his ſecond Conſulſhip, I believe more fitly agrees with this conjuncture, and it is ſo affirmed by authors of no mean credit in Hiſtories: By theſe doings he drew new hatred upon himſelf, and he was no ſooner out of office, but the two Tribunes of the people upon a ſet day accuſed him: Beſides what hath hitherto been mentioned, 'twas objected againſt him, that before he march't armed out of the City, he employed two thouſand choice men out of his Legions to digg up a piece of ground, and detained them many days in this work, not remembring they were his ſouldiers, not his ſlaves, and were leavied to enlarge the Publicks Land, not to manure his. Being earneſtly preſſ't with theſe Crimes, and in vain ſtriving to clear himſelf, he was by the ſuffrage of all the Tribes condemned; his ſuit was valued to ſtand him in two hundred thouſand pieces of money. Now P. Cornelius Rufinus, and M. Curius Dentatus entered their Conſulſhips. Each of theſe with his Legions did utterly waſt Samnium, depopulating their grounds, and ruining their Cities, and in many ſet battels having the upper hand compelled them at length to ſue for peace, for having in ſo many battels loſt the prime of their Youth; and in Pontius the chief counſel and conduct, they did by their Embaſſadours ſent firſt to the Conſul, and by their leave to Rome, obtain that now this fourth time a League might be renewed with them. 'Tis likely too the Romans even weary with beating, were willing to conclude a difficult and miſerable War, with the tranquility of a certain peace. I find the war with the Samnites to have begun when M. Valerius was the third time Conſul, A. Cornelius Coſſus being his Colleague, and being through four and fifty Conſulſhips, with various ſucceſs continued (only by ſome ſhortliv'd truces ſuſpended) it held both parties in play with much trouble and vexation; whether Cornelius triumphed for this War is uncertain; as for Manius there is no doubt, for his fortune being more eminent in that he ſubdued other enemies, he Triumphed twice in the ſame Conſulſhip: For the Sabines a Warlike Nation, now grown wealthy with a long peace, whether they were moved with their own proper compaſſion, and Entreaties of the Samnites; or whether willing timely to prevent thoſe miſeries, which (having ſwallowed up their neighbours) they foreſaw approaching to themſelves, having put their young men into Arms, invaded ſome places under the Roman Juriſdiction: Againſt theſe did Curius lead forth his Army; and that he might both divert the enemies, and give the Sabines ſome taſtes of the miſeries of War, he ſent part of his forces by privy journies into their territories with inſtruction, that ſpreading themſelves as much as could be, bringing terrour and vaſtation on every place: This ſtraight did ſoon diſſolve the formidable Army of the Sabines, ſeveral troupes running ſeveral wayes to the defence of their own ſubſtance; ſo that the Conſul had an eaſie Victory over the diſperſed forces. In this Expedition they proceeded as far as the Adriatique Sea, gaining the poſſeſſion of ſo much ground, and ſo many men, as the ſaying of Curius began to be famous, who (according to the genius of thoſe times being more ready in deeds then in words) when he could not expreſs every ſingular circumſtance, in groſs expreſ't himſelf, That he had taken ſo much ground, it muſt needs have turned into wilderneſs, but that he had taken a proportionable number of men; and that he had taken ſo many men, they muſt of neceſſity have periſhed with hunger, but that he had taken a proportionable extent of ground. When the Sabines ſued for peace, not only that was afforded them, but likewiſe the Freedome of the City, (though without the ſuffrage of the Tribes) this favour was in memory of their old Affinity under Tatius, the late War not being carried on with any malignant hatred. Of the next years Conſulſhip (underwent by M. Valerius Corvinus, and Q. Caditius Noctua) we have arrived to little underſtanding; onely I find ſome Colonies about this time deduced to Caſtrum, to Adria (from whence the Sea taketh its name) and to Sena in Gallia: Nevertheleſs conſidering thoſe Regions were not as yet to ſuch a purpoſe ſufficiently ſetled, I think fit rather to encline to other Authors who refer the beginning of those Colonies to after-times: But in the City for restraining many villanies and outrages daily committed, there was a new Magistracy constituted under the name of Capital Triumvirs, who were appointed Judges and Moderators to take cognizance of offences, to imprison the guilty, and, when occasion was, to inflict punishments.

The words of the Law in that case made by L. Papirius, Tribune of the people, I find to be these, Whosoever shall hereafter be Prætor to give Judgment among the Citizens, let him require of the people three Capital men, and those three men, whoever shall be chosen, let them exact sacraments, let them judge, let them be of equal authority, as by the Laws and decrees of the people they ought to Exact, to Judge, and to Be. In which clause commission is likewise given of requiring Mulcts or Fines, for in those dayes that piece of mony which was disbursed by way of punishment, was called a Sacrament, because (the publick sacrifices being many, and the Treasury but low) it was destin'd to be expended in sacrifices.

Of the Taxes that year, there is no other memory left, but that two hundred seventy three thousand Citizens were rated. That this years Censors did likewise choose Q. Fabius Maximus Prince of the Senate, there is a likely conjecture, which is otherwise confirmed, for that honour did constantly remain in three of that Family successively; as for example, Maximus received it from Ambustus his father, and transmitted it to his son Gurges. While affairs were in a good state abroad, they were troubled with discord and sedition at home. The Comminalty being far in debt required a general discharge by publick authority for all debts and bonds passed aforetime, without any satisfaction; this was an old divice, and for two hundred years and upwards variously agitated, even as any turbulent Tribune should exasperate them, or the Extortion of Usurers move their indignation. Under the former Consuls, the fear either of the Pestilence or the Enemy did smother these contentions in some measure; but Q. Marcius Tremulus and P. Cornelius Arvina being Consuls, and the year ensuing M. Claudius Marcellus, and C. Nautius Rutilus bearing office, they broke out most violently, for the appeasing whereof, more then for any other occasion, a Dictator was created, whom I take to be Appius Claudius, who was afterwards sirnamed Cæcus, in as much as among ancient monuments I find him to have been Dictator.

Besides the harshness of unconscionable usury, the villanous lust of C. Plotius added fire to the peoples minds now already hotly disposed, causing them the sooner and more vehemently to break out into flame. T. Veturius (the son of that Veturius who being Consul was delivered up to the Samnites for an unworthy League made with them) by reason of his domestick calamities, overcharged with debt and not able to pay, was forced to yield himself slave to Plotius, patiently performing all servile duties. Plotius not content to have reduced to this base condition a young man of excellent Beauty, of a Consular Family, and likewise of great hopes, did moreover attempt to corrupt his Chastity, having before deprived him both of Estate and Liberty.

But Veturius disdaining and resolveing to suffer any thing rather then commit so horrid a wickedness, was with most grievous stripes tormented, whereupon he thrust himself forth into the publick, and being by the multitude conducted to the Consul's Tribunal, he complains of the cruelty and lust of his Creditor, shewing withal the bunches and fresh marks of the lashes. The Consuls therefore judging it a business not to be neglected, informed the Senate thereof, where upon sentence past, Plotius was condemned to prison, and by a Law in that case established, All men whosoever through the whole City had bound themselves slaves for debt, were set at liberty. I am not ignorant that instead of T. Veturius some Authors make mention of Publius the son of a Colonel, who was one of the contrivers of the Caudine peace. Forty years before this, for the like cause, was a Law made for the annulling such Indentures; nevertheless the Usurers growing so hard-hearted, and the former Law, by the patience of Debtors (refusing nothing in the midst of their penurie) being by degrees neglected, 'twas though fit they should be admonished by so fresh an example to provide more full and diligent caution for the future. But the people desiring to be freed not only from their Indentures, but from the Extortion of Use mony, were not satisfied with that Law though favourable to their revengeful minds. And (as in some more accute diseases, the pain is rather intended by a gentle application of medecines then remitted) not long after the matter was so Exulcerated, that when the Tribunes of the people with their greatest endeavours contended for a Law concerning Letters of Protection from Creditors, and that the Creditors did with equal force and animosity resist: The Commonalty after the example of their Ancestors, quitting the City, retired cross the water to Mount Janiculus, resolving never, without obtaining their request, to return to their own household-Gods. The Consuls finding little remedy against this combustion (M. Valerius Potitus, and C. Ælius Paetus are thought then to be Consuls) they were fain to flie to the last refuge in distressed times, and create a Dictator, who was Q. Hortensius; he applying what the Time and the Cause seemed to require, and understanding the main breach of peace to consist in this, That the people were sensible of the violation of their Decrees, and the Publilian Law, thought fit to yield to the times, (though many strove against this opinion) and by a new Law made in the Esculete, he diligently provided, That whatsoever the Commonalty should ordain, all the Romans should be obliged unto. With these Lenitives the people being reduc'd to concord, and returned to their own houses, the Dictator, either by the sudden force of his disease, or overwearied with care care and pains, dyed during the time of his Magistracy, which had hapned to none before. Henceforward for a while there was less dissention at Rome; but the Dignity of the Empire began insensibly to decrease, in as much as the Commons not being guarded against the fraudulent proceedings of Ambitious men, and yet earnest to manifest their authority, accepted of any motions, and decreed many things tending to the disgrace of the Publick, and at last struck at the very Foundation. A singular Lesson to those who are invested with the guidance of affairs, seeing the vulgar, if their own private business proceed fairly, seldom meddle with things of an higher nature, not to provoke them by injuries and oppressions of great ones to aspire to a Dominion they know not how to manage. About this time I believe was the Law made concerning sufferages, which the Fathers, to the danger of their own Courts, were fain to authorize. For hitherto it had prevailed that no man executed any magistracy by the peoples votes, unless the Senate assented thereunto.

The Improvident vulgar did for some time contain themselves within their former bounds, and though they seldom contradicted the Fathers Sentences, yet they were alwayes feared as having power to do so. But then Manius the Tribune made a Law whereby the peoples Authority was much augmented, but the wholsome, and honourable severity of the Senate much weakned. Q. Hortensius the Dictator being dead, some report another was chosen to administer affairs, to wit, Q. Fabius Maximus; if so, this was his third Dictatorship. L. Volumnius, C. F. C. N. is said to have been Master of his horse; For there was war at this time with the Volsinians of the Etruscan Nation, which was very seasonable to clear Rome of the seditions, and those who retained the spirit of the former Discord. There was likewise occasion found of waging war with the Lucanians, who being troublesome neighbours, had by many injuries compelled the Thurines (a City of that part of Italy called Great Greece) to betake themselves to the Roman Protection: And C. Ælius the Tribune propounding a War against the Lucanians, the people decreed it. The armies therefore were drawn into the field, and in each place things performed, the memories whereof, with the Annals of those who wrote them, is perished. The Thurines bestowed on C. Ælius a statue and Crown of gold. Next follows the Consulship of C. Claudius Canina, and M. Æmilius Lepidus, whereof no memorable thing is delivered to posterity; only the Etruscan and Lucanian war seem to have been still in being. There is also on Record an Oration of Curius concerning the Lucanians, which is to be referred to one of his four Triumphs, for so often I find he Triumphed. But in what yeare, or with what Magistracy invested, he manag'd those affaires is uncertain.

But things of greater weight were now ingendring, which were attended with a very considerable slaughter, for a war was now arisen against the Senones a people of Gallia. They had often warre and often peace with the Romans; and now, after their last overthrow in the fields of Sentinas, where, Decius haveing Devoted himselfe to Death, a great Number of their men were slaine, had lien still for almost ten yeares; Onely they had suffer'd their young men to be hired by the Etruscans against the Romans. But now marching into Etruria, with a greater power then they had usually done, they Besieged Aretium. Now the Aretines had before this requested a league with the Romans, which beeing denied they did nevertheless obtaine a Truce, whose Terme was not yet expired. But herein did their chiefest Hope of succour consist, because the Romans alwayes thought it mainely concernd them to have the Gaules beaten. Wherefore sending Embassadours to Rome they craved assistance against the common enemy. In the mean time the yeare was gone about wherein C. Servilius Tucca and Lucius Cæcilius Metellus were Consuls; in stead of Cæcilius some annals mention Cælius; But the lesser Nobility of the Cælian family is thought not to have attained the Consular dignity till the yeare from the foundation of the City six hundred and sixtie.

But the Joy for this victory prevailed not ſo much with the Gaules, as ſorrow and Conſternation for the Lamentable Deſolation of their Country; Wherefore gathering together all their Country men then in Armes in Etruria, full of Grief and Anger, void of counſell and hope; having no habitation whereto to be received at home, (I know not what Fate drawing them to their deſtruction) in a heat of Reſolution they drive toward Rome, thus Computing, That there is no other way to recompence the deſolation of their own Countrey, but by forcing the Romans to ſee the like Ruine of their City; That their Spirits and Forces were now no whit inferiour to, nor the cauſe of their March from Aretium of leſs importance, then that of their Anceſtours who marched from Cluſium of the ſame Etruria and took Rome: With the like ſpeeches incenſing themſelves they Ruſh on, by nature impatient of Delay, and now haſty in their Counſels, that they might overwhelme their Enemies unawares; But travelling through an Enemies Countrey, they met with many obſtacles, ſo that the Romans had Leiſure to provide againſt this Fury. At length wandring through unknown and unfriendly places, guided by no certaine Line, they light upon Domitius the Conſull, and immediately joyne Battell with him; But their unhappy raſhneſs confounded both their Reaſon and Diſcipline: many being ſlaine in Battel, the Reſidue growing mad with Rage and deſpaire ſheathed in their own Bowells, thoſe weapons they had in vain drawn againſt the Enemy. Inſomuch as ſo ſudden and vehement a Judgement overtook a late moſt flouriſhing People for their villany in murthering Embaſſadours, that in the ſpace of few months they were totally cut off, and ceaſed any more to be numbred among Nations, whoſe laws they had violated and Tranſgreſſed: For even the ſmall Remnant of the Senones who had betaken themſelves to their Neighbours, and Kinſmen the Boii, were the next year by Dolabella the Conſull with an univerſal ſlaughter clean ſwept away. For whereas the Boians and Etrurians were involv'd in theſe late diſaſters, and poſſeſſed with fear of the ſame Calamities, they were at the Lake called Vadimonis in a ſet Battell overcome, many of the Etrurians ſlain, few of the Boians eſcaped, the very name of the Senones ſo utterly extinct, that that there is not thought to be left alive one Man of that Nation which had set Rome on fire. About this time I think it more probable that the Colony was planted in Sena, the Romans having now an entire possession of their Countrey, and quite taken away their Name out of that part of Italy. Nevertheless the Etrurians and the Boians next year recruiting their army with young men now grown up, ventred once more to try the Fortune of a Battell. Then it was I believe by Q. Æmilius Papus that they were beaten, for his and C. Fabricius his first Consulship hapned that year, and 'tis certain the Province of Etruria fell to Papus by Lot. But in most Annalls yet extant, the Memory of these Transactions is swallowed up by the Intervening of greater matters. For whereas the Romans had by so many continuall fights and victories very mightily encreased their Virtue and Power, all the free Cities and Nations in Italy being brought into feare, conspired in a great and most dangerous warre; joyning together all their Counsells and forces as against a Common Enemy, and Plunderer. Neither thought they fit any longer to deferre their Designe, while now the Remnant of the Boians and Etrurians sufficed to distract the Roman Powers. And first of all the Samnites, again breaking their League and openly joyning force with the Lucanians and Brutians, commenced the Warre. But these were overcome by C. Fabricius in many pitch'd fields; especially in one most remarkable when they joyn'd battell neer the City of the Thurines, which Statius Statilius had again streightly besieged; where the Enemy was with a very great slaughter beaten, and their Camp likewise forced and taken. It is reported that while the camp was strenuously defended, A young man of large proportion of Body was seen to bring Ladders to the works, whereby the Romans being animated obtained a complete victory. Twenty Thousand are said to be slain in the fight and in the Camp, Five thousand together with the General taken Prisoners, and twenty Colours. The next day the Consull resolving to reward those whose valour had been eminent, and promising a CORONA VALLARIS to him who first entred the Enemies Camp. After diligent Enquiry made after the man, the souldier was not to be found (if so be he were a souldier) who would claime this Honour; 'Twas therefore believed and voiced abroad that Mars was the Author of this feat, and the Cause of Victory; And by the Consull's order supplication was made unto him, which the souldiers with Laurells on their heads performed with great Joy and Gladness. The Tarentines had not as yet assisted the Accomplices with any open aid; for though they were the Principal Authors of the Confederacy, yet they thought it wiser to let the Roman forces be provoked and the Fortune of warre tried with other men's danger then their own. But this Dissimulation served not their purpose, for a meer accident provoking the Rarshness of the Giddy rabble betrayed all their Counsels. Even at this Time, that part of the Italian shore, after the Manner of the Græcians (by whom Tarentus and most of the other Cities were builded) did excessively delight themselves with sights, and stage playes: The Tarentines above others were most Luxurious in this kind, insomuch as it is said they had more Feasts and Solemn Playes then Dayes in the Yeare. It hapned they were then set at their sports in the greater Theatre by the Haven side, when L. Valerius (some say Cornelius) one of the Admiralls of the seas was descryed entring the Haven with ten Roman Vessels; A Fatall Errour to both Parties; For the Romans ignorant of all things betook themselves thither as to a friendly and amicable shore; the Tarentines on the other side Conscious of their own Privy practises interpreted this Navy to be sent with an hostile Intention. There was then present one Philocharis whom for his loose Conversation the Citizens call'd Thais; He mentioning the articles of some former Leagues, said it was not lawful for the Romans to saile past the Promontory of Lacinium, that therefore they should go out and meet the foole-hardy Barbarians, and suppress their Pride with a Mischiefe. The giddy Rout besotted with continual drinkings manifest their assent by Acclamation, so that one scandalous persons opinion in a matter of so great importance was generally received, and without further Consideration they take up armes, and assault the Ships: The Romans as not dreaming of any such Encounter, being utterly unprepar'd to fight, betook themselves to flight. The Tarentines swiftly pursuing, Five ships onely made their Escape; as many being hemm'd about were brought into the haven, whereof Foure with the Admirall were drown'd and one taken; The Men, as many as were of age and strength fit for Warre, were slaine, the rest made slaves. Presently with the same vanity they wage warre against the Thurines, accusing them, That the Romans came into these parts by their meanes, who though they were Græcians, had yet in the time of their distress chosen a Barbarous Nation to be their Protector, rather then the Tarentines their Neighbors and Kinsmen. The City is taken and plundred, the Chief men cast out and banish'd, and the Roman Garrison compounding for their own safety are dismissed. The Romans hearing the Newes, were according to the Greatness of the Injury most exceedingly incens'd, yet thought it not convenient at that season to undertake a new warre: An Embassy was decreed to complain of the Outrage, and instruction was given the Legates to Require, That the Captives should be set at Liberty, the Thurines goods or the just value of them should be restor'd, the Exiles call'd back, and the Authors of these Misdemeanours deliver'd into the hands of the Romans. The Tarentines according to the Greeke Custome were wont to assemble their People together in the Theatre; whether the Embassadours being with much Difficulty admitted, they find a Rabble-rout totally debauch't with Drunkenness and Idleness, for this likewise was a great Holy-day with the Tarentines. There when L. Posthumius the Prince Legate begin to declare his message, he was entertained with such mocks and scoffs of the wanton multitude, that he carried home greater causes of hatred then he came to complain of. For they had him in such contempt, that not regarding any thing else he spoke; when, as being a Roman, he chanced to pronounce any word not so exactly according to the Greek manner, the whole company would burst out into laughter, crying out upon him and reviling him as a Barbarian, they jear'd and flouted at the Habit of the Embassadors, for they came in their gowns, and at last fairly thrust them out of doors, in vain claiming the priviledge of the Laws of Nations. Now, what is scarce fit to be spoken, but may prove of good example to curb the insolence of popular licence, it is reported, That as the Embassadors pressed through the croud of the Tarentines out of the Theatre, a certain Buffoon, one Philenides (for in this the Tarentines were beholding to their good manners, the Names of their Jesters were recorded in their Annals, though their Princes were forgotten) like an impudent Dog, piss'd upon the sacred Vestments of the Embassadors. This might seem the crime of one only mad furious fellow, but that forthwith the whole drunken society did own it, and the whole Theatre resounded with laughter, and clappings of the hands, as approving the fact. Postumius lifting up his voice, We accept this, O men, O Jupiter (saith he) seeing ye bestow those things upon us we required not at your hands. And when he turned himself to the multitude shewing his defiled garment, they renew'd their laughter, and began to dance, singing scurrilous and reproachful Verses against the people of Rome, wherefore Postumius again crying out, Laugh on, saith he, laugh on, Tarentines, while ye may, for hereafter ye shall weep sufficiently: Whereat the Tarentines being nettled, Nay, saith he, to vex you the more, I tell you before hand, this garment shall cost you much blood the washing. After this, receiving no other answer, they sailed home. Now at Rome, L. Æmilius Barbula, and Q. Marcius Philippus, had begun their Consulship, by whom the Senate being convened, and the Robe defiled, as it was, being shew'd by the Embassadors, who declared to the Fathers the whole series of affronts and indignities heaped on them by the Tarentines: Their spirits were in an high manner incensed, and not so much as any scruple made of vindicating their reproach by Arms. But because they had already to deal with so many mighty Nations, they could not resolve whether now immediately, or hereafter to send an Army against the Tarentines, and the debate continued many dayes even from morning till night: Some were of opinion, That nothing should be enterprized before the other Cities, at least those near Tarentus were reduced; others contended, That the war should incontinently be commenced; at last, numbring their votes, it was decreed, That the business of the Tarentine war should be referr'd to the people.

The people with an unanimous consent agreed upon the War, and accordingly letters were sent to Æmilius the Consul, who was then gone to the Army into Samnium, That omitting all things at present, he should pitch his Camp in the Tarentine Fields, and, unless he could procure satisfaction for the injuries received, that he should prosecute them with a just and holy War. The Tarentines perceiving they had now no longer to deal with a few unarmed men, but a just and well order'd Army, rouzing themselves out of their accustom'd sottishness, began seriously to enter into counsel, what was to be done; to accept of the war was dangerous, to do what the Romans required in satisfaction was base, and to avoide both impossible: While their opinions were thus doubtful, one among the rest stood up and said, "Why do we thus, O Tarentines, wast the time in vain altercations? the times are come which require Deeds rather then "Words, which that they may be order'd to the publick benefit, there is need of free Speech "and sincere Counsel. Neither am I much moved that heretofore, by a strange disease incident "to Free Cities, ye have been delighted with flattering and sugar'd Orations, though of ill consequence, because then, as in time of Prosperity, ye regarded not much what mainly tended "to the good of the Commonwealth: But now the Roman Army is upon our Borders, and the "fear of the enemy before our Gates, and this is sufficient to instruct us to prefer what is Profitable before what is Pleasing. Neither would I have you so interpret me, as if I stood up to "hit you in the teeth with past misdemeanors; for unseasonably to object old crimes is the part "of an enemy, and one who wanton only insults over others infirmities: And an honest man that is "careful of the common safety, will hide and excuse the faults of his City, unless the remembrance of them be of concernment to the avoiding some publick Calamity. For seeing we "are but men, to pretend freedom from all error, would argue too much Pride: But often to "fall at the same stone, and not to grow wiser when the very event plainly chastiseth our rashness, is not consistent with right reason. We have at one man's warning all sunk and drown'd "the Roman ships, and presently with open war vexed our Kinsmen the Thurines, because they "had rather be protected by the Romans, then swallowed up by the Lucanians and Brutians; "moreover, we have suffered shameful indignities to be cast on the Roman Embassadors; so "that a war we might have avoided, a heavy dangerous war we are not provided for, hath in a "most unlucky time overtaken us. Finally, the Roman Camps are now pitch'd in our fields, and "and we as yet wavering in our counsel, deliberate still whether it be safer to accept a formidable war, or make a dishonourable peace. And I would to God at length, that laying aside "all self flattery, and forgetting self-interest, and aiming at the publick honour and profit, we "might freely and truly consult together, there might certainly a way be found of making an "honest league, or a safe war. But now I see you clearly divided into two parts, I may say factions, not taking counsel out of judgment or as the state of things require, but every man "by-

'byaſſed by his own inclination. For how comes it to paſs that ſo few of the young men, and 'poorer ſort ſtand for peace? and why do none of the rich and ancient men deſire war? what Zonaras 'other reaſon can be given of ſo equal a diviſion in the City, but theſe that would fain in quiet reap 'the commodity of their Lands and Uſury, the other in time of war, hope for command and 'liberty of plunder? This is an old diſeaſe amongſt us, neither of a long time hath our Com- 'monwealth wanted ſuch men, who even with the danger and detriment of the City have ſtu- Diodorus 'died to increaſe their own private wealth. All which may happily be prevented (for I muſt 'ſpeak what I think at preſent moſt conducible) if ye will neither buy peace on ſuch baſe condi- 'tions as ſhall infringe the priviledges of a Free City, nor yet truſt ſingly to your own Forces in 'ſo difficult a war. Our Anceſtors have often committed the conduct and command of their Appian 'Armies to forreign Leaders: Either out of Peloponneſus or out of Sicilie we have ſent for Strab. book 6 'Archidamus the ſon of Ageſilaus, afterward for Cleonymus, then preſently for Agathocles. 'Even in our own memory when we were infeſted by our Neighbours, our Fathers made uſe of 'Alexander the Epirot: By which means they did not only themſelves ſucceed proſperouſly, Liv. 8. 24 'but left things in a flouriſhing condition to us. There is at this day the ſame friendſhip between 'us and the Epirots, neither are they now leſſe potent in an Army and a Commander: And the 'benefit is freſh in memory, which Pyrrhus received from us, in that with our whole Navy we 'aſſiſted him in his attempt againſt the Corcyræans. Therefore eſteem this not as my counſel, Pauſan. book 1 'but as the counſel of the wiſeſt men who have heretofore happily governed this Commonwealth, 'which ye ought therefore at leaſt to follow, becauſe in the former example you may diſcern 'both the reaſon and ground, as alſo the iſſue and ſucceſſe of it. And yet otherwiſe, there may 'be arguments moſt evident and ſufficient to the ſame purpoſe: There is no man amongſt us ſo 'ſingularly eminent, to whom all the reſt will willingly ſubmit themſelves, and what danger there 'is in emulation, when we have to do with a fierce and potent Enemy, ye are not ignorant. And 'whoſoever ye ſhall make General, either by his too great affection to peace, or by his am- 'bition of carrying on the war, may wrong your affairs; not to ſay, that 'tis not ſafe to 'commit a war into the hands of any ordinary perſon againſt the Romans, an hardy ſtout Na- 'tion and inur'd to Arms. But the truth is, which none can doubt of, that Pyrrhus is not by 'any man exceeded in virtue and experience of Maſhal affairs. But perhaps he will not come? Plutarch. in 'Certainly, being a man deſirous of action, and having no other war at preſent, he will not only Pyrrho. 6. 25 'come himſelf, but bring a formidable ſtrength, and that of no freſh-water ſouldiers. And if 'ye fear his encroachment upon your Liberties, ye may treat with him on ſuch conditions as 'the Commonwealth may be ſecur'd. By this means ye may either obtain an honourable peace, 'or beſtow a glorious one. Though indeed it be not the leaſt of my hopes, that the Romans 'will rather beforehand deal with us on equal terms then admit of Pyrrhus into Italy, having 'heretofore feared a King of much leſſe glory and renown out of the ſame Epirus. This counſel prevailed not only ſo far, as to make them ſee a probable way opened to the publick ſafety, but likewiſe the aſſembly being divided into two contrary opinions, neither part being able to prevail over the other, they did all unanimouſly concur in this, as ſeeming indifferent to both ſides.

'Tis reported, when the Rumour was ſpread about the Citie, that a decree was made for Plutarch. the invitation of Pyrrhus that one Meton a coveteous fellow, taking a dry wither'd chapplet upon Pyrrho. 6. 26. his head, after the manner of Drunkards, together with his minſtrel, entred the Theatre; the people according to their idle cuſtome, commanded him to ſing and his woman to pipe, after a while ſilence being made, Meton crys out, Ye doe well, O Tarentines, in that ye grant Liberty to them that pleaſe, to ſing and Dance; for when Pyrrhus once comes into the Citie we ſhall ſcarce be allow'd to live after our owne minds. The People being ſomewhat moved at this ſaying, and murmurings and whiſperings ariſeing; Thoſe who were authors of the injuries againſt the Romans (fearing leſt if peacefull Counſels prevailed they ſhould be delivered up to puniſhment) having chid the people, That they would ſuffer themſelves to be unworthily derided by a raſh fellow, forcibly thruſt Meton out of the Theatre; ſo that afterward without contradiction on the Decree was ratified. But the Roman Conſul, hearing nothing from the Tarentines Zonaras tending to peace, and underſtanding that Embaſſadours were ſent with preſents to Pyrrhus, Oroſius 4. 2 ſets himſelf to the War, waſteth their grounds, taketh their Cities ſome by force, ſome by compoſition, and fills all places with loſſe, and terrour. The Tarentines ſend forth forces Zonaras to hinder the ſpoile, but, after a ſharpe conflict, the Romans having the better, the Græcians are droven backe into the Citie with great loſſe. Then Æmilius without reſiſtance waſteth and burneth the whole Country round about. The Tarentines terrified with theſe calamities, (like a people, the more inſolent in proſperity, the more dejected and fearefull in adverſity) ſubmit themſelves to the Goverment of Agis, who was a conſtant authour of maintaining the Roman friendſhip. Their deſire and hopes of peace were much augmented by the diſcourſe of ſome prime men who were diſmiſſed by the Conſull, and declared his Humanity, With what Indulgence and candour he entertain'd thoſe who were taken in ſeverall places of the Countrie, or in the laſt fight. But the confidence of Cineas who was now come with Auxiliaries from Epirus changed their minds, and erected their ſpirits. For Pyrrhus being a man of vaſt conceits, and in emulation of Alexander the Great, comprehending large Empires in his fancy, believed now a way to be laid open to accompliſh all his deſignes, as if the Fates themſelves had invited him.

'Tis said he was much confirm'd by the Oracle of Delphos, whose words were indeed of an ambiguous sense, which yet the Kings ambition did favourably interpret. For consulting about the War he was now to undertake, Answer was made, Posse eum Romanos vincere, that he should overcome the Romans, or the Romans him. But I think his chiefe encouragment was from the Tarentine Embassadour who affirm'd, That out of their own Cities, with the help of the Lucanians, the Messapians, Samnites and other the confœderats, they could easily raise twenty thousand horse and three hundred and fifty thousand foot. With this strength, when he should once have brought the Romans under subjection, he hoped with little paines to attaine the Lordship of all Italy; then a short cut into Sicilie would present him with an Island much at discord and void of a Ruler (the families of Agathocles being destroyed) and this he thought he might claime by right of Inheritance, as having begotten Children on Lanassa the daughter of Agathocles; these things happily succeeding he was resolv'd to make War with the Carthaginians. Tis reported that Cineas, a man of excellent wisdome, willing to have the King by his own confession acknowledg that his immoderate desires, whereby the enjoyment of his present felicity was disturbed, were in reason to be restrained, asked him, What he would doe when he had overcome the Romans? Pyrrhus then declaring how one victorie would beget another, And what shall we doe, saies he, when all these things are accomplish'd? Why then, saith Pyrrhus, we will enjoy the fruits of Peace, the benefit of ease and Idlenesse. To which Cineas replied, And why, O King, can we not at present enjoy the same things, while they are in our hands? whereas the undertakeing of new Wars may utterly deprive us of them. But a second embassy comeing from the Tarentines, Pyrrhus overcome by his own ambition, answer'd, That 'twas the custome of the Epirots to wage War, not only for themselves, but for their companions and friends also. But to dissemble his more secret counsells, he articles very resisely with the Embassadours, That assoone as he had reliev'd them, he should be suffer'd to returne home; and not be detain'd in Italy any longer then necessity should require. Then with all might and maine intending himselfe upon preparation for the War, he causeth a great number of long ships to be made ready, and likewise trims up others for transportation of men and horse. Now having Employed most of the Italian Embassadors (whom under a pretext of honour he detain'd as hostages and pledges) in levying and conducting of forces; he sent the rest beforehand to Tarentum, with three thousand armed men, and Cineas for Commander. By their arrival all hopes of peace were broken off, Agis his government abrogated, and by decree of the people the guidance of affairs committed to one of them who were now returned from Epirus. Not long after Milo being sent by the King, secures the Tower of Tarentus with a Garrison, and claims the custody and defence of the walls, with the very good will of the multitude, who were glad to see strangers undertake all the trouble and labour, while they safely enjoy'd their rest; they therefore chearfully decree Corn for the souldiers and Mony for Pyrrhus.

In the mean time L. Æmilius understanding of the Arrivall of these beyond-sea souldiers, that he might have the safer winter quarters, resolv'd to draw his army into Lucania. His journey was by certain narrow passages shut in on the one hand with the Sea, on the other with ragged and impassible Rocks. The Tarentines having intelligence of his purpose, sail'd by that shore with their ships furnished with Cross-bows and Slings, assaulting the souldiers as they passed through strait and open paths with stones and darts. But Æmilius, not being able to help himself by virtue, secur'd his passage by cunning; the Captives which before he had placed in the Rear, he now draws to that side of the ranks which was obnoxious to danger, in pity of whom, the Tarentines fearing to hurt their own men, spared also the enemy. These things were done at Tarentus this year. At Rome C. Fabricius Luscinus, who in his Consulship had egregiously overcame the Samnites, and Lucanians entred the Capital in Triumph. Q. Marcius not many daies after obtained the same honour, being returned out of Etruria with prosperous success. The reason why, the Etrurian war not as yet being finished, he was called out of his Province at such a time of year (for Fabricius triumph'd the third of the Nones of March) is not recorded. I conceive he was recall'd by the Senate, who being troubled with expectation of Pyrrhus, did from every quarter gather together what strength they could. The Proletarii, the sixth and last rank of Citizens, who of old were priviledg'd from going to war, were now listed, and being not able by reason of their poverty to provide themselves with arms, they were furnished by the publick; for at this time war being on every side commenced, it was necessary the Commonwealth should be defended by many Armies. These mens office was, while the Legions were otherwise imployd, to guard the City with watch and ward, being disposed in several stations upon the walls, and in the Market-place. Neither by all these contrivances could the Imminent calamities have been averted, but that the fortune of a City ordained to Rule did in these most dangerous times produce men of so great Excellency, as I know not whether ever she could boast of better: Men, not so eminent for their Riches or Extraction, as truly ennobled by their Virtue and contempt of wealth. This Age had its Curii, Fabricii, Coruncani, men of no great Ancestors or Possessions, but of most ample fame, which they obtained by their upright example, exact skill in Marshal affairs, and an answerable innocence of Manners, who were every where helpful to their Country, which had now need of Champions, which were able not only to resist the sword of the enemy, but to scorn his gold, having to deal with a King who was potent in both. In the mean time Pyrrhus, not waiting for the spring, coming with with two and twenty Thousand foot, three thousand horse, twenty Elephants, and a considerable band of slingers and archers, was in the midst of his Voyage so tossed with a Tempest, that he narrowly escaped being cast away. For the Navy being dispersed, and most of the ships distressed, when the Admirall was in danger, Pyrrhus leapt into the sea, and with very great paines at length hardly swam to shoare: But the strength and spirit of his minde did much helpe the weakness of his Body, together with the dilgence of the Messapians, on whose shoare he was cast, who with all offices of humanity did foment and cherish him: with their assistance likewise, some few ships, which had escaped the violence of the storme, being brought into the Haven, there were gathered together some few horse, with two Elephants, and under two thousand footmen, with this force he marched to Tarentus, being met by Cineas who came forth with his souldiers to conduct him thither, and being entertained with much joy he took his rest for some dayes; In which space having observed the Manners of the City to be so order'd, that unless they were amended, there was no possibility of protecting it, but that rather the Patrons themselves would likewise be undone by it, he took no open notice at the present. But a while after, his dispersed ships meeting together, when he had strength sufficient, he shut up their wrestling places, and Porches, where the idle youth use to spend whole dayes in walking and fooling; he forbad their Banquets and Drinking-matches, and reduced their solemn Games from Intemperancy to a just Mediocrity.

After this he made a very strict Leavy of their young men, commanding his Pressers to choose out those of the larger size, he would make them valiant; Mixing these among his own Companies lest being apart they should prove seditious, he traines them up with the same hardness and severity of Discipline, threatning pain of Death on those who should fly from their Colours. Those who were not in armes he compell'd to be most part of the day in the Market-place: by which strange usage the Citizens borne and bred up in shamefull Luxury were grievously perplexed, calling it a slavery to be thus served against their wills, choosing rather to perish with idleness and Lust. The offence was aggravated by the Insolence of some of the King's Guard who choosing Quarters at their own pleasure, possessed them against the will of their Landlords, using much license towards their Wives and Children. Wherefore many being wearied out, forsook the City, and settled themselves in the Country, till at length that likewise was forbidden, the Ports being shut, and guards appointed. Then indeed the Tarentines perceiv'd that in stead of a Companion they had got a Master, and what onely Comfort was left them, when they had any handsom occasion of meeting, they bewailed their Condition with indignation and Complaints, and that more freely, when besides their other Passion, they were heated with Wine; There wanted not those who informed Pyrrhus of this, and some of them being sent for, were accus'd for having spoken dishonourably of their King at their Banquets; But one Man's simple and ingenuous Confession freed them all from Punishment, for saies he, We said these words indeed, and should have said worse but that we wanted Wine; whereat Pyrrhus smiling, dismist them, being willing the fault should be imputed to the wine rather then to the men; But not confiding either in the Mindes or manners of the City, what men he observed to be of greatest Note for Authority or Counsell amongst them, he either found or made some Cause arise to send them to his Son Ptolomy (who being then fifteen yeares of Age he had left Viceroy in his Realme) others by secret Ambush he cut off, and some to make them suspected to the People, he did with much seeming humanity embrace, as if he held them among his dearest Friends. Of this number was Aristarchus a principal Man much beloved of the Citizens, and of great repute for his Eloquence. Pyrrhus perceiving him to be very Popular, upon a certain emergent Occasion commands him to saile into Epirus. Aristarchus (knowing it was present Death to disobey the King; and that to obey him was, though not of so sudden, yet of as certain ill Consequence) taking ship, after he had sailed a little way, steer'd his course to Rome, where being received into credit, he inform'd the Senate of many Affaires of great Concernment: While Pyrrhus thus busied himselfe at Tarentus, the Romans were no less careful in making Leavys for the warre they had raised Money, and sent Fabricius to their Confederate Cities, either by his Authority or Grace to restrain them from Innovation in State; Those who were most suspected were kept in awe by Garrisons conveniently placed amongst them. For the strength of so many Nations combining themselves against one Commonwealth, and their expectation of so Warlike a King, had very much moved the humours of the Italians who were either desirous of Change, or provoked with the perswasion of Injuries receiv'd; which made the Romans the more diligent to provide for their own safety by a timely suppressing all Occasions of sedition. About this Time an Accident befell the Praenestine Nobles very remarkable, for they being brought to Rome late in the Evening were for Custody's sake lock't up in the Publick Treasury, whereby at length they understood the Deceit of an Oracle, which they did make use of to stirre up their Countrymen to Rebellion, often averring, it was Decree'd by the Fates, That the Roman Treasury should be possessed by the Praenestines. The Fathers being already much perplexed, had further Intelligence that Fabricius was detained by their Confederate and Companions as a Pledge to secure the safe return of their hostages from Rome, and that Embassadours were sent to incite the Etrurians, the Umbres and the Gaules against the People of Rome; whereat they were infinitely troubled as at a fact in it selfe horrid, so of ill Example, lest in such a Dangerous time the Roman faith and honesty should be call'd in question, and held suspected by all

At length ſeeing no warre approach neer them, and being by degrees debauch'd with idleneſs and imitation of the Greek Cuſtomes, they began to compare the Advantage they had now in their hands with the hard and laborious life they had hitherto led; and with much Covetouſneſs and Envy did frequently diſcourſe in all their meetings and quarters of the con-

The deſign was favour'd by occaſion of the preſent warre, which ſo wholly took up the Romans, that they had no Leiſure to mind the affaires of Rhegium; Beſides on the oppoſite ſhore were the Mamertines, an Example of the like ſucceſsfull villany, and ready no doubt to defend the like Treachery in others, eſpecially being tyed with the Relation of the

Diodor. ex excerpta ex. lib. 21. warre amongſt the Auxiliaries of Agathocles, and being entertained by the Meſſenians as Friends, having ſlain and caſt out the Citizens, poſſeſs'd the place themſelves: ſharing likewiſe among themſelves their houſes, wives and Eſtates. They called to mind alſo the Campaniams of old, who by the like wicked art got Capua from the Tuſcans. When they had now agreed upon the Buſineſs, there was nothing left to be conſulted on, but only the Manner, how ſafely to execute their Deſign, leſt in ſo populus a Citie, the leſſer number ſhould be ſurrounded and ſlain by the greater. Decius counterfeiteth Letters as wrote from the Rhegians to Pyrrhus, to betray the Roman Garriſon to him; theſe Letters as if they were intercepted, are read to the ſouldiers in private, Decius bitterly complaining of the Perfidiouſneſs of the Rhegians; and ſome ſouldiers being ſubborned to it, cry out, 'Twas time to provide for their own ſafety by the ſword, and turn that Deſtruction which was deſtin'd to them, upon the heads of the Authors; and as the buſineſs was ſet, a Meſſenger comes in with newes, That Pyrrhus his Navy was ſeen by the ſhore, and ſecret diſcourſes were had between him and the Rhegians. The ſouldiers now beſide their former Covetouſneſs, were much incenſed with the Treachery of the Enemy, and fear of Danger; It is therefore by Common Conſent reſolv'd upon, That the Townesmen ſhall be oppreſſed unawares and unprepar'd, that having ſlain the Men, all the Publick and Private wealth of the City ſhall be diſtributed to the Legion. Behold now an unworthy and horrid fact; Decius having invited ſome of the Prime men to Supper, againſt the holy Rites of Hoſpitality, takes away their Lives; others were every where ſlain in their own houſes; the greater part of the Rhegians being thus murthered, the reſt were baniſhed their Country, even by thoſe whom of late they had entertain'd under the Name of Friends and Companions, for preſervation of themſelves and their Countrey. Execution being done, there is now a new face of Publick affaires; the houſes and Eſtates of the poore wretches like the Plunder of an Enemy, is divided amongſt the Thieves; and while the Blood is yet freſh and warme, the Matrons and Virgins are forced to Marry the murtherers of their husbands and Parents; and the Cruel Perfidious Legion arrogates to it ſelfe the Title and Rights of the City of Rhegium. But it hath pleaſed God well to provide for Mankinde, that ſuch rare examples of high Miſchiefe ſhould prove likewiſe as manifeſt Examples of Vengeance and Divine Juſtice; Leſt we ſhould onely by conſideration of the ſucceſs be animated to the like Villany, and not by the Iſſue and event be deterr'd from evil doing, ſo that no true Felicity attends the Wicked, neither can there be a greater Madneſs then for any man to perſwade himſelf that he can grow happy by doing Miſchief: For ſuppoſe there were no Puniſhment after Death, which all wiſe men acknowledg to be the greateſt, (for the folly of ordinary men is ſo great they will ſcarce believe what is before their eyes, much leſs be moved with the terrour of things unſeen and afarre off,) yet let all things as to outward ſhew ſucceed proſperouſly, nevertheleſs the Conſcience of offences committed doth by ſecret wounds continually lacerate and torment the minde: the Name of the Living, and the memory of the Dead is had in perpetual hatred and Deteſtation among men: and what is by ill meanes gotten, and with care and labour preſerved is moſt commonly to their great grief ſnach't away again, neither God nor men ſuffering Wickedneſs to go long unpuniſhed. It will not be amiſs briefly to relate the Livie 28. 28. puniſhment of Decius Jubellius, and his mad Accomplices, as in theſe dayes it befell; for their Final deſtruction after great variety of troubleſome Chances, was deferred to the Tenth year, as ſhall in fit time be declared. Theſe Raſcalls did not long enjoy Comfort or Tranquility amongſt
Diodorus themſelves; The feare of the Romans and Pyrrhus they did indeed avoid, as by reaſon of the preſent Conjuncture of Affaires, ſo by holding ſtrict ſociety with the Mamertines, and reſolving to Offend neither Party: For 'twas thought ſafeſt in their firſt beginnings to abſtain from warre at the preſent, while their New City which had ſo violent and ſudden an Original, ſhould have time to ſtrengthen, compact and knit it ſelfe well together: they ſaw that without Danger they could not moleſt the King, and were in hopes the more readily to obtain Pardon from the Romans, if they bore not arms againſt them. The firſt cauſe of diſſenſion, as is uſual among Thieves, aroſe from an unequal diviſion of the Plunder. Decius in the ſedition was caſt out and betook himſelf to Meſſana, the Souldiers at Rhegium choſe M. Cæſius his Secretary for their Commander, and Decius carrying with him a great bank of mony, was honour'd with the ſame dignity by the Mamertines, though his fortune was neither proſperous nor of continuance. For it hapned, that being troubled with ſore eyes, he cauſed ſome Eminent Phyſician to be ſought out for him; the Divine Vengeance hereby overtaking the wicked man with moſt ſharp and bitter puniſhments: A Phyſician was therefore brought unto him, who prov'd to be by birth a Rhegian, but becauſe he had lived ſo long at Meſſana, his original was not only unknown to Decius, (who would never have truſted himſelf to the mercy of a Rhegian) but likewiſe to moſt of the inhabitants of the City. Val. Maximus 2, 7, 15 Diodorus

He being mindfull of his Country and reſolving now to be revenged for its Calamites, perſwaded Decius that the remedie he brought, was indeed ſtrong in Operation, but of quick and moſt certaine efficacy: So applying the medicine which he had temper'd with the Juice of Cantharides, and giveing order it ſhould not be removed till he returned to the Patient, without delay he taketh ſhip, and flyeth from Meſſana. Decius being along time ſufficiently tormented with incredible paines, ſeeing his Phyſician came not at him commanded the Medicament to be removed, which being waſhed off, he perceived himſelf to be ſtarke blind. So that being now a blind Exul, infamous and diſpiſed, he is reſerved to judgement, as if he were bound in Chaines; by a wonderfull Method of Divine Vengeance, in that he received this Plague from one to whom he had truſted his health, even as he himſelfe had by Cruelty and treachery circumvented thoſe whom he ought to have protected. Tis fit ſuch Examples as theſe ſhould be recorded in Hiſtory and tranſmitted to poſterity, for the Benefit of mankind which is never ſufficiently convinced how farre theſe Cunning practiſes are different from wiſdome and right reaſon; ſo that neglecting the Rules of Virtue, Honeſty, and Fidelity, they doe for love of falſe and onely ſeeming good things by foul and villanous luſts involve themſelves in true Evills. Diodorus Appian

BOOK III.

NOW at Rome, part of their forces being kept at home for guard of the City, and for a reſerve againſt the uncertain chances of war, the Armies and Provinces were committed to the charge of the new Conſuls. P. Laverius Lævinus was deſigned againſt the Tarentines and Pyrrhus, and Ts. Coruncianus ſent to finiſh the Etrurian War. Lævinus, thinking it would much avail as to his own reputation, ſo to the Terror of the enemies to provoke them firſt; and that it was profitable to the Commonwealth, to avert the fear and inconveniences of War, as far as might be, from the Roman Territories; leading his Army into Lucania, did there fortifie a Caſtle in a convenient place, furniſhing it with a ſtrong Garriſon, both to retard the proceedings of Pyrrhus, and to keep the Lucanians in awe, whoſe treachery was feared, leſt they ſhould dare to revolt to the enemy. Pyrrhus having intelligence of the Roman Conſul's approach, though his forces were not yet aſſembled together, judging it both diſhonourable and hurtful now in the beginning of the War to manifeſt any token of Fear, with what ſtrength he had at preſent, did forthwith march out to meet him. But that he might find ſome colourable pretence to draw out the buſineſs and gain time, he ſent a Meſſenger with Letters of theſe Contents: Pyrrhus the King wiſheth Health to Lævinus, I underſtand that thou art come forth 473 Zonaras forth with thine army againſt the Tarentines, but leaving it for a while, come thou unto me with a ſmall Retinue, and I, taking cognizance of the quarrel, will compel even thoſe who are unwilling, to yield one to the other in what is equal and right. To this Lævinus anſwer'd, We neither accept of thee as an Arbitrator of our Controverſies, nor fear thee as an Enemy. But thou ſeemeſt to do very abſurdly in aſſuming to thy ſelf the Judgment of other mens Cauſes, who art thy ſelf guilty of a Crime, and haſt not as yet received due puniſhment for entring Italy without our conſent. Know then, that I come no leſſe againſt thee then the Tarentines, to try our Right and Title with a Juſt army, by the Judgment of Mars the Author and Founder of our Nation. And without delay moving his Enſignes, he ſits down between the Cities of Pandoſia and Heraclea, in a Champian ground, being divided from the Enemies Camp by the River Sirius.

'Tis reported that Pyrrhus, walking downe to the River ſide to view the Roman campe, when he had well and diligently conſider'd it, ſaid to one of his freinds, Megacles by name, Theſe Barbarians have martiall'd their Army after no barbarous manner, but wee ſhall ſoone try what metall they are of. Then having placed ſtrong guards upon the bankes, to hinder their Paſſage through the Fordes, he reſolved to expect the comeing of his Companions; not onely for the Reaſon of War, hopeing the Romans in an enemies Country would quickly be in want of neceſſary accommodations, but as much regarding the ſpirit and confidence of Lævinus; whoſe admiration was by a new Teſtimonie encreaſ'd with him, in that he had freely without puniſhment diſmiſſed thoſe ſpies, which were ſent to view his Campe, telling them moreover, That he had another Army bigger then this. In the meane time the Campe being ſo neer, there were many Pickeereings and light skirmiſhes which tended nothing to the main chance. Almoſt fifty dayes being now ſpent in theſe light skirmiſhes, the Conſul being moved with the ſame reaſons to haſten the fight, as Pyrrhus was to defer it, aſſembling his Souldiers together, gave them to underſtand his Intentions, and encourag'd them againſt the fear of a new enemy, extenuating, as much as might be, the fame of Pyrrhus, and the Terror of the Elephants; at length preparing himſelf for all aſſayes, he reſolves either to fight the enemy by Conſent, or compel him to Battel. Therefore ſeeing Pyrrhus ſtill continue in his reſolution, he ſendeth out beſorehand all his horſe, as if to forrage the Country, himſelf with his Legions in Battel Array, expecting till the tumult and noiſe on the other ſide of the River ſhould give them warning. The horſe fetching a compaſs far from the Camps, croſs the River where no Guard was, and immediately advance to the enemies ſtations on that ſide the River: The Epirots terrified with their ſudden approach, betook themſelves to their Camp. Pyrrhus underſtanding the enemie was ſo near, marcheth in all haſt to the River with his whole body of horſe, conſiſting of three thouſand, hoping the Romans in their paſſage through a blind Ford, ſtriving with the ſtream and unevenneſs of the ground and breaking their orders, might there be vanquiſhed. But the Roman horſe interpoſing themſelves, Pyrrhus riding at the head of his Troops, conſpicuous in his ſhining armor, of ſingular ſtrength of Body and Reſolution of mind, he managed the fight every way correſpondent to his Fame and Reputation. He ſo exactly order'd the whole Battel with his Counſel and Directions, as if he were free from all other labour; yet, as occaſion ſerv'd, he would charge and fight in perſon, as if to him belong'd only the Office of a Private Souldier, and that the care of the General iſſue were another man's buſineſs. In the mean time one Leonatus a Macedonian, having obſerved a certain enemy, who neglecting all others, intended himſelf only againſt the King, as he flew up and down the field, directing his horſe to whatſoever quarter he ſpied him in, gave Pyrrhus notice of it, who anſwer'd, No man can avoide the Fate of Mortals, but neither this Italian, nor any other, ſhall grapple with me without his reward, and due puniſhment. He had ſcarce ſpoken the words, when Oplacus (ſo was the man named, a Captain of one of the Frentan Troops) wounded the Kings horſe with his Spear, Leonatus likewiſe wounding his, whereupon the Kings friends round beſetting him killed Oplacus, ſtoutly fighting for himſelf, and delivered the King. But this accident did much daunt the Kings party, as believing him to be ſlain: Wherefore to confirm his Souldiers, as likewiſe to decline dangers intended againſt him, he changed his Armour and weapons with Megacles, and leaving him in the Fight, went himſelf to order and lead up the Regiments. The Roman Legions were now come up, and the Battel a long time fiercely continued with ſo doubtful ſucceſs, that 'tis reported Fortune ſeven times changed, ſometimes the Romans ſometimes the Epirots turning their backs.

But the death of Megacles had like to have reduc'd Pyrrhus his affairs even to a moſt deſperate condition, who being in the Kings armour was aſſaulted by every valiant Enemy who affected the Glory of ſlaying the King: And at length an Horſeman, Dexter by name, having kill'd him, and taking off his Helmet and Gorget, with loud crys carried them to the Conſull, thereby ingenerateing a beliefe in both the Armies of the Kings Death. Hereupon the Gracians were full of Terrour and Conſternation, and no doubt had immediately quitted the Feild, but that Pyrrhus aſſoone as might be, uncovering his head rode up and down, with a loud voyce witneſſeing, That he was a live, and preſent amongſt them, hereby taking away as much Confidence from the Romans, as feare and Deſpaire from his owne ſouldiers. Lævinus perceiving the Time come, wherein to trie the utmoſt Remedie, gave the Signe to his Horſemen whom he had placed in Ambuſh, to fall upon the backe of the enemie. But Pyrrhus againſt this this Troupe commanded his Elephants to be led, which he had likewiſe reſerved for the laſt Terrour to the enemie. This one Contrivance daſh't all the Romans hopes, and gave the Iſſue of the Battaile cleerly on Pyrrhus his ſide. For the men themſelves being aſtoniſhed at the vaſt bulk of their bodies, and the terrible ſhew of armed Warriers on their backs thought they had rather ſeen ſome ſtrange and formidable Monſter, then the ſhape of any Creature by Nature produced; and as for the horſe, they being frightned with the ſight, ſmell and noiſe of beaſts they had never before ſeen, did forthwith, confounding their ranks, flie every one what way was moſt open; and either ſhaking off their riders, or againſt their wills forcing them to flight, they ran upon their own battel, and filled all things with fear and tumult. The Rectors of the Elephants following the perſuit, many of thoſe that fled were wounded from thoſe who ſtood in the Towers upon the Elephants, and more were kill'd and trodden under foot by the beaſts themſelves. The Conſul making uſe of his beſt skill, did as yet keep his main battel together, till, by the command of Pyrrhus, the Theſſalian wing being ſent amongſt them, did rout and ſcatter them, not being able to reſiſt. And no queſtion but in the place they were hemm'd in, they had every man been ſlain or taken priſoners, but that, beſides the Cuſtom of Pyrrhus, who thought it not General like too ſeverely to preſs upon thoſe who fled, leſt by deſpair of ſafety they ſhould be provoked to make more ſharp reſiſtance, the evening likewiſe being far ſpent compelled them to relinquiſh the perſuit. Fortune likewiſe favour'd the remnant of the unfortunate Army, in that an Elephant being wounded turned back and with its braying confounded the reſt. This putting a Remora to the enemy, gave liberty to thoſe that fled to croſs the River into Apulia, where they ſheltered themſelves in a fenced City againſt the preſent danger. I find that in this fight there were fourteen thouſand eight hundred and ſeventy foot of the Romans and their friends ſlain, with two hundred and fourſcore horſmen; there were taken in all eighteen hundred and twelve, in which number were eight hundred and two horſmen; there was loſt likewiſe two and twenty Colours. Whereby I wonder the more why ſome Authors, who undertake exactly to relate this encounter, deny that any notice was taken how many were wanting on the Kings ſide; whereas Dionyſius writeth, that Lævinus loſt little leſſe then fifteen thouſand, and that on the Victor's ſide thirteen thouſand fell. But Hieronimus Cardianus, an impartial writer of thoſe times, affirms, That of the Roman army there fell but ſeven thouſand, and of the Kings army under four thouſand. But this is by all agreed on, That the Victory coſt Pyrrhus the very Flower both of his Captains and Souldiers, and that he was heard to ſay, He was no leſs Conquer'd then Conqueror in that Battel. And when he offer'd the ſpoiles and gifts to Jupiter of Tarentus, he confeſſed as much, inſcribing that ſentence in the Title, and when his friend complain'd, he repli'd, Of a truth, if I obtain ſuch another Victory, I ſhall return into Epirus without e're a Souldier. I have likewiſe an Author that the King himſelf received a grievous wound in this fight, but becauſe others report no ſuch thing, and that I often ſee the circumſtances of ſeveral battels confounded, I dare not in the generall ſilence of ſo many and thoſe more accurate Authors, give credit to one ſingle one.

That it was fought with great animoſity and valour, this one argument is ſufficient, That when Pyrrhus next day view'd the ſlain corps (which for the reputation of his Humanity and Clemency he cauſed to be buried) he finding that all the Romans died with honourable wounds, having their faces turn'd to the enemy, he cry'd out, How eaſie were it for me to gain the Empire of the whole world, if I had but Roman ſouldiers! Neither did he deſer with any compliment and large promiſes to court thoſe who were in his power, to receive pay under him, and not being able to perſwade them, he did, nevertheleſs treat them with great humanity and clemency, freeing them from chains and whatever other reproach uſually attends the fortune of priſoners. But the Romans thus batter'd by the late fight were terrified with another misfortune, though not of ſo great loſs, yet which cauſed more fear and Religious horror. For it was imputed to the manifeſt anger of the gods, that their men who were ſent forth for forrage and relief, were overtaken by a ſudden and moſt violent Tempeſt, wherein four and thirty were amidſt the ſtupendious noiſe of the Heavens, ſtruck dead by Thunderbolts, and two and twenty ſmitten and left half dead, their Cattel alſo by the ſame ſtorm were moſt of them ſlain or made of no uſe.

Liv. Epit. 13 Eutropius Florus 1. 18, 17 Dio. apud Valeſium Oroſius

Pyrrhus in the mean time having taken the empty and forſaken Camp of the Romans, made quick uſe of his victory, waſting all the Neighbour Countries, and turning many people from the Roman friendſhip. The Lucanians and Samnites then come in to him, whom lightly chiding, That they had not aſſiſted him in the battel, he nevertheleſs gave them part of the ſpoils; therein much rejoycing and exulting, That by his own ſtrength, with no other aid but that of the Tarentines, he had ſlain ſo many of the Romans. Pyrrhus being thus intent in reaping the fruit of his Victory, Lævinus on the other ſide curing his wounded, and recollecting his diſperſed men, had gathered together a force no way contemptible, and the Senate (though many imputed the loſſe only to the Conſul's default, and Fabricius ſaid, It ſeem'd to him, that the Romans were not beaten by the Epirots, but Lævinus by Pyrrhus) decreed a recruit and ſupply to be ſent him. When the Cryer proclaimed, That they who would ſerve their Country in the place of them who were ſlain, ſhould give in their names, they liſted themſelves ſo faſt, that preſently they compleated the number of two Legions.

The Conſul recruited with theſe forces, follow'd the ſteps of Pyrrhus, vexing his Army with what inconveniencies he could. And underſtanding the Kings Reſolution to ſeize upon Capua, leading his Army thither in haſt, he prevented him, and preparing all things for Defence, he deterr'd him from aſſaulting the City. Pyrrhus turning his Courſe to Naples, and there likewiſe being fruſtrated of his Expectation, forthwith by long journeys marcheth toward Rome in the Latine high way, and now having paſſed through Anagnia, and the Hernician Territories, taking in Fregella by the way, he was come to Præneſte within Twenty miles of the City; But the Magiſtrates there, aſſoon as they underſtood of the Overthrow, had by Order of the Senate armed their choice young men: and the Fortune of the Roman People had in this the time of their Neceſſity, provided them another very ſtrong help and ſuccour; For the other Conſull Tib. Coruncianus encountring the Etrurians with better ſucceſs, had tied the whole Nation to new Covenants, and being called back by the Senate to the Defence of his Countrey, having no other Enemy to diſtract him, came home with his Victorious Army. Pyrrhus having in vain attempted to draw the Etrurians again into Armes, and conſidering that, beſides a City ſecure with its own guards, he had two Conſulls with their Armies, one on the Front, the other on his Reare, returned back into Campania; where meeting Lævinus with greater forces then before his Overthrow; he ſaid, He had to deale with a Lernæan Hydra, whoſe heads bring lately ſtruck off, ſpring up again in a greater Number; yet confiding in his former Victory, he drew out his Army and martiall'd it as reſolving to fight, and that he might diſcover the Cheerfulneſs of his ſouldiers, and likewiſe terrifie the Enemy, he cauſ'd his men to ſhout and the Elephants to be provoked to bray. But the Romans returned a farre greater and more terrible ſhout, whereby conjecturing the Spirits of each, he judged it fit to abſtain from fight at the Preſent, and complaining of ill omen in the Entrailes of ſacrifices, he drew back his Army firſt into his Camp, and afterward with much plunder and a great Troop of Captives, to Tarentus.

The Romans (who in their hardeſt times had remitted nothing of their Conſtancy, but as to the main Iſſue of the warre alwayes ſpake high, as conceiving ample hopes) thinking this a moſt fit time to give rewards and Encouragement to Virtue, decreed a Triumph to L. Æmilius Barbula for thoſe exploits performed in his Conſulſhip. He triumphed A. D. the fourth of the Ides of July, over the Tarentines, Samnites, and Salentines who were Auxiliaries of the Tarentines. But P. Valerius was order'd to draw the Remnant of his Conquer'd Army into the Setine fields, there to fortifie his Camp, and cauſe them to winter in their huts; About the ſame time the Senate diſputing whether it were fit to redeem the Captives, reſolved affirmatively; that which chiefly perſwaded them, was I believe the Horſemen's Caſe, for they had ſtoutly maintained the fight during the abſence of the Elephants, at whoſe approach the horſe without any fault of the Riders yielded them up to Death, and to Bonds; upon this Errand were ſent Embaſſadours of Principall Dignity, P. Cornelius Dolabella famous for his Deſolation of Sena in Gallia, C. Fabricius Luſcinus, and Q. Æmilius Papus, who two yeares ſince were Colleagues in the Conſulſhip: Pyrrhus by Nature was Endow'd with humanity, the inſeparable Companion of great Spirits, and that he did encreaſe by his Ambition, according to the Vulgar Errour, eſteeming all Virtues the ſervants to Domination, to which onely being intemperately given, he did direct all his Counſells for the attaining it; And though he were not inferiour to any Commander of that Age in Boldneſs of mind and the Arts of Warre, yet was he wont to try all meanes before he came to Blows; he would ſolicite the mind of his Enemy as he ſaw moſt opportune with Feare, or Deſire, or Pleaſure, or Mercy, or with equality and benefit of Conditions. Therefore underſtanding Embaſſadours were coming from Rome, and judging ſo many Conſular men were not ſent but upon ſome Grand Affaires, he was in good hopes they would treat of Compounding a Peace. Therefore that their acceſs might be the ſafer and the more honourable, he ſent Lyco (by nation a Moloſſian) even to the borders of the Tarentine Territories, to meet them with a Guard. Himſelfe on Horſeback with rich Capariſons met them without the Gates, and having magnificently brought them in, he entertain'd them with all Reſpect, liberality and plenty that might be.

you

you ſhall both more eaſily by Treaty obtain what you deſire, and likewiſe ſeem for no other Cauſe but the innate Greatneſs and Goodneſs of your mind, to offer Peace unto thoſe whom you might by force have reduced into ſlavery. And farre be it from Thee, but that Thy Deſignes ſhould proſper as they have begun; Yet We are but Men, and if Fortune change her ſide, neither will it be ſo eaſie a matter to Obtaine Peace, neither can it with ſo much honour be treated on. When the reſt agreed in the ſame Opinion, the King himſelfe likewiſe aſſenting, commanded the Roman Embaſſadours to be called, to whom he ſpake in this Manner; Your Errand, Romans, ſeemeth to me very unworthy, for having no Conſideration of entring into Friendſhip with me, you require back the Priſoners of Warre, whom being reſtor'd, you are ready preſently to make uſe of againſt me. If therefore you will intend your Minds on better Counſell, beneficiall to both Parties, and make a League and Society with me, I will reſtore all your Citizens and Companions in Armes without price or Ranſom; otherwiſe if you continue hoſtility, I ſhall think it no wiſe part, to ſtrengthen your Hatred againſt me with the hands of ſo many Valiant men. Neither is Money ſo ſcarce with me as to need any from the Romans whom it would better become, if we were Friends, to be enriched by my bounty; Withall he commanded gifts of good value to be given the Embaſſadours, with promiſe he would beſtow more and of greater Price. Theſe things were ſpoken and acted openly in the Preſence of all the Embaſſadours. But with C. Fabricius he had afterward a longer and more ſerious diſcourſe. Neither ſhall I think it unfit to relate what I find in good Authors; When therefore they had ſpeech together in ſecret without witneſs, among 'other things 'tis reported the King ſaid thus: My deſire is to have all the Romans my Friends, 'but eſpecially your ſelfe, whom I eſteem above all others, as moſt eminent in Civill and Military 'virtues, onely one Thing I am troubled to find wanting in you, that having but ſlender ſubſtance 'you are not able to maintaine that Port and Splendour which juſtly attends Great men as their 'Due; But I will not ſuffer you any longer to be ſenſible of this Injury, and diſpite of Fortune, 'I will freely beſtow ſo large a ſumme of Gold and Silver, as you ſhall eaſily exceed the Reve-'neues of the Richeſt. For I am perſwaded it belongs to my Place and Fortune, to relieve the 'hard Wants of Worthy men, who have endeavour'd more to obtaine Glory then Wealth: 'Truely I think it to be a faire and honourable Work, and that there cannot be, either a more 'illuſtrious monument of Kingly Magnificence, or a more precious and Acceptable Offering unto 'the Gods: ſo that I ſhall rather think you do me a Courteſie, then receive one at my hands, if 'you will ſuffer your ſelfe to be relieved by my Plenty. Neither truely would I urge this to you 'if on my ſide onely the Bounty ſhould ſeem Glorious, on your ſide the Acceptance diſhonou-'rable But now ſeeing I tempt you not to Treaſon or the commiſſion of any Fact misbecoming your Grave Manners; what Reaſon is there why you ſhould with a reſolute and obſtinate 'mind refuſe a ſmall Gift, with a free and Friendly intent offered? For I deſire nothing of 'you, but, what may, nay of duty ought to be done by the beſt of Men, and moſt tender of 'their Countrys Good, that you would perſwade the Senate to forſake their wilful ſtubborn-'neſs, and recall their mindes to Equity and milder Counſells, giving them to underſtand the 'Truth; that neither can the Warre be continued without your great Loſs and Danger, neither 'can I (having promiſed help to the Tarentines, and proved Victor in the firſt Battell) without 'manifeſt breach of faith, and dimunition of mine Honour relinquiſh it; Neither indeed do 'I delight in fighting with you whom I judge farre more worthy my Friendſhip then my Hatred, 'and had much rather return home into mine own Kingdom, where many buſineſſes in the inte-'rim ariſe, which require my preſence. And for this I will give you what aſſurance you ſhall de-'ſire, whereby you may be ſatisfied concerning my Intentions, and reſolve the Doubts of o-'thers; if any ſhall think it not ſafe to truſt to Kings, by reaſon of the fault of ſome, who, 'ſtanding to their Agreements and Covenants ſo long onely as it ſeemeth for their Profit, when 'they perceive any benefit to be gain'd by Change, have choſen rather to break their Faith then 'loſe an Advantage. And when the Peace ſhall be concluded, there is nothing will pleaſe me 'better, or be more commodious to us Both, then that you would bear me company into Epirus, 'where you ſhall have the Principal place among my Subjects, be my Lieutenant in Warre, and 'Partner of all my Fortunes. For I eſteem no Poſſeſſion more precious then that of a Valiant 'and Faithfull Friend, and certainly the ſplendour of a Kingly Fortune, and the Majeſty of Roy-'all affaires will well become your great Mind. Theſe things if we ſhall in Common conferre, 'mutually helping one the other, we ſhall without any difficulty attain to the greateſt Happineſs 'that man is capable of or can imagine.

When the King had thus made an end of ſpeaking, after a little diſtance Fabricius anſwer'd, 'Concerning my Vertue, if any could be obſerv'd either in my military or Civill employments, 'it is needleſſe for me to diſcourſe ſeeing you have already truſted the Relation of others concern-'ing it. Neither is it neceſſary to declare my poverty, that, being the maſter of a little ground 'and a ſmall Cottage, I maintaine my ſelf neither by uſury nor the ſweat of ſervants, but by 'the labour and excerciſe of my owne Body, ſeeing this alſo you have truly learn't by the diſ-'courſe of others. But if, either on your owne accord, or following the Opinion of others, 'you judge me, by reaſon of my poverty, to be in worſe condition then any other Roman, you 'are wonderfully deceived. For deſpiſing Riches, embracing Vertue, and doeing my duty, 'I was never ſenſible of any miſery; neither in private or publick buſineſſe did I ever repine at 'my Fortune. For what Reaſon have I to ſpeake ill of fortune, unleſſe I ſhould impute it as a 'crime to her, that I enjoy all those things which to greate and high spirits are most desireable,

'not only with the Rich, but many times before them? I am dignified with the greatest hon-
Ammian. Marcellinus 24 9 Dionysius 'ours our country affordeth, The heavieſt wars are committed to my Charge, I am entruſted 'with the care of our moſt holy Devotions, I am call'd into the Senate, my opinion is asked con'cerning the moſt weighty affairs, I am commended and chearfully imitated by many; neither
'am I of leſs eſteem then the moſt potent man in the City; I ſeem unto others an example and 'pattern of attaining Virtue and Glory; to all this beſtowing no coſt either of mine own or 'others. For in other places, where particular mens wealth is great, and the publick ſtock but 'ſmall, the Magiſtrates ſuſtain the dignity and ſplendor of their office by their own expence:
'In our City the cuſtome is much different, no private mans fortune being on any ſide bur-Zonaras Dionysius 'thened. All this great and glorious pomp, wherewith our Citizens, who are choſen to the 'adminiſtration of grand affairs, are ſo magnificently ſet forth, is of publick allowance; which 'order maketh all men equal, ſo that the pooreſt man ſhall want nothing for the maintaining 'either the publick or his own grace, neither ſhall the richeſt in any thing abound. Wherefore
'ſeeing, though I am the pooreſt of all, yet I do in no good thing yield to the richeſt of all;
'why ſhould I complain of Fortune? ſhould I deſire to be equal with Kings, who may hoard
'up vaſt ſums and heaps of gold? But hitherto I have ſpoken in reference to my life in Pub'lick, even in private alſo my indigence is ſo far from being a burden or inconvenience to me,
'that contrariwiſe, as often as I compare my ſelf with the rich ones, my condition ſeemeth in'comparably more happy, and I reckon my ſelf among thoſe few who have attained to as 'much Felicity as this life admits of, in which regard I mightily rejoice and give thanks to 'my Poverty. For it ſeeming to me idle and fooliſh to purſue after things ſuperfluous, and that 'my little ground being rightly till'd and manured yieldeth all neceſſaries; I know not to what
'end I ſhould be ſolicitous of greater Riches. My Meat hunger makes ſweet to me, and thirſt
'my Drink; after labour my ſleep is eaſie and quiet; my garments, if they defend me from 'cold, are of proof ſufficient; and my houſhold ſtuff, according as it is apt and fit for thoſe
'uſes it was ordained to, ſo it very well pleaſeth me. So that herein alſo I ſhould be injurious 'to accuſe Fortune, that it hath not allowed me larger ſubſtance then nature deſires, which 'hath neither ingenerated in me a covetouſneſs of what is too much, nor a dexterity of ſcrap-
'ing it together. Wherefore with this my poverty I judg my ſelf more wealthy then the rich-
Zonaras 'eſt men, yea, then thy ſelf alſo; for I have ſo much that I deſire no more, whereas unleſſe
'you thought your ſelf poor notwithſtanding your poſſeſſion of Epirus, and all other your Te-'ritories, why came you over into Italy? But Riches you may object, gives one a fair op'portunity of doing good to mankind, and that I in my poverty can be bountiful to no body.
'Truly this troubleth me no more then that in other things alſo I do not abound: That the 'gods have not endowed me with knowledg ſuperexcellent, and the Art of Prophecying, and ma'ny other the like things, whereby I might benefit thoſe who in theſe kinds want help. But if I 'freely communicate to my friends and fellow-Citizens thoſe things which are in my power, and 'ſuffer every one in common to participate of what may any way pleaſure them, I ſhall think 'my ſelf free from that crime of being uſeleſs or unprofitable to mankind. Neither would I 'have you eſteem thoſe things ſmall and contemptible, becauſe others ſeem greater in your 'eyes, and therefore you are ready to buy men with large bribes. But, if for ſupplying
'the neceſſities of the poor, Riches were altogether to be deſired, and that in this reſpect the 'poſſeſſion of moneys were to be reckon'd as a part of Felicity, as you Kings ſeem to be per-'ſwaded; which, think you, were the better way of purchaſing wealth, that I ſhould now with
'diſgrace receive it at your hands, or that I ſhould, when it was in my power, have long agoe Above in the year 471 Dionyſ. 'gather'd it upon moſt honeſt accounts? For my proſperous management of Publick affairs, 'hath given me fair opportunities of growing Rich; as often at other times, ſo eſpecially when
'four years ſince, being Conſul, and ſent with an army againſt the Samnites, Lucanians and Bru-
'tians I overcame thoſe large and fertil Territories waſting and ſpoiling, when being conqueror
'in many Battels, I took by force and demoliſh'd wealthy Cities, whereupon the Souldiers being 'largely rewarded, and all debts paid which the Commonwealth had contracted with private men
'for carrying on the War, there was yet ſo much remaining that I carried into the Publick
'Treaſury four hundred Talents. Now after I have ſcorn'd to acquire juſt and honeſt Riches
'by thoſe ſpoils which were in my hands, and by the example of Valerius Publicola (and others 'who have advanced the Roman State) have preferred Glory before mony, ſhall I receive gifts
'of thee, and embrace a ſhameful and dangerous opportunity of growing Rich, having neg'lected a fair and honourable means? And truly, that wealth I could freely, with pleaſure,
'and good conſcience have expended in juſt and honeſt uſes, which what I receive of you I 'cannot do: For that money is rather to be accounted lent then beſtow'd which proceeds from 'another's bounty, and however it be given and received under the ſpecious pretence of hoſpitality, 'friendſhip or good will, 'tis burthenſome to an Ingenuous and high Spirit till it be reſtored. And
'what do you think will be the iſſue of this buſineſs when it is known (as conceal'd it cannot be)
'if the Cenſours, who with ample authority exerciſe the ſuperinſpection of Manners amongſt

Many

Many report that Pyrrhus, reſolveing at any rate to winne a man of ſuch Excellent vertue, did yet more earneſtly tempt his Conſtancy, and after other magnificent promiſes, makeing a proffer of half his Kingdom could not therewith move him, but that ſtill he perſiſted to deny the Accompliſhment of the Kings deſires, For, ſaies he, if I am an evill man, why doe you court me? If good, why would you corrupt me? adding moreover, That this buſineſſe would prove neither pleaſeing nor profitable to Pyrrhus if it ſhould ſucceed, for if he ſhould make uſe of his liberty, 'twould be hatefull both for the King and his Friends, as for his Juſtice and Abſtinence, if the Epirots once had experience of them, they would forſake the King and apply themſelves wholy to him. These things, and what hereafter I ſhall add, being by various Authors related, I thought neither inconvenient nor unprofitable to collect and declare, that the mind and ſenſe of thoſe men may be known, who ſupported the Roman State in moſt difficult times, and improv'd it to that incomparable height of Glory and Empire it attain'd to: and that by a clear example it may be apprehended, what Virtues and Manners ought to be practis'd by thoſe men, who would become objects of Admiration, and tranſmit to their poſterity a more flouriſhing Commonwealth then they received from their Anceſtours. These things being ſpoken and heard on both ſides, the King at preſent contented himſelf, but on the morrow, cauſing Fabricius to be ſent for, he prepared an Elephant before hand to frighten him, who ſtanding at their backs behind the hangings, as they were diſcourſing, the hangings being on a ſudden withdrawn, at the Maſters command laid his ſnout on Fabricius his head, making a moſt horrid noiſe; but he, being a man of a ſetled ſpirit, gravely turning himſelf about, ſmiled, ſaying, Neither yeſterday did your gold entice me, nor to day your beaſt terrifie me. Afterwards being ſet at ſupper, when he heard Cineas diſcourſing of the Grecian Philoſophers of the Sect of Epicurus, that they eſteemed Pleaſure the greateſt good, and the cares of the Commonwealth the chiefeſt hinderance of Felicity: That the gods in their opinion led ſuch a life free from the care of humane affairs, free from all affections either of anger againſt the wicked, or favour to the good, giving themſelves over wholy to idleneſs and pleaſure: Fabricius thereupon is ſaid to cry out, The gods grant that Pyrrhus and the Samnites would practice this wiſdom while they wage War with the people of Rome. These were the manners of thoſe times, this was the Emulation of great men, to excel not in wealth or Luxury, but in Virtue, in Counſel, in Patience, in the Love of their Country. Neither were theſe ſudden Motions and fits, or ſpeeches premeditated out of hypocriſie for the preſent occaſion, but they did confirm the faith of their words by the conſtant Tenour of their Lives, whereby they are rather to be admired then imitated by our Age. The ſame Fabricius when all his ſilver plate conſiſted of one Salt-celler and a little diſh, which yet was ſuſtained by an horning foot, the Samnite Embaſſadors preſenting him with a gift of money and very rich houſhold ſtuff, ſet his hands to his ears, thence to his eyes, noſe, mouth, throat, and at length to his belly, ſaying, As long as I can command theſe, nothing ſhall be wanting to me, carry ye back your mony to thoſe who ſtand in need of it.

After the ſame manner he ſpent his whole life, inſomuch as in all his Patrimony there was not ſufficient whereby to raiſe Portions for his Daughters; (an Honourable poverty!) ſo that the Senate cauſed money for that purpoſe to be diſburſed out of the Publick Treaſury, being aſham'd to let thoſe Virgins paſſe without Dowry, whoſe Father was not aſhamed to leave ſo. The ſame vertue and continence was found in other Princes of the Senate; among the reſt Q. Fabius who had ſo often been in Chiefe command, and having once borne the Cenſourſhip denied to be made Cenſour againe, ſaying, It was not for the good of the Commonwealth, that the ſame men ſhould often be choſen Cenſour; he died with the ſame Teſtimony both of his poverty, and the peoples Love; for after his Death they beſtow'd ſo much money that his ſon Q. Gurges did beſtow a dole of fleſh upon the people, & likewiſe made a publick Feaſt. Curius out of the ſame gallantry of mind refus'd the gifts of the Sabines as Fabricius did the Samnites: Æmilius Papas, who was in moſt offices Colleague with Fabricius, alſo Tib. Coruncianus, and many other men of great note, by reaſon of their likeneſs in manners, lived together in great love and friendſhip: So that the Poet ſeems to me to have conceived in his mind the Idea of thoſe times, when he ſaid, The Roman State was upheld by men and manners of the old Faſhion. Pyrrhus ſeriouſly conſidering and pondering theſe things, was inflamed with a great deſire of compoſing all differences with this Nation, and immediately reſtored two hundred of the Captives without Ranſome, and gave leave likewiſe to all the reſt to go to Rome and viſit their friends at the Feaſt of Saturn now approaching, relying only on the word of Fabricius, who promiſed, That when the Holy-dayes were paſt they ſhould return, unleſſe peace were in the mean time concluded.

And ſuch was the Gravity of the Senate, and the fidelity of every ſingle Perſon, that at a Day by the Fathers appointed, they every man redelivered themſelves up to Pyrrhus, having in vain urged their Country-mens obſtinate minds to Articles of Peace. For the Crafty King, thinking this to be a nick of time for his purpoſe, while the Romans being mollified with the ſight of their deareſt friends, and deſirous of retaining them, might happily be the more ready to lay down all thoughts of hatred and hoſtility, reſolved now to ſend an Embaſſage to Rome to Treat of Peace on thoſe Conditions he had propounded to Fabricius in Perſon. He deſired, That the Tarentines might be comprehended in the League, That the other Gracians inhabiting Italy might continue free, living according to their own Lawes: That whatſoever the Romans

Romans had taken away from the Samnites, Apulians, Lucanians and Brutians might be reſtored; and in Lieu, the Romans ſhould receive their Captives without Ranſom. Cineas of whom mention hath formerly been made, was at that time with Pyrrhus, a man as of great knowledg in Civil affairs, ſo of very honeſt principles, and who had by exerciſe improved his natural wit to a marvellous eloquence: For theſe his qualities he was very dear to the King, who often acknowledged, He had won more Cities by the Eloquence of Cineas, then by his own Armes. This man being ſent Embaſſador to Rome, with much cunning delay'd making his addreſſe to the Senate, till he had in Pyrrhus his name diſtributed many gifts in the houſes of the principal men. Being then brought into the Court, when he had in many words, Extolled the virtue of Pyrrhus, and his inclination towards the Romans, he diſcourſed of the Equity of the conditions he brought, inſomuch that great part of the Senate were moved to accept them: becauſe beſides other conveniencies, he promiſed, If they would deſiſt moleſting his friends, he would furniſh them with aid ſufficient for the Conqueſt of all the reſt of Italy. But, becauſe the Conſultation laſted many dayes (the Fathers being very ſolicitous in a buſineſs of ſo great conſequence) and thereby a ſuſpicion and rumor was ſpread, that peace would be concluded, Appius Claudius, who by reaſon of his Age and blindneſs, had of a long time been abſent from the Senate, cauſed himſelf now to be carried thither in his Litter, where he no ſooner appeared, but his ſons and ſons in law with all Reverence and Duty receiving him, conducted him to a place becoming his Dignity. Every one being ſilent both at the novelty of the thing, and with the reſpect they bore his perſon, and expecting for what cauſe, after ſo long abſence and retirement, he ſhould now come into the Senate: he beginning his diſcourſe with the affliction of his ſickneſs, ſaid, 'His Blindneſs had indeed hitherto been very grievous to him, but now 'he was not only delighted in it, leſt he ſhould behold thoſe things which were doing, but was 'ſorry that his eares alſo were not deaf, that he might not hear things ſo ſordid and unworthy the name of the Romans. For what is become of your noble minds? whither are your 'ſpirits fallen? Ye were wont to be of opinion, when ye heard the Fame of Alexander the 'Macedonian renowned as of an invincible King, that his glory was more to be imputed to his 'Fortune then his Virtue; that if the Fates had allotted him a Roman War, both the event, 'and likewiſe his eſteem amongſt men would have proved far different. But now, behold how 'ye are degenerated from that your Magnanimity; ye once thought ye were able to conquer 'the Macedonians, and now ye ſtand in fear of Moloſſians and Chaonians, the perpetual prey 'of the Macedonians. Ye once contemned Alexander, and now are frighted by Pyrrhus, not 'the ſervant of Alexander, but his ſervants ſervant, who flying from his old enemies rather 'then ſeeking new, is come over into Italy with a reſolution, ſhould it pleaſe the gods, to obtain the Empire of Rome, with thoſe forces wherewith he was not able to keep and defend his 'little ſhare of Macedonia. Unleſs therefore we ſend him back well beaten, laden with great 'misfortune, aſſure your ſelves, any other Party, deſervedly ſlighting and ſcorning our Power, will greedily venture into Italy, as to a prey ready prepared to their hands. For what can 'be thought of us, but that we are a cowardly ſlothful people, if Pyrrhus, being received into 'friendſhip, ſhall carry back a Reward for that Diſgrace he hath done us, in as much as by his 'means it is come to paſs that the Romans are become a Laughing-ſtock to the Tarentines and 'Samnites?

A like ſad decree by Appius his motion was made concerning the Captives, That they ſhould not be led in War againſt Pyrrhus, neither ſhould they any where be joyned in the ſame company, but that being ſent to ſeveral Garriſons, they ſhould, as a note of infamy, change their manner of fighting, that they who before ſerved on horſe-back, ſhould now be liſted among the foot, and they who were of the Legions, ſhould now ſerve in light armature; That no man ſhould recover his former order, till he had brought in the ſpoil of two enemies. 'Tis reported, when the Embaſſadors returned with this ſharp anſwer, the King aſtoniſh'd at the wonderful conſtancy of the Romans, asked, What they thought of the City and of the Senate? and that Cineas anſwer'd, The City ſeemed to be a Temple of the gods, and the Senate an Aſſembly of Kings.

'believe the Gods to be ſo unjuſt as to alter the fates of Armies, and beſtow conqueſts for one 'mad-man's ſake; that victories are not obtained by jugling tricks, and ſuperſtition, but by 'fighting onely; as appeares by the Teſtimony of the Romans themſelves, who come not into 'the field with troopes of Prieſts and Prophets, but with Legions of armed ſouldiers to oppoſe
'the Enemy: But becauſe the ignorant are commonly more terrified with theſe ſuperſtitious
'deluſions, then with true cauſes of feare, he ſhewed that this feare might be prevented, by Zonaras
'ſhewing the Habit wherein the former Decii had Devoted themſelves, and warning the ſoul-
'diers if they met any Man in the like accoutrement not to aſſault him with any weapon, but
'to take him alive. He cauſed likewiſe a Meſſage to be ſent to Decius, That he ſhould forbear playing the foole amongſt armed men, neither ſhould his Plot take Effect, that if he came alive into his hands he ſhould perhaps endure more torments then he was willing. 'Twas anſwer'd by the Conſulls, They had Confidence enough in their Armes, neither had any need of ſo deſperate a Deſign, which that he might be aſſured of, they gave him his Choice, whether he would come over the River interjacent, or Expect the Romans on his ſide the water; that they would willingly withdraw their forces to give him a ſafe paſſage over, or, if he would retire, they would bring over their men, that on each ſide encountring with their ſtrength entire, demonſtration might be made, that they repoſed all their hopes of victory in their men, and their Courage, and in no other thing: Pyrrhus was aſhamed of betraying any kind of fear or Doubt; he accepted therefore of the latter Condition and gave the Enemy Liberty of foording the River. The Plin. 8. 7. Terrour of the Elephants was not now ſo great to the Romans, as being accuſtomed to ſee Flor. 1. 18. them, ſo having had Experience that their ſnouts might eaſily be cut off, as one was in the Oroſius 4. 1. laſt fight at one blow by *C. But now Vegetius de Re militari. 3. 24. they bethought themſelves of ſafer guards and Defences; They cauſed horſes cloathed with Zonaras. Iron plates to draw Chariots, which were likewiſe full ſtuck with ſpears faſtned in Iron ſockets; Ammianus Marcellinus in the Chariots were placed ſouldiers who with darts or fire ſhould avert the fury of the Ele- Prin. lib. 24. phants. Obſerving therefore the Nature of the place, which by Pyrrho c. 46. reaſon of the Ruggedneſs of the Ground, and the multitude of Oſiers thereabouts growing, Frontinus would well admit of a foot Army onely; he placed his horſe and Elephants in the Reſerve. The Stat. 2. 3. Right wing he ſtrengthned with his own ſouldiers and the Samnite Auxiliaries, The Brutians Lucanians and Sallentines he placed in the midſt, the Tarentines, whoſe virtue he leaſt confided in, he order'd in the midſt. The Conſull's main body conſiſted of their Legions, ſome of the light Armature being conveniently intermixt; and with the like Diſcretion they diſtinguiſhed the Orders of their Reſerves. The horſe were diſtributed into the Wings, being no hindrance to the Foot fight, and yet upon occaſion offer'd, ready for Action. The Armys being equal, not Plutarch only in Courage but in number (for they were fourty thouſand ſtrong on both ſides) diſputed the buſineſs with as much heat and animoſity as could be expected, and the Victory inclining to neither ſide, the night broke off the Fight. The next Morning Pyrrhus when he had guarded the moſt difficult places, forced the Romans to deſcend into a more even and open ground; there he had ſome uſe of his Elephants, which being ſuddenly brought in to that part of the Battell where the Chariots were prepared againſt them, they frighted the horſe (even as it hapned in the laſt fight) and cauſed them to fly; but to the Foot they did little harme. The Report of this Fight is much different from that of the former, for ſome Authors affirm, The Romans mans had the upper hand, their Victory being occaſion'd by an accident, for the Apulians (who were by the Kings Order ſent againſt thoſe who came to ſurprize the carriages) by their departure ſeeming to fly, by a mear error and falſe fear caus'd all the Kings forces to quit the field and fly indeed. The number of the ſlain is likewiſe expreſſed, That on Pyrrhus his ſide twenty thouſand, on the Romans ſide five thouſand were wanting, that the King with a dart ſhot through his arm was grievouſly wounded, and that in vain endeavouring to ſtay the flight of his men, was by his Life-guard brought out of the field one of the laſt; that on his ſide three and fifty Colours were loſt, on the Romans eleven, and that Fabricius the other Conſuls Lieutenant was likewiſe wounded. But contrariwiſe, others ſay, This Battel had the like event with the former, though the Romans by reaſon of the vicinity of their Camps ſuſtained not ſo much loſs; but that they did confeſſedly fly, and loſt ſix thouſand men; that Pyrrhus loſt three thouſand five hundred and five, as is in the Kings Chronicles regiſtred, by the Teſtimony of Hieronimus.

Livie Epit. 13

And not only variety but Repugnancy of Authors moves me rather to incline to thoſe who report the event of this Battel to have been doubtfull: for 'tis ordinary after an equall encounter for each part to attribute the victory to themſelves, which by the negligence or Impudence of others is committed to writing, doing very ill to deliver to Poſterity for true and undoubted, thoſe things which are grounded on Idle report only, or for affection are partially related. Wherefore their hiſtory ſeemes more probable who affirmes, That there was but one Fight were Aſculum, and that, after an hot diſpute and much blood-ſhed, the Sun being now ſet, the Kings wound and the loſſe of the Baggage did with much adoe breake off the fight: That then both Armies ſounded a Retreat, when on both ſides there were ſlaine about fifteene thouſand; and that this was the time when Pyrrhus anſwer'd one who congratulated his victory, If the Romans are thus to be Vanquiſhed we are undone our ſelves. And indeed the ſequel confirmes this Opinion, for Pyrrhus retired to Tarentus, and the Conſuls, making no purſuite after the enemie, diſtributed their forces into winter quarters in Apulia, whereas the time of yeare gave them leave, and Reaſons of War might well have perſwaded them, to have proſecuted ſo glorious a victory. Moreover I find not that theſe Conſuls made any Triumph, and many think that P. Decius in this Battel devoted himſelfe, who dying as did his Father and Grandfather, yielded himſelf the Third ſacrifice, without intermiſſion out of the ſame family, for the good of the Commonwealth: Which as I had no thoughts to gain-ſay, So ſhould I not have related in the general ſilence of all Hiſtorys, but that a grave Author M. Tullius Cicero in his bookes of Phyloſophy more then once maketh mention of it. The fight at Aſculum thus ended, the reſt of the yeare was quiet and free from all warlike Expeditions, only the whole time ſpent in Conſultation and preparations. Pyrrhus, having loſt moſt of his old forces, friends, and Commanders, ſent into Epirus with order for a ſupply of Men and money for next ſpring. But before that Navy could be ſet forth, new hopes ariſing alter'd the Kings Counſels. Pyrrhus had ſometime the poſſeſſion of Macedonia, wreſting it out of the hands of Demetrius, and again loſt it by the Power of Lyſimachus; Now while Pyrrhus waged war in Italy, Ptolomæus Ceraunus being ſlaine by the Gaules, there ſeemed a new way open into Macedonia, being deſtitute of a Prince and the ſtate of affaires in Confuſion. This Reaſon perſwaded him not to leave Epirus naked of ſouldiers, leſt it ſhould be obnoxious to the injurys of the Gaules who now oppreſſed the Neighbour nation Macedonia. But Pyrrhus did not as then ſteere his Courſe homeward, being upon other Occaſions (as ſhall be related) call'd into Sicily. The winter being paſt over in theſe Cares the New Conſuls came to the Army C. Fabricius Luſcinus, and Q. Æmilius Papus (who before had born a Conſulſhip together) which Pyrrhus underſtanding drew forth his forces, intending to obſerve the Marches and Counſels of his enemy. Their Camps being not far diſtant, there hapned an Accident very remarkable, and by moſt men related much after the ſame manner; One Timochares an Ambracian, who held a good honourable place in the Kings favour, ſecretly came to Fabricius, and promiſed him, if he would give him an anſwerable reward to Poyſon the King; which he thought was eaſie for him to accompliſh by his ſons, who were Cup-bearers to the King. Fabricius, no way delighted with the Treaſon, informed the Senate of it. the Senate, not diſcovering the Treaſon of Timochrares, who had (by what means ſoever) intended the Roman profit, ſent Embaſſadors to Pyrrhus, who ſhould only in general warn him, That he ſhould look well about him, and take heed of what mens ſervice he made uſe of, and enquire into their faithfulneſs and honeſty. Thus Valerius Antius relates the buſineſs. But Claudius Quadrigarius in ſtead of Timochares make Niceas the undertaker of this Poyſoning, and that notice was given not by the Senate but by the Conſuls, reciting alſo the Letter of the Conſuls, wherein they diſcover Niceas his deſign, That they are unwilling to fight by craft, or with mony, and wiſh the King ſafe from Treaſon, hoping he will become an Illuſtrious Ornament to their Victory and Triumph.

Some Report it was the Kings Phyſician who treated with Fabricius either in perſon or by Letter, and that upon his diſcovery, he was hang'd. As there may be doubt in theſe Circumſtances, ſo no queſtion they are deceived who ſay that Curius ſent back the Phyſician to the King. Tis ſaid that Pyrrhus at this time wondring at the Experience of ſo great Vertue in Enemies, cry'd out, This is that Fabricius, who can with no leſſe difficulty ſwerve from the Rules of Juſtice and Honeſty, then the Sun be turned out of his Courſe. He did immediately, leſt he ſhould be Overcome with Kindneſſe, return the Romans all the priſoners he had, and ſent Cineas again to obtaine peace and friendſhip. It ſeemed diſhonourable to receive a gift from the enemie, whereby they might be thought to have abhorred wickedneſſe more for gain then for the love of Vertue, they therefore ſent back an equal number of Tarentines and Samnites that their captives might not be receivd gratis. This publick abſtinence was to their greater Credit ſeconded by the vertue and reſolution of private perſons, when the gifts of Pyrrhus (which Cineas in great Number and thoſe very pretious had Carried to Rome for both ſexes) were refuſed not only by the Men but by the women. For when upon the refuſal of ſome, he profer'd them to others, and others again, there was not ſo much as one man or woman to be found ſo mean or covetous as to open a door for the Receipt of a Kings gift. The Former anſwer was now again returned to the Embaſſadours, That until Pyrrhus had quitted Italy, they would eſteem him an Enemie to the people of Rome. While Pyrrhus was much perplexed at theſe paſſages, not knowing how to proſecute the War with any cheerefulneſſe, nor willing to depart Italy with any loſſe of Reputation, the Sicilian affaires did ſeem to help him, the management whereof (after long and doubtfull deliberation) he reſolved to undertake. For ſo he thought the Roman war might with credit be declined, and the command of a moſt Rich Iſland obtained, he had alſo an earneſt deſire of being revenged on the Carthaginians, as being firſt provoked by them. For they ſuſpecting the Kings deſigns, had a little before hand ſent Mago with a Navy of an hundred and twenty ſhips, ſaying, The Romans ought by Forreigne aid to be aſſiſted againſt a forreign enemy. And though the Romans uſed not their aſſiſtance, making anſwer, That they were not wont to undertake any War but what could be managed by their own forces; Yet now this fourth time was the League renewed between the two Commonwealths.

To the former Articles it was added, That whether the Romans or Carthaginians made peace with Pyrrhus, it ſhould be ſpecially excepted, that they might aſſiſt one the other, which ſoever of them were provoked to War; And, that when either had need of the others help, the Carthaginians ſhould provide ſhips, each party pay their own ſouldiers, the Carthaginians aid the Romans by ſea, but not be compelled againſt their wills out of their ſhips. Which being agreed upon, Mago went to Pyrrhus under pretence of treating of peace, but indeed to diſcover the Kings Counſels, whom the Carthaginians had underſtood to be invited into Sicily: And they offer'd their Navy to the Romans not ſo much out of any good will or care of their ſafety, but further to involve Pyrrhus in his Italian War, leſt he ſhould ſpoil their ſucceſſes in Sicily which flouriſhed ſo proſperouſly. They had then alſo guarded the paſſage into Sicily with a numerous fleet, pretending the ſiege of Rhegium, but indeed reſolving to hinder Pyrrhus from tranſmitting his Army. For theſe cauſes did he wholly apply his mind to the Sicilian affairs, which filled him with great hope, as by the ſtate of things, ſo by the frequent Embaſſies which came one after another out of the Iſland, affirmed, That he was deſired by the prayers of all men, as the only remedy of their calamities wherewith they were more ſharply afflicted then the moſt miſerable Nation under the heavens. For after the death of Agathocles, more lamentable then undeſerved, one Mano, born at Ægeſta, a City of Sicily, who had poiſon'd the King, endeavouring to uſurp the government, was by Hicetas the Pretor expelled the City, and fled to the Carthaginian forces: Hence aroſe an heavy war and unfortunate to the Syracuſans, by which never the leſs Hicetas in particular ſtrengthened himſelf, and turning his forces againſt Phintias of Agrigentum, he held the Iſland long time in trouble, till by the boldneſs of one Thænio he was deprived of his Domination which he had held for nine years. Thænio endeavouring to retain the Soveraignty, was reſiſted by Soſiſtratus a Syracuſan Nobleman. Theſe two along time conteſted, Thænio poſſeſſing Naſus, an Iſland which is part of Syracuſe, Soſiſtratus exerciſing the Tyranny in the other parts of the City. When at length by theſe diſcords they ſaw nothing but deſtruction likely to enſue, with one conſent they decreed to ſend for Pyrrhus, who being the ſon in law of Agathocles, and next in ſucceſſion, as having a ſon by Lanaſſa, was thought fitteſt to bear rule, as being able by his courage and his forces to ſettle their affairs. Moreover, the principal men of Agrigentum and Leontium, offering the Government of their Cities, and conſequently of the whole Iſland, unanimouſly intreated him, To come into Sicily as ſoon as may be, to ſuccour them with his preſence, being wearied with labouring under the heavy burden of a Barbarous ſlavery. For the Carthaginians having waſted their grounds, had beſieg'd the City of Syracuſe, both by ſea and land, with a Navy of an hundred ſhips, and an Army of fifty thouſand men. Pyrrhus therefore without delay ſendeth Cineas before (whoſe wiſdom and faith he much truſted to) to agree upon Conditions and Articles of friendſhip with the Sicilian Cities. At his departure he comforted his Italian confederates, promiſing, That if they were oppreſſed by the Romans he would in ſpeed come out of the neighbour Iſland much encreaſed with new forces. But when he was about to leave a Gariſon in Tarentus, they taking it in ill part, deſired, He would either perform his promiſed aſſiſtance on thoſe conditions he was call'd in, or that at leaſt he would leave their City free. They could obtain neither, Pyrrhus returning no other anſwer, but commanding them, To tarry his leiſure. The Epirot King being thus imploy'd, the Conſuls had the eaſier war againſt their other enemies. I find they had about this time good ſucceſs againſt the Etrurians, Lucanians, Brutians and Samnites. It appears there was no great matter done againſt the Etrurians, in that there was no Triumph made for that war, neither was the whole nation, but few Cities engaged, who re-aſſumed againſt the Romans thoſe arms they had ſo lately laid down, being ſolicited by the Samnites, who found themſelves left naked by the departure of Pyrrhus. other nations as the war was more heavy, ſo was the Victory more Illuſtrious over them. C. Fabricius the Conſul (his Colleague, as is imagined, being gone into Etruria, inaſmuch as upon the Epirots departure one Conſular Army was thought ſufficient) overcame the Lucanians, Brutians, Tarentines and Samnites: Some Cities, among which were Heraclea, he drew into Covenants, and over thoſe people he Triumphed before the Ides of December.

An aſſembly of the people being held, New Conſuls were choſen for the year enſuing, P. Cornelius Rufinus again, and C. Junius Brutus again. Other Nobles were Candidates with Rufinus, but by Fabricius his favour he was choſen. Wherein Fabricius conſidering the times, preferr'd the publick ſafety before private quarrels; For by reaſon of their difference in Manners there was Enmity betweene theſe two, Fabricius being of proofe againſt Mony was guided only by his care of the common good; Rufinus more greedy of wealth then ordinary, many times order'd his counſels and actions to his private gain. But being otherwiſe Induſtrious and a good commander, Fabricius judged him to be preferr'd before his Competitours who were far inferiour to him in Marſhal affaires. 'Tis reported, when Rufinus gave him thanks, That being at enmity with him he had helped him to the Conſulſhip, eſpecially when ſo great a War was on foot; he anſwer'd, 'Twas not much to be wondred, if he had rather be pillag'd, then ſold to the enemy. For there was great War remaining in Italy, and Pyrrhus finding all things goe according to his deſire in Sicily (whether he now was gone) 'twas reaſonably fear'd he would quickly return a more formidable enemy by the Acceſſe of the ſtrength of ſo Noble an Iſland.

WHILE theſe things were doing in Italy, Pyrrhus having ſhipp'd his Army and Elephants, ſailed from the Tarentine Port into Sicily, after he had continned two years and four moneths in Italy. Being conducted by Thænio, who met him with his Navy, he was received by the Sicilians with wonderful chearfulneſs, freely delivering up into his hands their Towns, their Forces, their Mony and their Ships. Being thus in a ſhort time poſſeſſ'd of the dominion of the Græcian Cities, he did alſo by force of arms extort from the Carthaginians all whatſoever they held, excepting only the City of Lilybæum, which the Carthaginians being helped by its convenient ſcituation, defended againſt all his aſſauls. Whence juſtly conceiving great and vaſt hopes in his mind, he reſolved, leaving his eldeſt ſon the Patrimony of his Father, to ſettle the other two, the one King of Italy, the other King of Sicily. Both the reputation and virtues of this King were indeed at that time very great; and the Sicilians having for many years ſuſtained both forreign and civil wars, and a plague worſe then both, the tyranny of uſurpers, ſeemed willing with joy to entertain any indifferent Prince over them. But when, a little after, he proceeded to raiſe moneys againſt their wills, and put to death ſome of their Nobles, he contracted much hatred, which was encreaſed by the covetouſneſs and arrogance of his Officers, whoſe vices did every where as much wrong him as his own; therefore next to the firſt and principal care Kings ought to have, of being themſelves Egregiouſly good, 'tis for their honour and ſafety to make a choice of virtuous Favourites, ſeeing private men are blamed only for their own faults, but other mens crimes are imputed to Princes. But theſe things things hapned afterwards. Now at Preſent, while their Zeal was hot, he was with the higheſt Honour and magnificence received, firſt by Tyndarion Prince of the Tanrominitans (for in that part of the Iſland he landed) then by the People of Catanæa, and ſo paſſed with his foot-Army to Syracuſe: His fleet he commanded to be brought about not farre from the ſhore, ready prepared for fight, as thinking the Carthaginians would not ſuffer him to approach the City without hazard of a Battell. But it hapned, that a little before Thirty of the Carthaginian ſhips were upon other Employment gone from the Navy, which becauſe they were not return'd the Admirall refuſed to venture on the Fight with the Reſt. Wherefore Entring without Reſiſtance, Thænion and Piſiſtratus yielding Poſſeſſion, he took into his hands the Publick Treaſure, an hundred and twenty Covered ſhips, Twenty open ones, their Weapons, Engines, and all other Furniture for Warre. Dionyſ. Diodorus

In the Interim came Embaſſadours from the Leontines, whoſe Prince Heraclidas offered the City and all his Forces, Four thouſand Foot, and five hundred Horſe. Neither were other Cities ſlower in their ſubmiſſion, but came in driven as it were by a Torrent of Fortune. Pyrrhus treating them all with much Humanity, and gaining their Good wills, ſent every one back to his own City, entertaining now more Ample Hopes in his mind, intending if affaires proceed ſo favourably to paſs over into Africke. Things went not ſo well with his Confederates in Italy, for Milo, who was left at Tarentus with part of the Army, was not able to protect them from the hoſtility of the Romans, now in the abſence of the King and his main ſtrength. But as yet it was well for them that the Romans deferring a while the Tarrentine warre, both the Conſulls converted their forces againſt Samnium. The Samnites (ſeeing their Fields burn't, their Caſtles ſurprized, the whole burthen of the Warre to fall on them, and that they were forſaken by their Friends) being inferiour both in ſtrength and Courage, forſaking their Townes and Villages, betook themſelves to the high and craggy Mountaines, carrying with them their Wives and Children, and what things of moſt value they could in ſuch a Tumult and feare convey away. Among the Romans beſides the Emulation of their Commanders, there was ariſen great Negligence and Careleſneſs (the Inſeparable Companion of Proſperity) cauſed by their own Conſtant good ſucceſs, and their Enemies Fear. Hereby they ſuffered ſome Loſs and more Diſgrace; for their ſouldiers confidently creeping up craggy and difficult paſſages were beaten back and deſtroy'd by the Samnites, who had poſſeſſ'd themſelves of advantageous places; many were ſlain, being overwhelmed with ſtones and Darts, or tumbled down the Precipices; others having no convenience either of retreating or fighting were taken alive. This Accident cauſed the Commanders to divide their Forces, for each laying the blame of the Misfortune upon his Colleague, boaſted he could have managed the buſineſs with better ſucceſs if he had been alone. C. Junius with his Legions remained in Samnium, P. Cornelius drew out his forces againſt the Lucanians and Brutians; where carrying about the Terrour of his Armes, waſting the Grounds and burning the Villages, he had occaſion offer'd of greater Attempts. In the utmoſt parts of the Italian ſhore, towards the Eaſt and the Jonian ſea, where the promontory of Lacinum ſtretcheth forth it ſelfe, is ſeated Croton of old very famous, and now alſo conſiderable for it's Wealth; Through the midſt of it in thoſe dayes ran the River Æſarus, on each ſide whereof the Multitude of Buildings were encompaſſed with a wall of Twelve miles circumference. This City the Conſull not daring to beleagure, had thoughts of obtaining by Treachery, for he was put in hopes by many of the Roman faction there, that if he would timely advance his forces to the walls of it, being now deſtitute of forreign Aide, he might eaſily take it by the help and aſſiſtance of thoſe who were weary of Pyrrhus his Domination. But it hapned about that time that either out of fear of the Enemies Neighbourhood, or ſuſpicion of Treaſon, which is ſeldom long hid, the Crotonians had procured aid from Milo: Nichomachus came to them with a ſtrong band of Lucanians, who iſſuing out upon the Conſull (not aware of any thing, but confidently coming up to the walls without fear of Danger) beat him back with the ſlaughter and wounding of many of his Men. Rufinus deſiring by Counſell to remedy that loſs he had by his Raſhneſs ſuſtained, on ſet purpoſe encreaſeth the Rumour of his Overthrow, and that he might ſeem ſtrucken with the greater fear pretends to deſiſt from his Enterpriſe, commanding the Baggage to be pack'd up as for a ſudden Departure; This News was quickly blaz'd about the City (as from a Camp ſo neer muſt needs be) and beſides a probable cauſe of the buſineſs, their Credulity was help'd forward by their deſire to have it ſo; when on a ſudden (their mindes being already thus inclin'd) a certain Captive (being thereunto ſuborned by the Conſull, in hope of Liberty and further Reward) comes into the City, as if in this haſty departure of the Romans he had taken opportunity to Eſcape; He informes them that Cornelius Rufinus, having not ſtrength enough to force Croton, was gone to Locri, being invited by ſome who promiſed to betray it to him. By and by comes another who confirming the former news, added moreover, That the Romans were now on their March. And withall they diſcover his Enſignes and Troopes moving that way which leadeth to Locri. Nichomachus being deluded by this Wile, marcheth ſwiftly with his forces the neereſt way to Locri, intending likewiſe to defend it, which when Rufinus by ſecret Meſſengers underſtood, he turneth back preſently to Croton, as upon better advice, ſo with better ſucceſs then before. His diligence was made proſperous, not only by the ſecurity of his Enemies, but by the favour of Fortune alſo, for a thick miſt chanced to ſurround him, ſo that he was almoſt within the walls with his

The joy of this victory, of it ſelfe ample enough, was abundantly encreaſed by other as glorious ſucceſſes; Fortune ſeldom obſerving a mean on either hand. For Nicomachus perceiving himſelf to have ſaln into a remedileſſe Errour, not knowing what to doe, as he returned to Tarentus, was met by Rufinus, loſt great part of his men, and very hardly eſcaped himſelf with the Reſt; When not being content to defend one Citie he loſt two. For the Locrians likewiſe being animated with this ſucceſſe, having ſlain the garriſon Pyrrhus left among them, with the governour of it, whoſe oppreſſion they could no longer endure, betook themſelves to the friendſhip of the Romans. Notwithſtanding this Proceſſe of affaires, the Samnites and other nations were not ſo far dejected, but that ſtill they reſolved to endure the worſt that Fortune could bring upon them, encouraged, beſide their own innate obſtinacy, with their Hops of Pyrrhus's Returne, hearing the news of his victorys in Sicily. For Pyrrhus (that we may relate his actions out of Italy alſo, which were performed in thoſe times and places, having influence upon, and being joyned with the Roman affaires) having ſetled things at Syracuſe and Leontium, went about the ſame time with his Army to Agrigentum, meeting Meſſengers by the way with News, that the Carthaginian Gariſon was thruſt out of the City, and that the Agrigentines yielded themſelves and all they had into his protection; which accordingly at his coming they did. For Soſiſtratus (who had delivered up Syracuſe to him) together with the Citie, preſented him with eight thouſand foote, proper young men, and eight hundred horſe, a force nothing inferiour to the Epirots Pyrrhus brought with him. Thirty other Cities, which Soſiſtratus had the command of, did by his means ſubmit themſelves to the Kings diſcretion.

Theſe things thus tranſacted, he ſent to Syracuſe for all ſorts of weapons and engines, which were of uſe in the ſiege of Cities. For now his deſign was to aſſault the Cities under the Carthaginian Juriſdiction, having an army of thirty thouſand, beſides fifteene hundred horſe, and the Elephants he brought over into Sicily. The firſt he tooke was Heraclea, where was a Punick garriſon, then Azona; After which the Selinuntians, Halicyæans, and Ægeſtians following his fortune forſook the Carthaginian party, giveing an Example to many other Townes in the ſame quarter of doing the like. The Erycines, confiding in the number of their Auxiliaries and ſtrength of the place, he was reſolved with all his power to aſſault, having therefore order'd his men, himſelfe armed, coming up toward the walls, Vowed a Vow to Hercules, if that day he ſhould manifeſt himſelf to the Græcians a Warriour worthy of the Race he came of and the office he bore. After the ſigne was given, and that the defendants, with a cloud of arrowes being driven from their ſtations, gave way to the placeing ladders upon the walls, the King himſelfe firſt of all men entred into a moſt noble fight againſt all oppoſers, tumbling ſome down with his ſheild, ſlaying others with his ſword, and terrifying all with the greatneſſe of his Courage and ſtrength; neither was this fight more glorious to him, then in every conſideration proſperous; for without receiving any wound, with great honour he gained the Citie at that one ſtorm, his ſouldiers being no leſſe animated by his Example then fearefull of his danger, for both which reaſons they fought with the greater contention. He then did ſacrifice to Hercules according to his vow, and for many days exhibited Plays and Shows of ſeverall kinds in great Magnificence and Pompe. In this year I find there was a Triumph at Rome over the Lucanians and Brutians before the Nones of January. But I wonder to find it aſcribed to C. Junius, ſeeing Rufinus his Province was amongſt them, and that he tooke two famous Cities, and that other Authours ſtile him a Triumphal Man.

Rome being not very ſecure, conſidering the progreſs of Pyrrhus his affairs, was otherwiſe much terrified with Prodigies and Peſtilence; The moſt horrid Omen was, that the ſtatue of Jupiter Capitolinus being ſmitten with Thunder, the head thereof was ſtrucken off and carried quite away, neither could it be found but by the art and care of the South-ſayers. The Plague likewiſe committed great ſlaughter amongſt them, taking away man and beaſt by a common Murrain; but was moſt formidable in Abortions, for there was no young ones almoſt of man or beaſt which came forth ſafe and entire, inſomuch as it was believed the anger of the gods would conſume all living creatures. Which Affliction made the other Conſulſhip of Q. Fabius Maximus Gurges very famous, wherein he had C. Genuſius Clepſina for his Colleague. And yet they left not off their war againſt the Samnites and Lucanians; and two certain arguments there are that they made great ſlaughter of their enemies, for the ſame year Q. Fabius the Conſul Triumphed over the Samnites, Lucanians and Brutians in the Quirinals; and thoſe people ſent Letters to Pyrrhus and Embaſſadors, declaring, They were utterly undone without ſpeedy help; that they could no longer ſuſtain the power of the Romans, but muſt of neceſſity prevent the uttermoſt extremity by yielding up themſelves. This thing much inclined Pyrrhus to depart the Iſland and tranſport his forces again into Italy, ſeeing alſo his affairs now to be more difficult in Sicily, by reaſon the affections of men grew cold; and, by the conſideration of ſome injuries received, were turned into hatred againſt him.

Which his reſolution, and the ſeries of enſuing affairs, that they may the better be underſtood, I have thought good more at large to relate his Actions at the preſent. When therefore he had poſſeſſed himſelf of Eryx, and placed a Gariſon in it, he marched to the City of the Ægins which is of a very convenient ſcituation, near the Haven of Panormus, and well fenced with works; there being received with the good will of the Citizens, he removed his Camp

Camp to Panormus it ſelf, which received its name from the fair and ample haven which leadeth to it: This he took by force, and having likewiſe taken a place called Epirete, ſeated in a pleaſant mountain, but upon hard paſſages, between Panormus and Eryx, he had now the poſſeſſion of all the Carthaginian Province, excepting only Lilybæum. This City was lately built by the Carthaginians, as an habitation for the Moztians, whoſe town Dionyſius the Tyrant had in the Punick War demoliſhed. Wherefore the Carthaginians, ſeeing that of all their dominions in Sicily, their hopes were confin'd to this only place, reſolved with their utmoſt ſtrength to defend it againſt the preparations they underſtood Pyrrhus made for the ſiege of it. Wherefore bringing in thither a conſiderable ſtrength of Souldiers, with plentiful proviſion, as likewiſe amunition of all ſorts (which they had opportunity enough to do, having the command of the ſeas) they diligently adhibited all care poſſible to fence it on every ſide: Eſpecially where it lay open to the land they erected many Forts and Towers, encompaſſed with large ditches: Their work was the ſooner finiſhed, in regard the town being for the moſt part of it built upon the Rocks of the ſea, needed no artificial Bulwarks in thoſe places. Now, though they made great preparations for the War, and had hired many forces, as from other Countries, ſo from Italy alſo; yet they ſent Embaſſadors, promiſing, If they could obtain peace upon equal conditions, to aſſiſt him with mony and ſhips. Pyrrhus would hear no mention of money, deſiring only to retain thoſe Cities he had taken, ſeeming willing to allow them the poſſeſſion of Lilybæum. But the Kings friends, and the Sicilian Princes enforming him, That ſo long as the Carthaginians held Lilybæum, (as a ladder ready prepared whereby to ſcale all the reſt of Sicily) the Iſland would never be void of the fear of them; cauſed him to return anſwer, That there was but this one condition of peace he would agree to, to wit, That they ſhould clearly quit Sicily, and ſuffer the ſea to be the bounds of either's dominions. The hopes of peace being thus broken off, he draweth his forces forthwith toward the City, and Marſhalling his army not far from the walls, in ſuch order as thoſe who were tired might (by turns) be relieved by freſh men, he began the aſſault. But the Lilybætans having a ſufficient number of ſouldiers to defend them, and being provided of Engines and Amunition kept the City ſafe. For the Carthaginians had brought in ſo many Catapults and Scorpians that the whole compaſſe of the walls was not able to receive them.

When therefore a ſhower of all ſorts of weapons and darts overwhelmed the Kings Men, ſlaying many and wounding more, they deſiſted from their Enterprize. Pyrrhus likewiſe ſet himſelfe to work to make Engines of Battery, beſide thoſe he brought from Syracuſe, and digging Mines under ground, he attempted all arts belonging to a ſiege: But the Carthaginians ſtoutly reſiſting, when he had for almoſt two months wearied himſelf in vaine, and ſaw that the beſieged having free egreſſe and regreſſe at ſea, the Citie could not be taken, he broke up his ſiege and employ'd his forces other where. For ſome Greek Cities, beſides other heavy oppreſſions, being compelled to pay tribute, implored his aſſiſtance againſt the Mamertines, living upon the ſea coaſt. Pyrrhus therefore leading his Army in haſt, when he had taken and ſlain ſome Mamertines he found gathering Taxes in thoſe places, Encountring their main body proved Conquerour, and took by force and demoliſh'd many of their Garriſon. And hitherto the King by his Illuſtrious performances had obtained great Power and Honour, having beſide his other Vertues, with his ſingular Humanity not only won, but deſerved the Love and Affections of the Cities. But this ſo great Felicity, which one would think ſo firmely grounded, was in a moment deſtroy'd, as by that Levity of Mind which was never wanting in this people, and by the Intemperance of his friends, ſo chiefely by the Kings own fault. Who, being in adverſity irreprehenſibly good, was puffed up with pride in his proſperity, in which Condition Mens minds are indeed generally found to be weakeſt. When therefore, as we have ſaid, he eſteemed a Fleet neceſſary for the accompliſhment of his undertaking, and that though he had many ſhips, yet they were not well furniſh'd with Sea-men, he very much offended the City with a ſtrict Preſs of Sea-men; being now on a ſudden changed, and from his former gentleneſs proceeding to proud commands, threats and extreme puniſhments; theſe things nevertheleſs were tolerated, as having the pretence of publick good. But, when they ſaw thoſe very men to be ſlain, by whoſe good will and aſſiſtance chiefly he had obtained Sicily, many people, not by degrees, or interpoſing delayes, but on the ſudden changing their minds, revolted from his friendſhip, and applied themſelves (as for every one was moſt opportune) ſome to the Carthaginians, ſome to the Mamertines. So that cruelty, which when it is alone is alwayes grievous, doth then become utterly intolerable, when being exerciſed againſt the well-deſerving, it contracteth (beſide the hatred properly due to it ſelf) the deteſtation of an unthankful and perfidious mind. He ſeemeth to have brought himſelf to this neceſſity of governing by violence, being too much over-ruled by the naughty Affections and counſels of his own men, for unto them (being no whit better) did he beſtow the riches which were ſequeſtred from the friends and kinſmen of Agathocles. The chief Magiſtracies of Cities he committed to his Penſioners and Captains, not according to the ſtatutes and cuſtoms of the Cities, nor for the due time preſcribed, but in what manner, and for as long as he pleaſed. Law ſuits, and controverſies, and the whole adminiſtration of publick buſineſſes he aſſumed to himſelf, referring many to his Familiars and Favourites, who were hateful for their avarice and luxury, a like intent upon gaining and ſpending mony by wickedneſs, who being greedy to ſatisfie their own luſt, make no diſtinction between between Right and Wrong. Mens mindes being hereby incenſed they begun firſt to murmur, afterward openly to Complain, why they had repented of their former Condition, if now the very ſame things were to be born withall? that in vain was Pyrrhus invited and received, if he ſtudied to imitate thoſe manners he came to puniſh; that no injury can poſſibly be of ſo ſharp ſenſe and Apprehenſion, as that whereof he is the Author who ought to have been the Avenger. And now many began not very obſcurely to move ſedition, and cauſe a Revolution of things, whereas he hearkning to pernicious Counſell, choſe rather to encreaſe cauſes of Offence, then take them away: as if what evil was by Injuſtice committed, were by Cruelty to be mended. In the meane time the Carthaginians, obſerving that Pyrrhus was not very ſtrong in his own Country forces, and was daily leſs affected by the Sicilians, conceiving hopes of recovering their loſt Province, had ſent over an new Army which found buſineſs enough for the Epirots, many flying over to them who ſtood in fear of Pyrrhus's cruelty. Pyrrhus under pretence of the Punick War, introducing Garriſons into the Cities, reſolved by falſe accuſations of Treaſon to take away the lives of the greateſt men, thinking afterward the more eaſily to keep the people in awe. At length he aimed at Thenio and Soſiſtratus, the principal men of the whole Iſland, by whoſe aſſiſtance chiefly (as we have declared) he obtained the command of Sicily. Thenio was ſlain, Soſiſtratus fled to the enemy affording him no leſſe help and authority to the caſting Pyrrhus out of Sicily, then he had before to the bringing him in and confirming him there.

Upon this many Cities revolting, greater part to the Carthaginians, ſome to the Mamertines, Pyrrhus his affairs were reduced from a moſt flouriſhing Condition to a very narrow and evil ſtate. In this Conjuncture the embaſſage of his Italians confederates came not unwelcome to him, complaining, That having loſt all things, they had very few Cities left which were able with much ado to keep the Enemy from entring their walls. This gave him a faire and honourable Pretence of departing, that he might ſeeme, not expelled out of Sicily by the Carthaginians, But to return into Italy for the Relief of his oppreſſed aſſociates. Being now juſt going, when he ſeriouſly conſidered the ſcituation and wealth of the Iſland, and diſpoſition of the Inhabitants, O (ſaith he) what a fair field do we leave the Romans and Carthaginians to fight in for Superiority! And his Preſage proved true, as was witneſſed by the wars ſuddenly enſuing, wherein ſo many Navies were deſtroyed, and Armies routed.

But the Enemies Courage increaſing with their Fortune, Pyrrhus had neither a ſafe departure out of Sicily, nor a quiet Voyage to the Tarentines in Italy. The Carthaginians aſſaulting him in his Paſſage croſs the ſea, ſunk ſeventy of his ſhips, and made the reſt uſeleſs (the Epirots almoſt utterly unskilful in Maritine affaires, being not able to grapple with men of ſuch Experience therein) ſo he fled out of the Fight with Twelve ſhips into Italy, who had come thence, with above an hundred, beſides a greater number of ſhips of Burthen. But gathering together thoſe ſouldiers who made a ſhift from the Overthrow to eſcape to ſhore, he had preſently a ſtrength ſo great that he conceived hopes of taking Rhegium by ſtorme. But being beaten off by the Campanians who defended it, he preſently fell into a great danger. For as he led his Army through blind and difficult paſſages, the Enemy out of Ambuſh fell upon his Reare, and ſlew a great Number of his Men, with two Elephants. 'Twas no contemptible force, neither for Number nor the quality of the Warriours, which thus aſſaulted him; they were little leſs then ten thouſand old ſouldiers, moſt of them Mamertines, who truſting in their friendſhip and cognation with the Rhegians, having underſtood that Pyrrhus intended to return for Italy, had croſſed the ſea before him, and in hope of prey had privily diſpoſed of themſelves in advantageous places to make a ſudden irruption upon him.

Pyrrhus, according to his wonted Boldneſſe fighting in the front of his Battel, received a wound in his head, which when he was gone aſide to dreſs, one of the enemies of large ſtature, and gallant in his Armour, advancing before the reſt of his Fellows, Challeng'd him with a loud Voice, bidding him, If he were a live, to come forth. Pyrrhus burning with anguer, and Terrible in Countenance, the blood running about his face, his men not being able to hold him, made a ſudden aſſault upon him, and with a blow on his head ſtruck him to the ground. 'Tis reported, his ſword was ſo well temper'd and his Arme ſo ſtrong, that at one ſtroke he cleft the Man in ſunder, even from the head to the bottom of his body, his parts on each ſide divided falling to the ground. The enemie terrified with the ſtrange novelty of this ſpectacle, and admiring him as above the ordinary Ranke of Men, left off the fight. Pyrrhus, being rid of this trouble, had notwithſtanding little joy. For, inaſmuch as he now loſt part of his Carriages, and that the wealth he had gather'd by the ſpoils of the Sicilians, was loſt in his laſt fight with the Carthaginians, he was in great want of moneys, ſo that his ſouldiers murmuring for pay, knowing not how elſewhere to provide it, he was compell'd to ſeize upon the Treaſury of Proſerpine: Her Church at Locri was in thoſe dayes moſt famous for the Reputation of its holineſs; which town, when Pyrrhus had taken by the aſſiſtance of his faction within it, he committed many horrid facts by ſlaughter and rapine, more then the juſt revenge of his ſlain Garriſon did require. But there being nothing left which men would or could contribute to him, he laid hands on the holy money, being urged thereunto by his worſt friends, who had moſt commonly been the authors of every pernicious counſel: Theſe were Evagorus the ſon of Theodorus, Balacer the ſon of Nicandar, and Dinarchus the ſon of Niceas. They did not only perſwade ſwade Pyrrhus, telling him that all things muſt yield to Neceſſity, but were themſelves inſtruments in the ſacriledge, diging up a vaſt ſumme of Gold, which had many years been preſerved in vaults under ground. Pyrrhus rejoycing ſaid, there is nothing more fooliſh then unſeaſonable Devotion, and not to accept of Money ready prepar'd to one's hand is the part of a mad man. And putting it into his ſhips he gave order to have it carried to Tarentus, himſelf going by land. Suidas in Ἄκυος. Appian.

But this his fact was not more foule in the Commiſſion, then it was unhappy in the Iſſue. A ſtorme ſuddenly ariſing upon the change of Wind, in the night time, turned about the ſhips in the dark; breaking ſome into pieces, and forcing others into the Maine. The ſhips which conveighed the Holy Money being ſhatter'd and torne into pieces, were ſunk with all the men in them, but the money it ſelfe lying upon ſome looſe planks, was by the waves carried to the ſhore very neer the Temple, from whence it was the day before taken. Pyrrhus underſtanding the Accident, commanded the money to be diligently gather'd up and returned to its former place, thinking thereby to appeaſe the Angry Deity. Nevertheleſs henceforward he had no better ſucceſs, Fortune Eluding all his Deſignes whatſoever, even thoſe which were upon good advice, and Virtuouſly undertaken. Which he did alwayes after conſtantly impute to the Anger of the Offended Goddeſs, as Proxcinus the writer of his Hiſtory, and himſelf in his Commentary do affirme; and when the thing was newly done, not being able by many Sacrifices to make propitiation to Proſerpina, he put to death all the Authors of that unhappy Counſell, the inſtruments of the Fact, and every one who had but lightly conſented to the Commiſſion of it. And theſe being executed according to their Deſerts, Pyrrhus proſecuting his Deſign had afterward a quiet journey to Tarentus; The Romans being ſtill more afflicted with the Plague, and fearing a new war upon Pyrrhus his return into Italy, attempted all Meanes both Divine and Humane for their Reliefe. 'Twas an old opinion, that the Peſtilence might be ſtayed by the Dictatours ſtrikeing in of a Naile; for the Experiment of which hopes 'tis probable that P. Cornelius Rufinus was choſen Dictatour; for as the greatneſs of the Calamity might well provoke them to try all Remedies, ſo we find that Rufinus was the year after taken notice of by the Cenſours, when he had been twice Conſull and twice Dictatour, neither can there be found a more certain monument of, or a more convenient place for that his Dictatourſhip. Againſt the ſickneſs providing what Remedy they could, their Chiefeſt care and diligence was required in matter of Armes, eſpecially in regard of the Difficulty in raiſing Men. For beſides the length of the Warre, the continuance of the Peſtilence had made men weary of entring into action, inſomuch as the young Men did with wonderful Obſtinacy decline the ſervice. But the ſeverity and conſtancy of M. Curius Dentatus the ſecond time Conſull overcame this their wilfulneſs, for he now had entred the Magiſtracy with L. Cornelius Lentulus his Colleague. When therefore in the Capitoll he firſt began his Leavy, becauſe no man anſwered, he cauſed the names of all the Tribes to be caſt into an Urne, and the Pollian Tribe coming out firſt, he cauſed the firſt man of that Tribe whoſe name was drawn to be ſummon'd; and when he refuſed to appear, he ſequeſtred and ſold his Goods; when afterwards he appealed to the Tribunes complaining of the Conſulls Injuſtice, he ſold him alſo, ſaying, The Commonwealth had no need of ſuch Citizens who knew not how to obey. The Tribunes nevertheleſs did not relieve him, and afterward the example being judged very wholeſom grew into Cuſtome, that when a Leavy was rightly and duly made, he who would not be a ſouldier ſhould be ſold for a ſlave. Others being terrified by this Precedent did the more readily give in their Names, and having filled up their Legions both the Conſulls marched into the Enemies Country; Lentulus into Lucania, Curius into Samnium. Pyrrhus having intelligence of their motion, muſtered his army at Tarentus, and found himſelf almoſt twenty Thouſand ſtrong in Foot, together with three thouſand horſe. Livie.29.1. Appian. Diodorus. Livie 29.8. Livie 29.18. Val.Max.1.1.1 Ext. Suidas in παρασκευασθεὶς μεν. Livius Dion. Appian Plutarch Pyrrho c. 53. Livie 7. 3. *Pighius in Annal. With theſe and the choice young men of the Tarentines he entred Samnium, but found not the Inhabitants ſo obedient as heretofore, they came not in ſo freely and readily as they had done, not only becauſe their courage was over-wearied with the great and many loſſes they had ſuſtained, but becauſe they were juſtly exaſperated, imputing all their calamities to Pyrrhus, which they had not ſuffered, had not he by his departure into Sicily betraid his Italian aſſociates. Nevertheleſs he gathered together ſo great a ſtrength, that he ſent one part into Lucania to buſie the other Conſul, while himſelf encountred Man. Curius, thinking if he once overcame him, he ſhould eaſily complete his Victory over the reſt. But the Roman very well underſtanding, that there is no Battalia comparable to the Macedonian Phalanx, when it hath Rome to ſpread and expatiate it ſelf, kept himſelf in craggy and difficult places; and becauſe he expected help from Lucania, and that the Auguries alſo and Entrailes of beaſts promiſed no good ſucceſs, he declined fight as much as might be: ſo much the more earneſt was Pyrrhus to engage before the two Conſullar Armies were joyned together. Chuſing therefore out of his Army thoſe who were moſt forward, he reſolved to aſſault the Roman Camp in the night time, when he might not be diſcovered. But while he prepared all things for his intended purpoſe, he fell into a deep ſleep and dreamt, that the greater part of his Teeth fell out, and that an abundance of blood flowed out of his mouth; in conſideration whereof being much perplex'd, he intended to deſiſt from his enterprize; but his friends earneſtly perſwading him, Leſt he ſhould never again have the ſame opportunity offer'd him, he gave order to advance. Near the City of Male- Frontinus Strat. 2. 2. Dion. apud Fulvium Cluverius Italiæ antiquæ 4.8.

Maleventum (for that was the name of it in thoſe dayes) are Mountainous and Woody places, which by degrees ſtretching themſelves into ſomewhat more even ground, at length end in a very fair and open plain which is called by the name of the Tauraſine Fields.

Plutarch Now Pyrrhus beginning his journey from the Lower grounds up to the hills and woods, when his lights failed, was wildred for want of knowledg in the wayes, in ſo much that (the day breaking) he was diſcovered from the Roman camp. The Romans being moved at the unexpected approach of the enemie, yet, (becauſe there was no doubt made but fight they muſt, and their ſacrifices now proveing more favourable) with the Conſull's conduct cheerefully iſſued out, and falling upon the foremoſt of the enemy, (who were far from the Main body, and not in very good order) drove them backward, killing no ſmall number of men, and taking ſome Elephants which the enemy left behind. This ſucceſſe encouraged Curius, to follow his Fortune and deſcend into the open field in Battel-aray prepared to fight. Neither did the Epirots make any delay. The encounter was very fierce and furious on both ſides, but the Romans having had the upper hand in the late skirmiſh, were much fuller of Courage and hopes. The Epirots giving back, Pyrrhus now again ſought Refuge from his Elephants, and thereby (one of his own wings flying) he forced one of the Romans Wings to retire even to their Reſerve. There had the Conſul placed a ſtrong force (reſolving upon this occaſion to engage himſelf) which he commanded, being now freſh, to renew the fight, and beat back the Elephants. Former experience had taught them an eaſie and ready way to oppoſe theſe beaſts, that they were ſooner diverted by fire then the ſword: Againſt them therefore were provided Iron inſtruments involved in much Pitch and Tar, which, being ſet on fire, were darted upon the backs and Towers of the Elephants, and whether they light on the skin of the beaſts, or on the wood of the Towers, they ſtuck faſt by reaſon of their hooked ſharp points. Theſe inſtruments and divers ſorts of darts, being flung from the upper ground, drove the Elephants into fury, partly by terror, partly by the pain of their wounds, ſo that their maſters not being able to govern them, they ruſhed back upon their own battel, filling it with fear and ſlaughter. The beginning of this Rout is reported to be by a young Elephant, which being wounded in his head, ſent forth a querulous noiſe, at which known voice the Dam was firſt ſtartled, and ſhe increaſing the tumult, at length the reſt were all in confuſion and turned into flight. Very remarkable was this fight, both for the number of the ſlain and the fruit of the victory. For Pyrrhus being hereby utterly overthrown, neither did the reſt of Italy long hold out, neither, after Italy, was any other Nation and King able to ſtand againſt them. 'Tis ſaid the King in that Battel had thrice the number of the Romans, even fourſcore thouſand foot, and ſix thouſand horſe; of theſe they who report the moſt ſay, ſix and thirty thouſand were ſlain, they who report the leaſt, ſay ſix and twenty thouſand; thirteen hundred were taken priſoners, and eight Elephants. Pyrrhus with a few horſmen eſcaped to Tarentus. The Camp of Pyrrhus being taken, as it cauſed admiration, ſo was it of great uſe to the Romans. For they heretofore, as other people, ordered their Camp ſcatteringly by companies in the manner of Cottages: Pyrrhus is held to be the firſt who rightly meaſuring and dividing ſpaces, contained the whole Army within one Trench; and by his example the Romans being aſſiſted, and adding what they thought convenient, attained to that moſt perfect manner of pitching their Camps which afterwards they uſed.

This year was very famous, not only for their happy war abroad, but by reaſon alſo of Domeſtick affairs, and the notable ſeverity of their City Diſcipline. Q. Fabricius Luſcinus, and Q. Emilius Papus, being Cenſors together, took away from many the Publick horſes, and paſſed by many in calling the Senate. But moſt remarkable was Cornelius Rufinus his note of Infamy, who having been twice Conſul and twice Dictator, was ejected the Senate by the Cenſors, and this reaſon given of his Puniſhment, That they found in his houſe the weight of ten pounds in plate to ſerve at meals: And in this Condition not only himſelf but his Family for a long time remained, whereof not any one attained to the higheſt honours, before Sylla the Dictator.

Such was the Parſimony of this Citie in thoſe dayes, and afterward ſo great the extravagancy, that it was by the Fathers condemned as an argument of intolerable Luxury, what their children would ſhortly eſteem but a baſe and contemptible piece of houſhold-ſtuffe: Every mans eſtate being ceſſed and valued, the Army was purged by ſacrifices; there were ceſſed two hundred ſeventy one thouſand, two hundred twenty four Citizens. Both Conſuls entred the Capitoll in triumph, firſt Curius, whoſe triumph was the more illuſtrious, as for the fame of his Exploits, and great joy of his victory, ſo did it exceed in Pomp and ſplendour. For heretofore their triumphs being over poor People their neighbours, were ſet out only with broken armes and Gallick waggons, nor any ſpoiles led but flockes and herds of Cattel But now there was a worthy ſhew both for the varietie of Nations which were led Captive before the Chariot, and for the Beauty and Magnificence of the ſpoyls. Epirots, Theſſalians, Macedonians, Apulians, Lucanians, Brutians were led Bound, there were carried Painted Tables, the works of choice and rare Artificers, Gold, Purple, with other beyond ſea rarietie, and the inſtrument of the Tarentine Luxury. But the moſt wonderful and joyful ſpectacle were the Elephants with their four Towers on their backs. (for the reſt were dead of their wounds) This was the firſt time they were ever ſeen at Rome; the common people called them Luca-Bulls, giving them their name from the creature they were hitherto beſt acquainted with, and their deno-denomination from the place they firſt ſaw them in; within few dayes after was the other Conſulls Triumph nothing ſo gallant, though his performances were not to be deſpiſed; he had overthrown the Samnites and Lucanians, and taken many Townes, but in compariſon of Curius his Glory the Eſteem of theſe things were not ſo high. Among the reſt who had Rewards beſtow'd on them for their Courage, he gave to Sev. Cornelius Merenda a Crown of Gold out of the ſpoiles, becauſe by his help chiefly a Certain Town of the Samnites was taken. Plin. 33. 2. While the Romans thus enjoy'd the comfort of their Victories, the Enemy was in a far different poſture. They had been long weary of Pyrrhus his Domination, but now after this unhappy fight, their mindes were ſo filled with fear and Indignation that they could take no Reſt.

The King having been a long time averſe from the Roman Warre, now utterly deſpairing of the Conqueſt, thought of nothing more then how to get ſafely and honourably out of Italy. But keeping his Counſell to himſelfe, he encouraged his Aſſociates, That they ſhould not be caſt down by one unluckly Overthrow, that they had not received ſo much loſs by the laſt fight, as by the former they had cauſed to the Romans, who notwithſtanding could not be perſwaded to Peace upon equal Conditions; That now they ſhould imitate the Roman Conſtancy, and reſerve themſelves for better fortune, and all would yet go well; That there is yet ſtrength ſufficient left, whereby to maintain a long Warre; That in Greece he had many Potent Friends, from whom he might certainly expect ſuccour. Neither were theſe things incredible, For he had already, eſpecially by Ptolomy (who was then King of Macedon) been manifeſtly aſſiſted; he being then in great Eſtimation both among Greeks and Barbarians, being much honour'd by the Etolians (then a moſt powerful Nation) as alſo by the Macedonians and the Kings of Illyrium, having obliged ſome by Courteſies, others by Fear. Yet all his boaſting was more with intent, to retain his Confederates (now ready to revolt) in Fidelity, till the ſeas were open for his Returne, then to continue the Warre in Italy, or that he put any Truſt in Forreign Aid. Sending nevertheleſs his Embaſſadours to the Kings of Aſia and Macedonia, of ſome he craved moneys, of others Men, of Antigonus (who was then King of Macedon) he craved both. With theſe hopes keeping his aſſociates firme to him (having in the mean time underhand provided all things for his Departure) his Embaſſadours now returned from Antigonus. Aſſembling therefore his own and the Italian Princes, he read unto them not thoſe Letters which now he received, but others which came before from Antigonus, promiſing plentifull Aſſiſtance ſuddenly to be ſent; By this Craft having deluded both his own Aſſociates, as alſo the Romans who garriſon'd neer him, the night following without any hindrance he hoyſed ſaile, and made the Ceraunian Mountaines a Promontory of Epirus. But that he might ſeem not diſhonourably to have relinquiſhed the war, and ingenerate a beliefe of his Return after he had accompliſhed the Deſign he was call'd aſide for, he left behind him Milo to defend the Caſtle of Tarentus, and that he might not onely by hope of Reward, but by fear of the like Puniſhment, continue faithfull, he gave him a ſeat whoſe cover mas made of Nicias his skin, whom he had put to death for his Treaſon againſt him. Leaving therefore with him a garriſon of ſouldiers, with the Reſt (to wit eight thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe) he returned into his Kingdom, having been ſix yeares abſent. At Rome not knowing but that Pyrrhus would renew the warre, they did at their Aſſembly chooſe M. Curius Conſull again, becauſe he onely having had good ſucceſs againſt the King, was thought like to carry on the warre with greateſt Authority, and beſt fortune, of the Patricians Ser. Cornelius Merenda was choſen, being promoted by his late purchaſed honour, and the Commendation of his Countreymen, under whoſe cómmand he was laſt year; Theſe being made Conſull, reconverted the heat of the warre againſt the Lucanians, Samnites and Brutians, who defending themſelves rather by the Difficulty of Places then by Armes, gave no occaſion of any Memorable action like the former. Neither was Curius his Glory hereby diminiſhed; every one ſtill judging, that that Valiant K. Pyrrhus fled not ſo much for the overthrow ſuſtain'd, as fearing ſuch a Captain as Curius now again coming forth againſt him. To him therefore was attributed the Glory of having chaſed Pyrrhus out of Italy, and finiſhing the Warre. In that year which followed Curius his Third Conſulſhip, there came Embaſſadours from the Alexandrine Kings with gifts to Rome, and in the Conſulſhip of C. Dorſo and C. Claudius Canina, Ptolomeus Philadelphus hearing of Pyrrhus his flight, ſent to congratulate with the Romans, and to deſire to be Eſteemed their Friend and Aſſociate. The Romans thought it very honourable that their Friendſhip was ſought by Kings ſo Potent and farre diſtant, therefore courteouſly receiving and entertaining the Embaſſadours, they agreed to enter League with Ptolomy, for the Confirmation whereof, and to return the like Kind office to the Kings, they ſent Embaſſadoures to him choſen out of their Principal Men, of the Conſulars Q. Fabius Gurges, and with him C. Fabius Pictor, and Numerius Fabius Pictor, and Q. Ogulinus. Theſe being gone, the Conſulls had good ſucceſs againſt the Italian People, who ſtill out of Neceſſity and Deſpaire kept up their Armes. The Triumph which Claudius Canina made in the Quirinalls over the Lucanians, Samnites and Brutians, is an Argument, that his Actions were of the greater Conſequence: But the Joy of all this Proſperity was ſomewhat diminiſh'd by Sextilia a Veſtall Virgin, who againſt the Rules of her Order being found guilty of Inceſt, was thought to provoke the Anger of the Gods.

But appeasing the gods by Sacrifices and Ceremonies, they turned the punishment on the head of the delinquent, and buryed her alive at the Colline Gate. While the same men were Consuls there were Colonies planted, Cosa among the Volscians, and in Lucania Paestum, which the Greeks call Posidonia; this City the Lucanians had taken from the Sybarites, and from them it lately came under the jurisdiction of the Romans. The memory of the year following is more notable, as putting an end not only to the war of the Samnites and others, but of the Tarentines also. L. Papirius Cursor, and Sp. Carvilius the second time Consuls, having Lucania, Samnium, with the Brutians and Tarentines for their Provinces, did by their wisdom and worthy deeds fulfil the expectation of all men, for indeed this pair of Consuls was on purpose chosen in hope of finishing the War this year. The Samnites being conquer'd by Carvilius the seventy first year after the war first began, did now with greater faithfulness receive the conditions of Peace imposed on them. Lu. Papirius with great slaughter having overcome the Brutians and Lucanians, compelled them to sue for peace. But (as it happens in one main war against many neighbouring People, the confines of whose Territories were interchangeably mixed) Papirius had to do also with the Samnites, Carvilius with the Brutians and Lucanians, and both of them with the Tarentines. Neither were the forces only of the Tarentines routed and put to flight, but their City also recover'd into obedience. Which business ought to be the more punctually related, because, besides the Victory of a most famous City, it comprehendeth the death of Pyrrhus, the subtilty of the Carthaginians, and the first beginning of emulation between them and the Romans.

Pyrrhus, when two years since he sailed from Italy, left a Garrison in the Castle of Tarentus, thereby to beget hopes of his return, which afterward being the more confidently expected by reason of his success in Macedonia, did strengthen the minds of the Italians against their present losses. For being a man of a fierce stirring spirit, not able long to rest, he had made war upon Antigonus, because he sent him no assistance into Italy, and overcoming him in a set battel, had almost driven him out of his Kingdom. Whence the Romans were in perpetual fear least he should return into Italy with a more numerous Army, and renew the war more heavily then before. But his unexpected death did suddenly cut off both his hopes and fears of all men. For being insatiably desirous of encreasing his power, under pretence of resetling Cleomens in his Kingdom of Sparta (being then at odds with Areus) he entred Peloponnesus with a purpose to keep it in his own hands; and though he did in vain assault their City, yet he afflicted the Lacedemonians with great calamities: In Argos, in the mean time, there being two Factions, Aristippus the head of the one called in Antigonus, Aristias Patron of the other invited Pyrrhus to his relief and for the pulling down his adversary. For Antigonus was also come into Peloponnesus to assist the Lacedemonians against the common enemy. In the same night at divers Ports were both the Kings forces admitted into the City by the Argives. Pyrrhus understanding his men were hard put to it, entred the City himself, and beholding a Brass Statue of a Wolf and a Bull as fighting, was presently possessed with an opinion of his approaching death. For he was informed by an antient Oracle, That that place would prove fatal to him where he should see a Wolf and a Bull fighting; he was therefore resolved to draw back his forces and retreat out of the City. But the Elephants and souldiers coming in to his succour, meeting Helenus the son of Pyrrhus, quite stopped up the passage, so that some striving to go out, some to come in, the enemy likewise sore pressing upon those who gave back, the Argives, Macedonians, Epirots and Lacedæmonians who came along with Areus, some Elephants also, all crouding and being crouded one by another in narrow streets, caused great fear and tumult amongst them.

Pyrrhus in the midst of all, every where endeavouring to protect his own, and beat back the enemy (giving advice, crying out with his voice and lifting up his hand) was by a certain young man of Argos lightly wounded with a spear. This young man's mother a poor old woman (sitting among others upon the house top to behold the fight) when she saw Pyrrhus in fury and violence setting upon him who wounded him, being astonished at her son's danger, suddenly snatched up a Tile, and with both her hands flung it down on the Kings head. So miserable and void of honour was Pyrrhus his death, then whom that Age brought not forth any man more worthy, either for Courage of Mind, Soundness in Counsel or Skil in Marshal affairs, besides many other endowments both of Soul and Body. But by his Ambition he destroy'd the fruit of all his Labours, and defaced the Ornaments of his Virtue; he would have been much more happy if contented with his own fortune; and certainly the most potent Prince living had he used as much Wisdom and Circumspection in keeping what he got, as did Valour and Industry in the acquiring.

This news, being brought into Italy, did diversly, according to their several Affections, cause joy in some Cities, and sorrow in others. Other People who were at their own disposal, bought their Peace of the Romans upon what termes they could; But the Garrison of the Epirots, and Milo governour of the Castle restrained the Tarentines from using their Liberty. Between whom, by degrees from lighter injurys and Reproaches, at length brake out open Enmity; so that the Tarentines being on each hand pressed with great Difficulties, having the Romans their Enemies without the walls, and the Epirots within, sent Embassadours to crave succour from Carthage. The Carthaginians, who possessed great part of Sicily and wished the Coast-Towns of Italy rather in their own hands then the Romans, readily came with a mighty Navy, pretending only to cast out Milo, but resolving, if they gained Tarentus, to maintain it against the Romans. When therefore L. Papirius the Consul was also come, Tarentus was shut up on all sides, the Romans beleaguring that part of the Citie and Castle by land, the Carthaginians besieging the same Castle by sea. The Romans, in this state of affaires, being no lesse solicitous lest the Carthaginians should take the Castle then that themselves should loose it, subtilly attempting all means of victory, treated with Milo by Convenient Messengers, That if by his means they obtained Tarentus, they would suffer himself, with all his Men, safely to depart with bag and baggage. Milo, sending nothing at present more convenient for him, deals with the Tarentines. That joyning Counsels together they might deliberate on their Common safety: and at length perswades them, To send himself Embassadour to Papirius, diligently to conclude on Articles for all their Benefits. As they had willingly hereunto assented out of wearinesse of Cares and dangers: Milo accordingly, being gone to the Consul, with whom he had secretly contrived his Designe, brings back prety faire conditions, and a most certain hope of making an agreement not to be repented of. The Credulous Tarentines hereupon with much security and confidence lay aside all care and Circumspection, giving Milo opportunity of delivering not only the Castle, but also the Citie it selfe up to the Romans. The Carthaginians no whit contented with this Event, nevertheless pretending, Themselves friends to the Romans, and that the only cause of their coming was to Expel Milo, hoised sails and returned. Some Authors affirm that the Romans forwarned the Carthaginians, That if they intermedled in the Tarentine affairs, they would make a breach of the League, and that they not only slighted this admonition, but sent Auxiliaries to stand in Battel against them; upon which account chiefly the War brake forth between the Romans and Carthaginians in Sicily; though the Carthaginians, willing to cover their fault by Perjury, took Oath, That they did nothing with evil or deceitful intent. As I will not deny but that some such passage might happen between the Generals, or that the people commonly discourse so, while the Romans brooked not the others presence, and the Carthaginian endeavoured to keep close their design; so I think there afterwards arose more probable causes of that War, in that it brake not out on the sudden. And that it was occasioned chiefly upon the Mamertines account, while the League was entire between the Romans and Carthaginians.

The Consuls returning home, were received with the joy and salutes of all, and triumphed in great Pompe, with much Goodwill of the People. In the mean time Q. Fabius Gurges, and the others who were sent to Alexandria, relate in Senate the Result of their Embassage, That they were received and Entertained with all kind of Hospitality and Benevolence, that great and Magnificent gifts were sent to them at their first arrival, but much greater at their departure, that they thought it to become the Roman dignity and abstinence, modestly to refuse the first, that the other, which were by all means to be received, they had, before they did any other business, added to the publick Treasury; that at Alexandria, when being invited to publick feasts, they had Crowns of Gold sent them according to custom, they did for luck's sake receive them, but in the night time put them upon the King's Statues. The Senate wonderfully rejoicing, both at the Succes of their Journey, and the Gravity of the Embassadors, giving them thanks, That they had by their Continence rendred the Roman Manners Venerable to Forreign Nations, commanded the gifts they had conveighed into the Treasury to be restored them. The people likewise decreed the like, saying, The Commonwealth would be excellently well managed if the base means of growing rich by Publick employments were taken away: And the Questors, according to command, willingly restoring the money, the Embassadors worthy of the reward of their Abstinence, did with as much credit receive the Ægyptian gifts as they had refused them. Q. Fabius, who was prime man in the Embassy, was, I believe, in this consideration also preferred before so many Egregious men, and chosen Prince of the Senate by M. Curius and L. Papirius the Censors, being now, by reason of the Nobility of his Family, his Fathers Merits, two Consulships, and as many Triumphs, Inferior to none in Honour. The same men being Consuls, M. Curius the Censor was at cost, out of the enemies spoils, to bring the water of the River Anien to Rome: So much scorning tō encrease his private wealth by them, that being on a time by some ill-willers taxed of having perverted the publick mony, producing a piece of wood which he was wont to use in sacrifice, took Oath, That of all the enemies plunder, he never brought nothing else into his house. He was a man indeed of high deserts, as for the greatnes of his Exploits, so for his many Illustrious examples in other Virtues; as we shall by the by manifest, by relating some of his Actions and Sayings; For I count it not unworthy or unbeseeming the Office of an Historian, to recount those things whereby those who are hereafter to undertake the management of publick affairs may be no lesse instructed to the attaining Felicity by Virtue, then by Military counsels and performances. In the Sabine War (when there was such plenty of spoils that Fabius the writer of the History, thinketh the Romans then to have had the first taste of Riches) Curius, claiming nothing of so rich a victory, but the conscience and fame of it, continued in his former poverty and hardinesse of life.

Zonaras Livie Epit. 15. Polybius 1.7

THE moſt potent enemy of Rome being now after many battels vanquiſhed, and peace ſetled throughout all Italy, The Senators entred into Conſultation how to make a good uſe of their Victories. They concluded to fine all Nations who had born Arms againſt them; the loſs of part of their Territories, taking a more ſevere revenge of the Tarentines, by how much the more wantonly and intemperately they had offended; they were therefore commanded to reſign up all their Arms and Ships, their Walls were demoliſhed, a Tribute impoſed upon the City, and nothing granted them but Peace and Liberty. There was now nothing of an old ſcore more to be intended, then to puniſh the Treachery of that Legion, which circumventing the Rhegians by craft, had now for ten years poſſeſſed their City. They foreſeeing that the Roman affairs proceeding ſo proſperouſly, their wickedneſs would not paſſe unrevenged, had very diligently taken care for whatſoever belonged to ſtrengthening the City, and provided all things for their own defence, being very conſcious that what is obtained by cunning and violence, cannot but by the ſame arts be maintained. Beſides their own innate Fierceneſs, they much confided in the friendſhip of the Mamertines, and were puffed up with their ſucceſs againſt the Carthaginians and Pyrrhus, whereby they had ſufficiently made experiment of the ſtrength of their City, and the courage of their own minds, having quickly repulſed the enemies from the ſiege. They ſored therefore to ſuch an height of Rebellion, that daring to take Croton, which was by ſome betrayed to them, they ſlew the Roman Garriſon and demoliſhed the City. Wherefore L. Genucius the Conſul, who was that year Colleague with C. Quinctius, had commiſſion to execute vengeance upon them, and the Rebels being confined within the Walls, the City was beſieged. But while they ſtrongly reſiſted with their own and the Mamertine forces, the Conſul having ſuſtained ſome incommodities, and become in want of neceſſary proviſions, was aſſiſted with Corn and men by Hiero, who was at that time Prince of Syracuſe. For he, being offended with the Mamertines, did likewiſe hate their aſſociates of Rhegium; he was likwiſe moved by the encreaſe of the Roman power, to preoblige them to future benefits, as occaſion ſhould ſerve.

The Citie being at length forced to yield, the Mamertines were by the Conſul diſmiſſ'd upon certaine Covenants, the Runaways and thieves, many whereof had fled thither as to a ſanctuary, ry, were put to death: The Legionary ſouldiers were carried to Rome that the Senate might paſſe Judgement upon them. Herein was ſhewed a notable Example of publick ſeverity, for the Senate decreed, firſt, They ſhould all be ſecured in priſon, and afterward, be led to Execution: And when M. Fulvius Flaccus, Tribune of the People interceded for them, declareing, They ought not to take away the Lives of ſo many Citizens, contrary to the Laws and Cuſtomes of their Forefathers, The Senatours perſiſting in their Reſolution neglected the clamours of the Tribune, and Juſtice was accordingly executed upon the guilty. But leſt by ſo ſevere an act they might contract an odium, and the ſorrow of the vulgar people be aggravated if ſuch a multitude ſhould at one time be put to death, they did every day execute fifty, firſt ſcourging, then beheading them. Moreover it was ordered that neither their Bodies ſhould be buried, nor any Mourning made for their Death. Decius Jubellius (who had lived unto that day, after the Loſſe of his ſight, that he might die with the more griefe) took away his own life in priſon. Following the greateſt number of Authours I have reported the whole Legion, even foure thouſand men, to have been beheaded in the Market-place at Rome; but I think it more probable what is related by Polybius, That but three hundred of that Legion came alive into the Romans power, that the reſt, at the taking of the City, deſperately fighting, choſe rather to be ſlain, as well knowing that after ſuch hainous villanies, nothing could be expected upon ſurrender, but more torments and a cruel ignominious death. The City of Rhegium with all its former Rights, Laws, and Liberties was reſtored to the ancient inhabitants, as many as could any where be found or enquired out.

This act of Juſtice did much increaſe the Reputation of the City of Rome, and thereby was gained no leſſe Love from all the Italians and neighbouring People, then their armes had cauſed fear. In the Conſulſhip of C. Genuncius, and *Cn. 'Tis reported there was a moſt ſharp winter in theſe Conſuls time, in ſo much that the Sap being chill'd Trees withered; That Tibur was covered over with deep Ice, and that the Cattel periſhed for want of Fodder; ſo great and vehement was the coldneſs of the air, that monſtrous hills of ſnow lay unmelted in the Market place for forty dayes together. The thing being unuſual in that Climat, and by many look'd upon as a Prodigie, perplexed mens minds with wonderful terror, their fear being not long after much encreaſed, when *Q. At Rome the Temple of Salus with part of the walls was ſmitten with thunder and lightning; three Wolves before day brought a carkaſs half eaten into the City, aud being themſelves feared by the noiſe of men, left it in the market-place torn into pieces limb from limb.

Theſe things cauſed more feare then miſery at Rome; No great matter enſued, but that a War was made againſt the Picentians, which being the next yeare finiſhed, added likewiſe that province to the Roman Juriſdictions. Now in the Citie began the Coining ſilver, (their wealth being encreaſed by their victories) whereas before Braſſe only was uſed in all Exchanges; but then pennies and half-pennies were made of ſilver, which went for ten, and five pounds of braſſe; there were likewiſe leſſer pieces which being eſteemed at two pound and an halfe of braſſe, were from their value called, Seſtercies. But becauſe the war ſeemed not very honeſtly to be managed by the General, the Romans preferring Juſtice before their own profit, decreed, That the Camertes ſhould be ſought out and redeemed, that they ſhould be received into the City, have a place of habitation allotted to them in the Aventine Mount, and their ground reſtored to them.

Greater was the joy for the Picentine Victory, which was thought worthy to be Coined in their new Pieces of ſilver, that it might the more publickly be known, and the Memory thereof tranſmitted to Poſterity. Q. Caditius the ſon of Quintus, by order of Senate, took care for coining the Money, repreſenting on one ſide Picus the ſon of Saturne (for he is thought to be the Father of that Nation) on the other ſide a Roman Magiſtrate reaching forth his hand to a ſuppliant. And that, by ſubduing of that Country, a great acceſſe of ſtrength was made to the Romans is Manifeſt, in that three hundred and threeſcore thouſand Picentians ſubjected themſelves unto them. For that War the Conſuls, as they deſerved, did Triumph, but Sempronius his Glory was the greater, in that with more dangers and hazzard he had fought againſt the ſtronger enemie; For a ſuddain Earthquake, being very prodigious, happened, as the battles were ſet in array now ready to encounter; But the Conſul compoſed the ſouldiers feareful minds, by an oration very fit for the occaſion, telling them, The enemie was no leſſe troubled with unneceſſary devotion then themſelves, that theirs would be the Victory who firſt, ſhaking off fear, valiantly charged the enemie before he was well come to himſelf. And vowing a Temple to the Goddeſſe Tellus, if ſhe would grant Victory to the Romans, he began the Charge, which was as Couragiouſly received and ſo great a ſlaughter made, that, 'tis reported, the leſſer half remained even of the Victorious Army. After this fight (as other the Townes of the Picentians, ſo likewiſe) Aſculum the Metropolis yeelded it ſelf to Sempronius, and by its example the whole Nation ſubmitting it ſelf in obedience, obtained peace of the Romans. All that part of Italy being now ſubdued, which lieth toward the Sicilian and Jonian ſea, there remained onely the Sallentines to be brought in, who live upon the utmoſt coaſt where the upper and Ionians ſeas meet, to theſe therefore as by a Contagion did the war proceed from the Picentians, M. Attilius Regulus, and L. Julius Libo being Conſuls: The quarrel was pretended becauſe they had received Pyrrhus into their Havens and Towns when he came firſt out of Epirus. But indeed the much truer cauſes of the war were thought to be the Conveniency of the Haven of Brunduſium, where ſhips may go in and out with the ſame wind, the eaſie paſſage from thence into Illyrium and Epirus, and that they eſteemed it very opportune to have the ſame Bounds both of Italy and their own dominions. Both the Conſuls triumphed for this war in one day, which was the eighth of the Calends of February.

Having overcome the Sallentines in a ſet battel, they took Brunduſium, the moſt famous Town in thoſe quarters; other ſucceſſes alſo they had, being aſſiſted, as is reported, by Pales the Goddeſs of Shepherds, who of her own accord, as a reward of the Victory, deſired to have a Temple dedicated to her in Rome. For they who by violence and injury to their neighbours enlarged their own power, feared the Romans would prove an hindrance to their proceedings, the others contrarywiſe looking on them as a Succour, ſent to them from heaven againſt the Oppreſſion of their adverſarys. The Apollonians were the firſt, who ſending Embaſſadours to Rome craved their friendſhip; their Citie is ſeated threeſcore furlongs from the ſea, being built by the Corinthians and Corcyræans, having a very commodious haven, where the neereſt paſſage is from Brunduſium into Greece. The Illyrians and Macedonians are adjacent to them, ſo that againſt ſtrong and Coveteous neighbours they had much adoe to preſerve their own liberty. The meſſage was wonderful welcome and with much Humanity received by the Romans, not ſo much for the wealth of the Citie which was but ſmall, as for Future hopes in that they thought a way laid open and occaſion given them of greater deſignes hereafter: Inſomuch that very ſevere puniſhment was inflicted on certain noble young men who upon a quarrel ariſing had ſtrucken the Embaſſadours. *Q. Heralds be delivered up into the hands of the Embaſſadours that a Quæſtour ſhould goe along with them to Brunduſium leſt their friends and Kindred ſhould reſcue them by the way. This was a great teſtimonie as of their publick faith, ſo of their wiſdome; For having a deſire to draw forreign Nations into their friendſhip by the Reputation of their Juſtice, it much concerned them moſt preciſly to puniſh the injuries done to thoſe who firſt came to enter into their ſociety. Neither would any thing have proved more deſtructive to their deſigns then that the Appollonians ſhould have repented themſelves of their act, and others of their example. And hence ſprung that cuſtom, which was conſtantly in after times obſerved, That they who had ſtrucken the Embaſſadours of a free Citie ſhould be delivered up to it. But the Appollonians, when they were brought into their Citie, wiſely conſidering they ſhould gaine more by Clemency and humanity then Revenge, ſent them ſafe home again. This year each Conſul triumphed twice; D. Junius the fifth of the Calends of October, Numerius Fabius the third of Nones of the ſame Month over the Sarſinates, a people of Umbria. Againe they tryumphed over the Sallentines and Meſſapians who had aſſiſted the Sallentines, Fabius on the Calends of February, Junius on the Nones. And this was the Concluſion of all their Italian Wars; For what was acted in Volſinia next year, Quintus Fabius Gurges the third time Conſul, L. Mamilius Vitulus being his Colleague, was not ſo much a war againſt a juſt enemy, as vengeance inflicted upon ſlaves in behalf of their aſſociates. 488

B.17.ff. de Leguis. Zonaras

The Volſinians, the richeſt people of all Etruria, did implore the Romans aſſiſtance againſt thoſe who were formerly their ſervants. For by very ill and fooliſh advice (whether it were, that thereby they thought to increaſe their ſtrength ſo much broken in the late wars, or that themſelves tumbling in delights were loath to trouble themſelves with the labour of Arms) they made their ſervants free of the City, and committed the Militia into their hands. Afterward they began to be choſen Senators, and to bear Offices of State. In ſhort time oppreſſing the old Citizens, and uſurping the whole power of the Commonwealth to themſelves, they did moſt inſolently exerciſe their Liberty againſt their Maſters who gave it them. It was now grown common to Raviſh Virgins and honeſt Matrons by force, to heap Contumelies and Indignities upon Parents and Husbands, crying for juſtice according to Law; and all things were confuſedly hurried according to the pleaſure of the vileſt moſt petulant Knaves. And that we may not paſs over in ſilence a rare Precedent, to what iſſue the beaſtly impudence of ſlaviſh minds will proceed to when it hath gotten power, they made a Law, That the Libertines might have licence of Copulation with the wives and daughters of their Patrons, and that the Maidenhead of a Virgin deſigned in marriage to a true Freeman, ſhould firſt be proſtituted to one of their Order. Wherefore the old Volſinians being neither able any longer to endure theſe miſeries, nor by their own power to repulſe and avoid them, ſecretly conſulting together, reſolved to ſend Embaſſadors to Rome. They having by private ſolicitations prevailed that the Senate would meet in ſome private houſe (for they ſaw unavoidable ruine over their heads if the buſineſs was known) they did by a very ſorrowful diſcourſe make them acquainted with their ſad condition, wherewith the Fathers being moved to compaſſion, promiſed them aſſiſtance for the recovery of their loſt Rights.

But theſe things which were thought to be agitated in ſecret, were by a Samnite diſcovered to the parties complained of; For he, a gueſt to the maſter of the houſe where the Senate met, being then ſick, was by forgetfulneſſe left in a place where he overheard all their diſcourſe and betrayed it. Therefore the Embaſſadours, after their Return from Rome, were called into queſtion, and the whole buſineſſe being found out, were with other prime Men of the Citie cruelly put to death. The Romans, now having a juſter cauſe of War, ſent Q. Fabius the Conſul with an Army againſt them, whom, daring to encounter him in open field he put to flight, and ſlew a very great Number in the Purſuit: The Reſt who betooke themſelves into their place of defence, he reſolved with counterworkes to beſiege. But they making ſtrong Reſiſtance, The Conſul (as there were frequent Pickerings and light skirmiſhes) unwarily venturing too far in the fight, received a wound whereof he dyed, which the beſieged underſtanding, made a Sally with the greateſt ſtrength they could, hoping if they ſuddenly aſſaulted the enemy now in trouble for the loſs of the Conſul, to force them to break up the ſiege. But the event of the battel was contrary, for being roughly received by the Romans, they were beaten in again with loſſe.

Iulius obſequens de Prodigiis. c.27.

In this fight I ſuppoſe Decius Mus to have had the Command; for he might happily have been Fabius his Lieutenant, and after his death be chief in managing the War till a ſucceſſor was ſent. And hence I conjecture it comes to paſſe that ſome negligent Hiſtorians have aſcribed to Decius Mus both the beginning and finiſhing of this War. Cn. Cornelius L. F. Cn. N. Blaſio and C. Marcius were created Cenſors that year, and this laſt having before born the ſame Office, was from this his Magiſtracy called Cenſorinus. The moderation of this Marcius was very remarkable, who being inveſted with Power which he ſought not after, aſſembled the people together, and in a grave ſpeech chid them, That they had twice intruſted that Office to the ſame man, whereas their forefathers did in this very conſideration limit the time of it, becauſe the power was too Great. Hereupon a Law was made, That the ſame man ſhould not be made Cenſor the ſecond time. The ſame year the number of the Queſtors was encreaſed; in former times there were but four, two for the City, and two to aſſiſt the Conſuls abroad in the Wars. But afterward ward their Taxes and Customs encreasing with the Commonwealth, there was a necessity of doubling the number. Appius Claudius who in the time of his Magistracy was surnamed Caudex, and M. Fulvius were Consuls the year ensuing, which was very memorable, in that then first began the war between the Romans and Carthaginians in Sicily. Then first brake out Hostility between two most potent Cities, which after many years, after many bloody overthrows given and received, could not at length be ended without the utter ruine and destruction of one of them.

But, before we enter upon the History of the War, it will be necessary to relate something of former times concerning Carthage; for in the ensuing Narrative many things will occur, hard to be understood and judged of, unless both the Original and encrease of that City be first known.

BOOK VI.

Iustin. 18.5 Appian Libyc. Strabo b.17 Livie 34.61. Iustinius. Strabo

THAT Carthage was built by the Tyrians of Phanicia (besides the constant agreement of old Histories) the perpetual friendship of those Cities while they flourished, as also the manifest likeness both of their Language and Manners doth clearly testifie. 'Tis reported that Elisa (who was likewise called Dido) the daughter of Agenor the son of Belus, flying out of her Country (by reason of the hatred she bore to her brother Pigmaleon for the unjust slaughter of her husband Sichæus) entred that Creek of Africa, and possessed that Peninsula where Carthage was afterward built; her small beginnings promising little hopes of so great power and wealth as afterwards was obtained: For 'tis believed Dido purchased no more ground then might be compassed with the hide of a Bull or Ox, which being cut out into very slender thongs contained a larger space, then the sellers did imagine, and it was sufficient whereon to Erect a Castle, which from thence is thought to be called Byrsa. Afterward seeing (many placing their habitation near them for Traffick sake) they began to look like a City, and that the Africans were willing to entertain among them men so rich and very gentle and quiet, they hearkned to the counsel sent from Utica (which was also a Colonie of the Tyrians) which advised them, After their example to build a City. So it was agreed, That the Africans should afford them ground, and that the Phanicians in recompense thereof should pay a yearly Tribute.

Cato apud Solin. חדשה קרת Berneggerus ad Iustinum 18.6.9 Iustinus

The work being finished, Dido gave it a name in her own Language, Carthadas; the Greeks called it Carchedo, and the Romans by an error in Pronunciation, Carthago. This City having Loving Neighbours, an Industrious people, and what was above all, a Wise Queen, did in a short time wonderfully increase. These things seeme to have been acted some seventy years before the foundation of Rome; for about so ancient a Circumstance Authors do not very well agree. But as Elisa her life was notable for variety of Chances, so was her death very remarkable. Iarbas a Petit King of some African Province, sought to marry her, threatning upon refusal to raise war against her. But as she was averse from marriage by reason of her singular Chastity and love of her former husband, so she very well understood that in these tender beginnings of affairs, a war would prove fatal and destructive; therefore taking time to deliberate, as if she had at length overcome her own Resolution, and were inclined to marry the African, caused, a Pile of wood to be erected before her intended marriage, whereon to sacrifice to the Infernal gods in behalf of her husband Sichæus; And after many Sacrifices offer'd, she did at length ascend the Pile, and killed her self with a sword she brought with her; her love to her Husband and Subjects exceeding the care of her own health. The Carthaginians returned her what honour they could, and while the Commonwealth flourished, worshipped her as a Goddess, raising a Temple in the place where she lived, calling her Dido, which in their language signifieth a Virago. Silius Italic. 4 3 *Servius Fuldensis in Virg. When after her death no man was thought worthy to succeed her in the Kingdom, the Citie began to be governed by the Mixed Power of Nobles and Commons. The Name of Kings still remained, but they were like the Lacedæmonian Kings; but that the honour was not to any Certaine families annexed, but conferred on any Prime Man who exceeded others in Virtue and Riches. These had the management of Wars abroad (wherefore the Romans called them Pretours and Dictatours, comparing their power with the usuage of their own Commonwealth) at home they were Princes of all publick Consultations, with their advice the affaires of the Citie were ordered: Things of heigher concernement were referred to the people, their sentence decided all controversie between the Kings and Senatours: They also had authority to alter the Laws made by the Kings and Councel, if they seemed contrary to the good of the Publick, which any man had Liberty to question. Which too great power of the Commons, being augmented to an intolerable height, by flattering Parasites and Orators, did in after time infinitely wrong and obstruct the Carthaginian affaires. Moreover in the Senate there were thirty of the more Antient appointed as a supreme Councel, and these had greatest authority with all Men. There was likewise a Superinspectour of Manners, invested with the same power as the Roman Censors, to maintain publick Decency and Discipline. In processe of time, after many victories, their greatnesse being encreased, they chose a greater Number of Commanders for the War: Among which Mago, the most Egregious both in courage and fortune, having left behind him two sonnes well educated and instructed in the art of Warre, and they also to their more numerous offspring, as it were by hand, delivering the same skill and knowledg, it was thought fit by some meanes to curbe the too great power of that Family; to this purpose an hundred men were constituted to passe sentence upon the Generals themselves: Their power was very formidable, as for the largenesse of their Commission, so for the continuance, which was dureing life, whereas even the Kings now, were not for so long a time but yearly created, whom at home they commonly called Suffetes, that is to say, Judges, much like to the Roman Consul. But when the Centumviri or hundred men behaved themselves with much insolence, Hannibal by a Law reduced them into Order, it being decreed, That the Judges should Yearly be chosen, and that no man should continue in office two yeares together. Their gods and holy Rites they brought most from Tyrus, some they did afterwards add. Juno they chiefly adored, and Æsculapius not a little, in whose honour they erected a Magnificent Temple in the Citie; Apollo's house was likewise very rich, covered with plate of Gold, wherein was a famous statue which after the Ruine of Carthage was carried to Rome and placed in the great Shew-place called Circus Maximus. But to Hercules at Tyrus they every year sent a ship, with great care well trimmed, with the Tithes of their yearly fruits, and spoiles gotten in War.

From the same Founders also they derived another most horrid Rite, to offer an humane sacrifice once a year to Saturne, whom they called Belus; the Relicks of which Barbarous Cruelty could not be quite abolished by the Destruction of the Citie. The other Manners and Customes of the Citie were more civilized by their conveniency of Commerce and Traffick, to which being by nature, and Education from their Forefathers much addicted, they did apply all their studies and Counsels. Hence by an unavoidable mischief the Love of Riches corrupted their Courts of Justice, made Vertue a servant to money, inflamed the Peoples minds with Covetousnesse, and infected them with a sordid custom of Cheating and Lying, forcing the Commonwealth wholly to give it self up to these arts. Insomuch as it came to passe that as little Faith was had in Carthaginian Contracts and Covenants, so the chiefest part of the publick strength consisted in ships, their Infantry the main support and pillar of all Empires, was had in no Request, Their Horse in very little: As often as they waged War by Land, they made use of Mercenaries, who had no true Love to the Commonwealth, whose faith was to be bought with money, their discord troublesome, and their conspiracies pernicious. Which error was so Capital, that before the utter destruction of the City, no other enemy but those did ever bring them so near to final ruine.

Neither did a lesser crop of misery spring from this, That their Magistrates and Publick Officers did by mutual connivance exercise Extortion and Purloin the state without punishment; so that 'tis the lesse to be wondred, that a war arising between these two Cities, the Romans proved conquerors, when as the Senators in all hard times added their wealth to the publick stock, and the Carthaginians made a gain of the Commonwealth. But these vices grew up together with the City, so that at first being weak and little they were prety well born withal, afterward for a while the greatnes of their Empire, and the singular virtue of their Commanders made them the lesse sensible, by whose means chiefly, I find, was both obtained and established the happines that ever attended Carthage. Their first beginning in Arms was against the Affricans, requiring Tribute for the ground the City was built on; neither could they extort that right out of their hands but by many battels: hereby they enlarged their Empire, and the best planted part of Africa was reduced into subjection to them. Their command of the seas gave them fair opportunity of passing over into Sardinia and Sicily; the one was rude and Barbarous, not able to resist, into the other they were invited by its Beauty and Fertility, which was, by reason of the Inhabitants perpetual discords exposed to the injuries of the most Potent. Out of Sardinia into Cersica their passage was short, and they did the more easily possess the Island as being not very rich.

Iust.4.3 Herodotus 1. 165

But in Sicily for a long time they fought with various Fortune, obtaining many victories, and receiving many overthrows: Amilcar the son of Hanno when he had carried over three hundred thousand men, was vanquished by Gelo and slain. With which calamity being terrified, the Carthaginians did abstain from Sicily, till being called over by the Ægestans, who were oppressed by the Selinuncians, they sent thither Annibal the son of Gesco the son of Amilcar; he destroying Selinunts and Himera, did again encrease the Carthaginians power in Sicily. Imilco did at sea vanquish Leptis the brother of Dionysius the elder, and the Sicilians Admiral, he took and sunk an hundred ships, and slew above twenty thousand men, he surprised many Cities, and took also part of Syracuse, but a sudden Pestilence arising, which consumed most part of his Army, forced him to return home with very few men. Neither did they yet despair of gaining Sicily, but in few years after sent out Hanno with a fleet, commanding him to fight Dionysius. Afterward Mago being invited by Icetas, when he was in the City of Syracuse it self with threescore thousand foot, he was cast out by Timoleon; afterward the same Timoleon in a very great battel overcame Annibal and Amilcar, having in their army seventy thousand men, and forced their Camps likewise. But they had not a quicker and greater turne of fortune in any war then in that against Agathocles, who being beaten in Sicily, besieged in Syracuse, having no manifest hopes of safety, did yet of his own accord carry the war over into Africa, where having overcome the Carthaginians in many battels, and caused the Libyans every where to revolt, he brought them into very great danger and fear; and returning home again he expelled them clearly out of Sicily; till at length the death of the King, and the confusions which followed upon it, again gave them hopes, and opened them a way to regain possession. After this (as we have said) they variously fought with Pyrrhus, proving at length to be the superiours.

In the mean time some Cities also in Spain became Tributary to them, whether being called to the assistance of the Gaditanes against some oppressing Neighbours, they sent relief to their Kinsmen (for Gades likewise was founded by the Tyrians) and reduced some adjacent Regions of Spain into their own Jurisdiction. This was the posture the Carthaginian affairs were in when they took up arms against the Romans. But the Syracusans and their King Hiero possessed the greater part of Sicily which was not subdued by the Carthaginians; the residue was held by the Mamertines. They while they were in League with the Roman Legion at Rhegium, and could have assistance from them, were not content to secure their own Territories, but invaded those of the Syracusans and Carthaginians, forcing many Cities to pay Tribute to them to avoid plunder, wastings of their grounds, and other incommodities of war. But when Rhegium was taken, and their companions worthily executed, being bereaved of that help, they were not able to uphold their former greatnesse; and having lost whatsoever they held out of Messana, were now at war with Hiero for the City it self. Concerning which King Hiero, I think it not inconvenient somewhat at large to discourse, because he in these times being first an enemy to the Romans, afterward for many years a companion and friend, was of very great moment in the setling of affairs. For in him was found singular happinesse, great virtue, and most eminent wisdom; and in those dayes the power and state of Syracuse did with him flourish and with him fall.

This man not being helped forward by any wealth or glory left by his Ancestors, owed all his fortune to himself, promoted from a low estate to vast power, not as many, by accusing great men, or by the slaughter and banishment of his opposers, but by wonderful modesty both in attaining and in exercising his power, as well knowing there is no Kingdom so well and firmly established, as that which is in such a manner order'd, that it more concerns the Subjects to fear the loss of it then the Prince.

Having reigned therefore four and fifty years, in such a time when two most potent Cities on each hand did with most sharp contentions, fight for the dominion of the world, troubled with no War abroad (unlesse in his first year) nor assaulted by any Treason at home, he died being above ninty years old, his senses being at that age entire and his body sound, as a certain argument of his Temperance, being not only beloved by his own people, but had in great Estimation both with the Romans and Grecians; when he would often have divested himself of the Principality, the Citizenes did openly prohibite him; And his son Gelon, who, at above fifty years of age, died before him, did all his life time, even to the last, with constant faith and obedience honour him, shewing a rare example of Moderation, in that he chose rather for ever to want a Kingdom then lose his Father. This Hieron was by his Father Hierocles (who derived his Pedigree from Gelon an antient Tyrant of Sicily) exposed to the mercy of the world; forasmuch as he being a Noble man was shamed to bring up a child which he had begotten on a servant. But being destitute of all human succour, the Bees for many days fed him, puting honey into his mouth as he lay upon the ground. Hierocles being much affected with this Prodigie, and the answers of the Southsayers, who affirmed, That hereby Kingly power was pre-

As he was learning his book among his equals, 'tis reported, that a Wolf ſuddenly appearing in the midſt of the boyes took his book out of his hand. When he firſt entred into the Wars, 'tis ſaid, An Eagle pitch'd upon his ſhield, and an Owle upon his ſpeare; which was thought a ſigne of wiſdom and ſtrength, and by reaſon of the Kingly bird, of higheſt honour and dignity. But he himſelf ſhortly gave more certaine evidence, being of exceeding comelineſſe and ſtrength of body, but much more illuſtrious and beloved for his wit, Temperance, Gentleneſſe, Juſtice and Moderation; having often fought ſingle Combates ſometimes in the Battel, ſometimes againſt private Challengers, he was alwayes Victour, and by Pyrrhus frequently rewarded with many Military Gifts for his valour; and Pyrrhus his Kinſwoman Nereis was afterward married to Gelon the ſon of Hiero. Pyrrhus being driven out of Sicily, when (according to the ill temper of thoſe times) a diſſenſion aroſe between the army and Citie of Syracuſe, Artemidorus and Hicro were, in the Camp neer Mergana, by ſuffrage of the ſouldiers choſen Commanders. By the advice of Hiero, and the help of his friends, ſome ſouldiers being privily ſent into the Citie reduced it into their Power; where Hiero ſhewed himſelf a gallant Man, and fit for the government of any Realme whatſoever; For, of the ſeveral factions which were therein, he neither ſlew nor baniſhed any one Man, but by his clemencie, Moderation and upright Counſel ſo compounded their differenes, that he was choſen Pretor of Syracuſe with the good will and affection even of thoſe againſt whom he came, as much as of thoſe men who invited him thither. Having thus provided for Domeſtick affairs, he deviſed a remedy (very neceſſary indeed, but not altogether praiſe-worthy) againſt the inſolency of the mercenary ſouldiers: For drawing out his army againſt the Mamertines when they met him near Centuripæ, he order'd his battel near the River of the Cyamoſians with ſuch art, that he left a good diſtance between the Citizens and the Mercenaries, then commanding the Mercenaries to begin the fight, as if he and the City forces would on ſome other ſide Charge the enemy while they were already buſied The Mercenaries by this means being ſurrounded by the greater number of Mamertines, were ſlain; himſelf (having thus employed the enemy) marched fair and ſoftly with his other forces to Syracuſe.

Having in this manner purged the Army of thoſe who were ill diſpoſed and enclined to ſedition, he diligently Traineth his City forces, hireth new Auxiliaries, and now having the goodwill of all (the moſt inſolent being removed and the reſt not daring to murmure) he order'd the Government according to his own pleaſure. In the mean while, the Mamertines proud of their late victory and grown more fierce, raſhly, and without fear invaded and ſpoiled the Syracuſan Teritories. Hiero now confiding both in the City and Army, forthwith marcheth out againſt them, and pitcheth his Camp near the enemies City, almoſt empty by reaſon of having ſent out every way ſo many Troops. The Mamertines underſtanding the danger, ſuddenly return home to the relief of their City, with all their forces joyned. Hiero removing his Camp out of the Mamertine Fields, taketh the City of Milæ, and in it fifteen hundred ſouldiers; thence gaining by the way ſome Caſtles, he marcheth to Ameſelum (which is ſeated in the midſt between Agyrium and Centuripæ) which (though it were well fenced, and protected by a ſtrong Garriſon) he forced and demoliſhed, the ſouldiers he received into pay, and cauſed to fight under him; the grounds he divided between the Centuripines and Agyrines. Being animated with this ſucceſs, he again invaded the Mamertine Teritories, taketh Aleſum upon compoſition; but the Abacenines and Tyndarites voluntary ſurrender themſelves to him. Hereby were the Cities on each hand next to Meſſana on both the coaſts ſubject to Hiero, (for the Tindaritans inhabit toward the Etrurian Sea, the Tauromenians, who were at this time in friendſhip with the Syracuſans, toward the Sicilian Sea.) The Mamertines therefore being ſtreightned, ſend out their forces under the conduct of Cio their Pretor to oppoſe the enemy, who now was lodged near the River Longanus in the Mylean fields. The battel being begun, and the fight along time doubtful, Hiero ſuddenly ſending in freſh Troops upon the Flank of the Mamertines, made the Victory his own. For before the fight Hiero had placed together two hundred Meſſanian Exuls, valiant men, who hated the Mamertines, with four hundred choice men of his own Army, commanding them, To go about the hill Thorax, and by a ſudden incurſion to fall upon the enemy on the other ſide, which they ſtoutly performing were the cauſe why the whole Mamertine Army fell by the ſword.

Cio, ſeeing all loſt, and deſiring nothing more then to dye, was taken priſoner, ſore wounded, and conveyed into the Syracuſan campe, finding the Prediction of the Entrailes and Southſayers true in another ſenſe then he expected. For before the Battel the Prophets looking into the Inteſtines of the ſacrifice promiſed, He ſhould lie in the Enemies Camp that night: Which he eſteeming an argument of victory too late found himſelf deluded by another Interpretation, with grief and ſickneſs caſt down, when the next day among other horſes, he eſpyed that his ſon rode upon in the Field, conjecturing thereby his death, he reſolutely pulling the cloaths and plaiſters off his wounds made way to his own death. The Mamertines, underſtanding their overthrow, grew full of deſpair, and were now ready to preſent their humble ſupplication to the Conquerours, when an unexpected accident prevented them. It happened that at the ſame time Hannibal, the Carthaginian Pretor, was in the Liparæan Iſlands, which are adjacent to Sicily. He having intelligence of Hiero's Victory, fearing leſt (the Mamertines being utterly vanquiſhed) the Syracuſan power would grow too great for the Carthaginians, came ſuddenly over under pretence of congratulating with Hiero for his Victory; and hindering him from directly marching to Meſſana, did himſelf make firſt enterance, and when the Mamertines were now ready to yield, did not only poſſeſſe them with hopes of retaining their liberty, but left a ſtrong Garriſon of his own ſouldiers amongſt them. Hiero underſtanding himſelf by this craft deluded, & being not ſufficiently prepared for a ſiege, made now more difficult, returned to Syracuſe, where being received by all with very great joy, he was by an univerſal acclamation ſaluted King, which Title he afterward retained with the conſent both of the Citizens and others of the Iſland without.

When Hiero was retreated, the Mamertines having a little ſpace of reſuming confidence, began to deliberate upon their preſent condition, but were divided into two Factions; ſome thought it not to be diſputed, 'But that they ſhould commit themſelves to the protection of the Carthaginians, which as for many other reaſons it was convenient, ſo having admitted their Garriſon, 'twas little leſſe then neceſſary. On the other ſide 'twas ſaid, 'The Carthaginians were no leſſe enemies to the Mamertines then Hiero, that without doubt their purpoſe of defending of the City was not out of good will, but deſire of Dominion; That of a long time they had aſpired to the Empire of Sicily, neither were caſt down from their bold hopes by loſſe of Armies and Navies, no not by wars in Africa, and fear of their own ſtate at home; That therefore without exception they muſt prove Vaſſals if they commit themſelves to thoſe who have ſo ſtrong a Navy, and poſſeſſe greateſt part of Sicily it ſelf. That 'tis therefore no way expedient to deſire aid from the Carthaginians, a covetous, unfaithful people, who will lay heavier burdens upon them then they could fear from the Syracuſans. If the Punick Garriſon came only with intent to preſerve the City from Hiero, they may now upon fair terms be diſmiſſed having done the work: But if they have ſome other Clandeſtine deſign, it behooveth them with the greater care to prevent the danger of their deceitful friendſhip. That they ſhould rather implore aſſiſtance from the Romans, as a people invincible, of unqueſtionable faith and ſincerity, who will have neither occaſion nor opportunity of keeping Meſſana under their juriſdiction, as having not a foot of ground in Sicily, nor any uſe of ſea affairs, and conſequently taking no care therein. That they would be abundantly content to keep Italy ſecure from Hiero and the Carthaginians, having made Meſſana ſtrong, as an obſtacle to their further proceedings. That therefore they ſhould continue to rely upon the Roman faith rather then any other Nation; that indeed they could neither with honeſty or any convenience change their former counſels, having already ſent Embaſſadors and obtained hope of ſuccour and relief. For the Mamertines before their laſt battel with Hiero, beginning then to diſtruſt in their own ſtrength had craved aſſiſtance of the Romans as their Kinſmen. And the people being perſwaded by the Conſuls who were deſirous of employment in the Wars, had decreed that aid ſhould be ſent to them; but the Senate out of ſhame to be counted authors of the buſineſs, did defer it. For they who had lately ſo ſeverely puniſhed their own Legion for the wicked ſurprize of Rhegium, if they ſhould now aſſiſt the Mamertines, who had by the like treachery obtained the maſtery of Meſſana, they ſaw they ſhould clearly looſe the reputation of their Juſtice and Fidelity, which by their former act they had acquired. But now having heard of the Mamertines overthrow, and not doubting but if they were forſaken by the Romans, they would apply themſelves to the Carthaginians, with one conſent they ordained to ſend them relief. For in the Senate many had before inclined to this opinion, as foreſeeing that otherwiſe Meſſana quickly, and not long after all Sicily would come under the Carthaginian power, which if it were once come to paſſe, they ſhould be forced to fight with the Carthaginians for their own poſſeſſions in Italy.

For this danger would prove unavoidable, as well by reaſon of the inſatiable deſire of Rule in thoſe who are potent, as by the convenient ſcituation of the places. For Italy, proceeding in a long tract between the two ſeas from the Ligurians and Venetians, to the Brutians, is there divided from Sicily by a very narrow Channel. For there is no doubt made but that theſe Regions in old times were a continent, afterward divided by the ſea; whether the grounds being low were eaſily overflown, or whether ſome earthquake or ſtrength of the Tides cut off the Iſthmus. From hence many think that Town to be called Rhegium, becauſe things which are broken, are by ſome ſuch word nominated in the Greek Tongue. 'Tis therefore very credible that the firſt inhabitants of Sicily came out of Italy, as may be conjectured by the very name. For the Opici are ſaid to have built a Citie on the adverſe ſhore over againſt Italy, which becauſe it was ſcituate in a Creek of the ſea bearing the figure of a Sythe, they called it, I beleeve, Sicilia, which the Grecians afterward coming, called Zancle, both thoſe words in the ſeveral Languages ſignifying a Sythe. From thence, as often it happens, the name was derived to the whole Iſland, Which was by many called both Zancle and Sicilia.

This

This Iſland far excelleth all others in the Mediterranean Sea, both in extent of ground, and fruitfulneſſe of Soile, yeelding abundance of Oyl and Wine and Corn of the beſt; adorned with many, and thoſe very great Cities, even to wonder; and if you conſider the Commodity of the Havens, and ſcituation of the whole Iſland, there is ſcarce to be found in the world a place more fit for the chiefe ſeat of an Empire: For, being near adjacent to Italy, on the contrary part it looketh toward Africa, on another ſide lyeth Sardinia, and on eaſt it hath Peloponneſus devided from Græcia by the Ionian ſea: On every hand the voyage is ſhort, and the paſſage eaſy for ſhips whether bound outward or homeward. And truly, though other reaſons were alledged, yet the only cauſe of the War between the Carthaginians and Romans, was, without doubt, the great deſire each of them had to be Maſters of this Iſland. The Romans found fault, That the Carthaginians contrary to the league had aſſiſted the Tarentines; the Carthaginians on the other ſide charged them, for having entred into Confæderacy with Hiero againſt them. But to ſo great a power were now both theſe Cities advanced, that it could not be avoided, but that at ſome time or other for ſome cauſe they muſt needs find occaſion to fall out. For as Trees planted at no great diſtance, for a while do not much hinder one the other, but being grown to ſome bigneſſe bereave one the other of Juice and nouriſhment from the earth, and at ful growth enterwinding both root and branches mutually deſtroy one the other: So riſing Empires cannot long be at Amitie and friendſhip, but, ſwallowing up what is interjacent between each others Dominions, deſire to try the ſuperiority between themſelves, neither being able to put a limit to their own ambition or to enlarge their Territories without removing all Opponents.

Diodori Eclog. book 23

Florus. 22 L. Ampelius c. 46

To theſe cauſes may be added the great power the Comminalty had in each City, together with their earneſt deſire of undertaking the War. In Carthage the vulgar ſort did much prevail, and now in the encreaſe of their City, growing rich by many Commodities, were willing for gains ſake to have war upon war. The condition of the Roman people was not much different, for having in the former wars ſuſtained damage in their eſtates, they hoped by the riches of Sicily to recompence themſelves, and therefore, according to that power they had lately extorted from the Senate, did approve and confirm their ſentence who perſwaded the war. Hereby Appius the Conſul being commiſſioned (whereas otherwiſe the major part of the Senate had aſſented, overpowring the votes of thoſe who ſtood to old Rules) without delay ſendeth Claudius a Tribune of ſouldiers beforehand with ſome few ſhips, to obſerve an opportunity, and if any were offered, to waſt over into Sicily. When he was come to Rhegium, not daring to hazard his ſhips becauſe he ſaw the ſeas obſtructed with a greater fleet of Carthaginians, he entred into a Fiſhermans veſſel and croſſed over to Meſſana; there diſcourſing with the Mamertines as the preſent occaſion required, being not able to overcome the contradiction of the Carthaginians, he returned without having done his buſineſſe. But awhile after underſtanding there was a diſſention at Meſſana, ſome pleading againſt the Roman aſſiſtance, the greater part bearing ill will to the Carthaginian Garriſon, he again croſſed the ſea, and among other things to the preſent purpoſe told them, His coming was only to ſet the City at liberty, which when he had effected he would immediately return. The Carthaginians anſwer'd, The Romans need not trouble themſelves for the liberty of a City which was under their juriſdiction, the Carthaginians had already out of their good will taken care that the Mamertines ſhould not be compelled to be ſubject to the Syracuſans: That therefore he might depart, or elſe give ſome other reaſon of his being at Meſſana. Claudius denied, The City was free ſo long as a Forreign Garriſon continued therein contrary to their pleaſure.

To this when no man returned any anſwer, the Carthaginians out of pride, the Mamertines for fear holding their peace, he cunningly and readily proceeded, 'Tis plaine, ſaith he, by this your general ſilence, that the Carthaginians cauſe is unjuſt, and that the Mamertines are deſirous of liberty, otherwiſe neither would the one forbeare to juſtifie their own Right, and the others; if they conſented with the Carthaginians, having no cauſe to diſſemble, would freely and openly ſpeak their minds. At this there ariſing a kind of a noiſe in the aſſembly, many praiſing his ſpeech as true, and indeed agreeing with their inward thoughts; he (thinking he had, for the preſent, ſufficiently moved the Mamertines and tryed the diſpoſition of their minds) went back to Rhegium. And not long after, having made ready his ſhips, he attempted to paſſe over; but being much inferiour to the Carthaginian Commanders, both in number of veſſels, and skill in ſea affairs, and being beaten back by the violence of the Waves, in a ſudden ſtorme ariſing, he returned to his port, having loſt ſome ſhips, and hardly ſaving the Reſt. But being nothing terrified with this miſadventure, he new trinoned his ſhips, reſolving upon a better opportunity once more to make tryal of Fortune: When behold meſſengers came from Hanno (Governour of the Mamertine Garriſon, and Guardian of the ſeas) bringing with them all the ſhips and men which the Carthaginians had taken in the former fray: Hanno's deſign herein was to caſt the blame of the breach of Covenants upon the Romans, he therefore alſo complained, That they had by force attempted to ſail in thoſe ſeas which were in the poſſeſſion of the Carthaginians; and furthermore perſwaded them to have a great care of preſerving peace and maintaining the league.

But hearing that Claudius would not admit of any conditions unleſſe they would withdraw their forces out of Meſſana, and that again he endeavoured to croſs the ſea, he vaunted, That he would not ſuffer the Romans ſo much as to waſh their hands in that ſea. Nevertheleſs he could not not prevent Clauaius, who obſerving the Nature of the ſea, laid hold of an opportunity when the wind happily helped the Tide, and arrived in Sicily without oppoſition. There calling a Counſel of thoſe Mamertines he found in the Haven, he perſwaded them, To call Hanno to them, as if they had ſome buſineſs at preſent to conſult with him about. For Hanno, not much confiding in the Townſmens doubtful minds, had with the ſouldiers poſſeſſed the Caſtle, neither was he willing to truſt himſelf in any of their Aſſemblies: Yet fearing if he betrayed his Diffidence he might encreaſe their complaints, and by his abſence give them occaſion to joyn with the Romans, he came to diſcourſe with them, where the time being ſpun out with diſputation and wrangling, the Romans, with the Mamertines their approbation, laid hands on him and caſt him into priſon. So being circumvented by craft, and frightned with menaces, when no other condition would be accepted, he was compelled to reſtore the Mamertines their Caſtle, and draw away his Garriſon. The Carthaginians upon intelligence of the buſineſſe, were above meaſure exaſperated, and (whereas otherwiſe they uſed to puniſh their Commanders for evil counſels though they proſpered) exclaiming both againſt the folly and cowardize of Hanno, miſerably crucified him, and immediately ſent both ſea and land forces to Meſſana with another Hanno, the ſon of Hannibal, to order affairs in Sicily: He drawing his forces together at Lilybæum, marched to Selinuns, where pitching his Camp, he left his foot army and went to Agrigentum, and (having fenced the Caſtle there) he drew the people, being friends to the Carthaginians, into arms againſt the Romans: From whence being returned to his Camp, Embaſſadours came to him from Hiero, who being no whit content with the Romans arrival into Sicily, thought this the fitteſt ſeaſon wherein joyning forces for a time with the Carthaginians, both they and alſo the Barbarians in poſſeſſion of Meſſana might be driven out of Sicily. Having therefore had diſcourſe with the Carthaginian General, they eaſily agreed to enter into confederacy againſt the Romans, who had ſupplanted both to their equal loſſe, each of them having failed of their hopes of Meſſana: 'twas ordered they ſhould joyntly beſiege Meſſana, and ſuffer no part of Sicily to be ſubject to any power but the Carthaginians or Syracuſans. So the Carthaginian Commander with his whole ſtrength moved againſt the Mamertines, having firſt ſent an Herauld to charge the Romans, If they would be eſteemed friends of the Carthaginians to depart Meſſana, and within a time prefixed to quit Sicily. The ſhips were commanded to keep their ſtation about Peloras; the foot army fortified their Camp at a place not far from Meſſana, called Cubilia, in the Greek toungue Εὐναὶ. Hiero likewiſe, according to agreement, came with his Syracuſant Army, and laid ſiege to the Citie on the other ſide, about the Hill Chalcidicus, ſo the Citie, being round begirt, could not ſafely receive ſuccour either by land or ſea.

About the ſame time, when the Herauld brought back no peaceful anſwer from Meſſana, the Carthaginians, partly out of anger, partly out of diſtruct, cruelly put to death all their Mercenary ſouldiers which were Italians by Nation. Theſe things were no ſooner heard at Rome, but the Conſul Appius was forthwith ſent with a ſtrong Army to Rhegium, thence he ſent ſome before, to treat with the Carthaginians and Hiero about breaking up the ſiege, in the mean time, ſeeing the ſeas ſo ſtrongly guarded, he was very ſolicitous and intent in contriving how to croſs over with the leaſt danger. The Conſul's Embaſſadours brought back no friendly anſwer from the Carthaginians, but were by Hiero with an accurate oration ſharply reprehended, he firſt having recounted the many good offices he had done the Romans, proceed ſaying, 'I am 'in doubt, Romans, whether I ſhould grieve for my ſelf or for you; I indeed have loſt friends of 'you ſomewhat worſe then I took you to be, but ye have loſt that Reputation of Juſtice and In'tegrity for which ye were ſo famous among all Nations. With the Mamertins ye never had 'any friendſhip or ſociety, ye had heretofore League with the Carthaginians, and lately entred in'to one with Me. Being now willing to breake theſe Leagues, can ye give an account, by what 'injury from us, or merit of the Mamertines ye are thereunto provoked? But becauſe the 'Carthaginians are able to ſpeake for themſelves, omitting what concerneth them, I ſhall at pre'ſent put you in mind of things in reference to my ſelf alone. The Mamertines your good 'Country men, did, as you know, receive pay under the Syracuſan Banners, and being diſ'miſed for their Returne for Italy, after they had been entertained as freinds and Companions 'by the poore credulous Meſſenians, committed a moſt horrid fact, as hath not been remembred 'by man, ſlaying in the night time their Land-lords, and keeping in their own power, their goods, 'wives, children and the Citie it ſelf. Which unleſſe your ſelves (being of the ſame opinion 'with other men) had judged to be a moſt vile and execrable villany, you would not ſo ſeverely 'have puniſhed the ſelf ſame fact of the Campanians committed upon the Rhegians, by the Ma'mertines Example. By the ſame indignitie therefore wherewith ye were moved to take revenge 'of wicked villanies, by the ſame am I moved not to let the Mamertines goe unpuniſhed, eſpeci'ally ſeeing they have ſince committed ſo many Robberies almoſt all Sicily over, burying as it 'were the memory of their firſt offence with others afterward committed. For (to omit other 'things) in that they deſtroyed the Cities of Camarina and Gela, then under the Syracuſan prote'ction, is reaſon ſufficient why I ſhould with a Juſt and pious War proſecute the boldneſſe of ſuch 'moſt impudent Men. If ye therefore undertake to defend them becauſe, being born in the 'ſame Italy, they are as it were your kinſmen, how much more juſtly might you have ſpared 'the Rhegians which were your fellow-Citizens? When in the taking of Rhegium I helped 'you with Auxiliaries and Proviſions, how ſhould I poſſibly then Divine that ye would hereafter

'hinder

'hinder me when I ſhould upon as juſt cauſes beſiege Meſſana? But what need I uſe many 'words? if you have any care left of your reputation and faithfulneſſe, if any ſenſe of honeſty, 'at leaſt if any ſhame, I ought not to doubt but that you will with your forces rather aſſiſt me 'in my juſt cauſe then oppoſe me. But if the conſideration of theſe things ſeem light unto you, 'however the event of war be doubtful, 'tis moſt certain all the world will plainly underſtand, 'That the Romans were incited to bare arms againſt us, not out of any colour of Juſtice and E-'quity, not by any injuries received (for that ye can no way pretend) not out of any pity or 'good will to the Mamertines, but meerly by their own ambition, and inordinate deſire of ad-'ding this Noble Iſland to their Empire.

When this anſwer was returned, Appius having obſerved that ſo ſtrong a Navy guarding the paſſage he could not without manifeſt danger croſs over, plotted a very ſubtil and cunning device, he ſaid, He did by no means deſire that Hiero ſhould be alienated from the Romans, that the war was not decreed againſt him, neither could be proſecuted without the peoples command. At a day therefore appointed he commanded his Sea-men to be ready, having their ſhips prepared for the voyage as if he would ſail home. Now he was not ignorant that there were many both Carthaginian and Syracuſan ſouldiers in the Rhegian Port, under the pretence of being Merchants, by whom he thought this news would quickly be conveighed to thoſe who would have it true. And it hapned accordingly as he had foreſeen, for he no ſooner had entred into his ſhips on a clear Sun-ſhinie day, and ſailed along the Italian ſhore, but preſently news was carried to the Carthaginian fleet which guarded the ſeas, whereupon they now not fearing the enemy would make any attempt that way, left the paſſage open, ſailing themſelves likewiſe away whither it pleaſed them. The Conſul, who had forethought it would ſo come to paſſe, ſteared his courſe backward in the night time, and arrived in Sicily with his whole Navy, no body ſo much as obſerving, much leſſe hindring his coming. Frontinus ſtrategem 1.4 Zonaras

It was a bold Enterprize and full of hazard, for an army unskilful in ſea-affaires, in the night time, blindly to venture with rude and illbuilt ſhips through a ſea dangerous in it ſelf, though it had not been dark, nor any enemie to be feared: And the exploit was thought worthy to be made known to Poſterity, by a new Cognomen thereupon given to the Conſul. For, becauſe he made uſe of many veſſells, made of the Trunks of trees, for the tranſportation of his ſouldiers, he was, in admiration of the fact, by the ſimplicity of that age ſirnamed Caudex, which ſignifieth the trunk of a tree. For the Romans having no uſe of ſea affairs, had neither any covered ſhip or long boate, or good skiff in a buſineſſe of ſuch concernment as this was; but made uſe of thoſe Triremes which the Tarentines and Locrians had lent the Eleats and Neapolitans, together with little veſſels of Traffick of fifty Oars. But Appius landing not far from the place where the Syracuſans had pitched their Camp, Encouraged his ſouldiers and declaring to them, The Victory would be certain if they came upon the Enemy unawares, immediately proceeded to aſſault their Camp. Hiero being awakened with the ſudden tumult, marched out with what forces were ready; for a time the fight was very ſharp, the Roman horſemen were beaten back, but the Legions ſtoutly ſtanding to it, Hiero was overthrown, and with his men fearfully retreated into his works. Appius having commanded the dead bodies to be plunder'd, entred into Meſſana, freeing the Mamertines from great fear, and filling them with better hopes for hereafter. Hiero ſeeing himſelf beaten before he could ſee the enemy (as himſelf afterwards confeſſed) and ſuſpecting that the Carthaginians had betrayed the paſſage over the ſea, when he had revolved many things in his doubtful mind, began to be in fear of the main chance, and in the dead time of the next night he drew his army out of their Trenches, and marched directly without halting to Syracuſe. When he was gone, Appius thought fit to make uſe of the terror of his late Victory in vanquiſhing the Carthaginians alſo, and having ordered his ſouldiers to refreſh themſelves in time, marched out in the dawning of the day to aſſault the Carthaginian Camp, which was pitched in a very ſafe place, by nature and art diligently fenced, for on one ſide the ſea, on the other ſide deep Mariſhes and Bogs encompaſſed it in the form of a Peninſula: That narrow ſpace of ground where was paſſage to firm land was fenced with a ſtrong wall againſt all aſſaults. Here the Roman ſouldiers beginning the ſtorm, could not prevail againſt the ſtrength of the place and multitude of defendants, but being beaten back with darts and ſtones (as in the ſtorm of a City) they were forced to retire without having done their work. Zonaras *Polyb.*1.11 Seneca de Brev. vitæ c.13 *Polyb.*1.20 Zonaras Polybius 1.11 Zonaras Florus 2.2 Diodori Eclog. 22 *Polyb.*1.12 Zonaras Polybius. Zonaras

Many times it hapneth in war that ill ſucceſs in the beginning giveth occaſion of better fortune, while they who are worſted endeavour with better advice and more courage to make up their loſſe, and the enemy on the other ſide being bewitched with a flattering opinion of felicity, and taking no heed againſt future chances, are carried away with raſhneſſe, as at this time it came to paſſe to the Carthaginians, for they not being content to have repulſed the enemies, iſſued out of their Camp and purſued them as if they had fled, thinking the Romans had yielded not ſo much to the difficulty of the place, as to their virtue and courage.

When therefore they were come out of their works, the fortune of the fight changed with the place, and a great number of them were ſlaine, ſome fled into the Camp, others as they had convenience into the Cities round about; neither durſt they any more ſtir out of their Camp as long as Claudius was at Meſſana. The Conſul, conſidering the nature of the place and difficulty of its ſcituation, thought it no wiſdom to make a ſecond aſſault, and ſeeing his Polybius Zonaras.

time

time to be ſpent in vaine thereabouts; leaving a ſtrong Garriſon at Meſſana, Invaded the Territories of the Syracuſans and their Confederats; and having without oppoſition waſted the Grounds, he conceived ſuch Confidence, that he marched up with his army even to Syracuſe it ſelf: Where the Battel was very doubtful, and at one time the Conſul was in great danger, and had certainely been ſurrounded and taken, had he not ſuddenly bethought himſelf and ſent to Hiero, to treat on Conditions of peace. Hiero likewiſe ſent a friend of his to conſult about the buſineſſe, and the diſcourſe being on purpoſe drawn out in length, the Couſul had time to bring his men into a place of greater ſecurity: The Syracuſans likewiſe following the ſame example, had many treaties of peace with the Romans, and indeed an agreement had been made, but that Hiero was unwilling to be the author thereof. In theſe affaires the greater part of the year was ſpent; then the Conſul returned to Meſſana, where leaving ſome forces to protect the Mamertines, with the reſt of his men he croſſed over to Rhegium: From thence he went to Rome to his Triumph which he made, over the Carthaginians and Hiero King of Sicily, with great joy of the People, as being the firſt over a Forreign Nation. This was the firſt of the Romans deſignes by ſea, and ſuch was the ſucceſſe of their undertakings in Sicily. But theſe things and the actions of following times are much corrupted by the ambition of writers, the cheife whereof, Philinus Agrigentinus, and Fabius Pictor, the one ſtriving to advance the Carthaginians Glory, the other the Romans, they both neglect their duty, and the truth of Hiſtory: Whoſe Levity Polybius deſervedly reprehends. For if even in private cauſes it be held an accurſed Crime to circumvent any one by falſe Teſtimony; the author of an hiſtory is certainely to be eſteemed more fouly perfidious if he corrupt the acts of Princes and Commonwealths with falſhood: He ought to value truth more then any earthly Commodity or his own life, and the leſſe deſerveth pardon in that he cannot alledge ſo much as any faire pretence for his Lyes, for if he durſt not for ſome cauſes freely ſpeak all he knew, he might certainely without danger have held his Tougue. While Claudius in Sicily vanquiſheth Hiero and the Carthaginians, M. Fulvius the other Conſul bringeth the Volſinian ſiege to an Iſſue, having to deale with men who by deſpair were hardned and made valiant againſt all violence, he at length tameth them by famine. Upon delivery of the City, he did with exquiſite torments put to death that unthankful and inſolent crew of Libertines; the City it ſelf he demoliſhed, the other Volſinians who had not put off the faith of ſervants, and reverence toward their maſters, he diſtributed into ſeveral ſeats round about.

This war was likewiſe thought worthy of a Triumph, which the Conſul made in the Calends of November, as over the Volſinians. While the ſame Conſuls were in office a Luſtration was performed by the Cenſors, Cn. Cornelius and C. Marcius, and there were regiſtred the names of two hundred ninety two thouſand, two hundred twenty and four Citizens; a very great and almoſt incredible number to one who ſhall conſider how many were loſt in the wars, which hardly ever ceaſed ſince the foundation of the City; and how many were alſo ſwallowed up by the Peſtilence and Malignant diſeaſes as raging as the war it ſelf. But indeed the Commonwealth was made invincible and not to be overcome by any calamity or ſlaughter whatſoever, by the wiſe advice of Romulus (which was conſtantly obſerved by poſterity) in daily admitting new people into their City, inſomuch that neither all the loſſes received by Pyrrhus, nor their many ſhipwracks in the firſt Punick war, nor the fights of Thraſimene and Canne in the ſecond, were able ſo much to afflict it, but that ſtill ſhe did riſe more chearfull, free and valiant out of all her troubles.

But in Greece the Lacedæmonians who were alſo very famous for their Diſcipline and Valour in war, not any whit inferior to the Romans, becauſe they forbade ſtrangers to coinhabit with them, were not long able to uphold their Dominion, nor long after to maintain their Freedom; when in the Leuctrian battel they loſt not much more then a thouſand men, their Empire preſently fell to the ground; and at Sellaſia with the loſſe of not quite ſix thouſand, their Liberty was taken away. But the Achæans, inhabitants of the ſame Peloponneſus, admitting freely any neighbours into equal priviledges with themſelves, did conſtitute a very fair and flouriſhing Commonwealth, and likely to have continued, had not ſome few of them, to their own and their Countries deſtruction, madly provoked the Romans, whoſe power then was grown formidable to all people. Such divers events are neceſſarily conſequent to divers inſtitutions: For as in nature it is agreeable, that thoſe bodyes who are to a competent meaſure daily refreſhed with wholſome food, ſhould be ſtronger and longer lived then thoſe who content with their own natural ingenite moiſture deſpiſe all nouriſhment from without: ſo it ſtands to reaſon, that thoſe Cities ſhould better flouriſh, who admit into themſelves and make their own what in any other place they find to be excellent, then thoſe, who by a fooliſh arrogance, deſpiſing whatſoever groweth not in their own ſoil, deprive themſelves of many good aſſiſtants in obtaining and preſerving their power and ſoveraignty.

This year gave a beginning to a cruel cuſtom, which afterward was frequently and moſt intemperately uſurped, That the blood of man ſhould become a publick ſpectacle of pleaſure, being profuſely ſhed for the ſake of any mean and wanton ſpectator. The authors of this barbarous cuſtome were M. and D. Junius Brutus, who by a ſtrange kind of piety, intending to honour the Aſhes of their dead father, did with great favour of the Citizens exhibit a Fencing-Shew. But this injury to mankind was moſt ſeverely revenged by a Peſtilence, which all this and

and the next year did furiouſly rage. Concerning which when they had conſulted the books of the Sybills, 'twas found the anger of the gods was the cauſe thereof. There ariſing therefore a ſuſpition that their Religious affairs were not rightly handled, the Prieſts by diligent obſervation and inquiſition, found that many Chappels and Temples were converted into the uſe of private men, and that Capparonia, a Veſtal Nun, was guilty of Inceſt; ſhe prevented her doom by hanging her ſelf, but he who had corrupted her, together with thoſe ſervants who were privy to the fact, were executed according to Law. The holy places were redeemed out of private hands to their wonted uſe. So having cleared the City in matters of Religion, the Fathers applied their minds again to the care of the Commonwealth; and becauſe Etruria being appeaſed, there was no commotion in Italy, they ordered both the new Conſuls to be ſent into Sicily with their Legions: the Conſuls were M. Valerius Maximus the eldeſt ſon of Marcus, who in the time of his office was called Meſſalla, and M. Octacilius Craſſus, C.F. M.N. Theſe having ſafely tranſported their forces were attended with the ſame good fortune. For when after their taking the City of the Adranites by ſtorm they had laid ſiege unto Centuripæ, there came Embaſſadors to them from the Alæſines, offering to deliver up their town.

Thence the Conſuls, marching through ſeveral parts of the Iſland, ſometimes with their forces joyned, ſometimes aſunder, as they ſaw cauſe, overcoming both Carthaginian and Syracuſan, as often as they durſt ſtand to the hazard of a Battel, ſpread their fame and Terrour round about: And ſuch was their happineſſe in following their fortune, and ſo great their force, that in a while after their were reckoned ſixty ſeven Cities which had committed themſelves to their Protection, in which number were the Tauromenitans and the Catanæans: Out of which Cities the Conſuls leavying what Auxiliaries they pleaſed. did daily increaſe in ſtrength, and, pitching the Camp neere unto Syracuſe it ſelf, conſulted about the ſiege of it. Which thing Hiero maturely conſidering, when he began to diſtruſt in his own and the Carthaginian Forces, and withal thought the Romans were beſt to be truſted, he reſolved to enter into League with the Romans; and in order thereunto ſent Embaſſadours to the Conſuls to treate of Peace. Neither were the Romans at all averſe from making freindſhip with Hiero to ſeparate him from the Carthaginians, eſpecially becauſe thereby they might more eaſily ſupply their Legions with Corne for food. For the Carthaginians having command of the ſeas, they could not have Proviſion from Italy, by which incommodity the former Conſul reaped more trouble then from the enemy. But, when Hiero was once united to them, the Kingdome of Syracuſe being very fruitful, would plentifully afford them all Neceſſaries. The Peace therefore was concluded on theſe Articles, That what places or priſoners Hiero had taken from the Romans or their aſſociates he ſhould reſtore without ranſome, and likewiſe pay an hundred Talents of ſilver; that he ſhould without moleſtation raigne over Syracuſe and all Cities under the Syracuſans Juriſdiction; the chief whereof were Acræ, Leontium, Megara, Elorus, Netini, Tauromenium. The Embaſſadours being thence ſent to Rome, the ſame Conditions were there confirmed, and the Senate decreed that Peace ſhould be maintained with that King, and after a few dayes Cn. Atilius Calatinus propounding it to the people, they likewiſe aſſented. This League, being made for fifteen years, was perpetually kept enviolable: Hiero bearing ſuch Reſpect to the Roman Greatneſſe and they ſo bountifully requiting his good affection, that neither of them had cauſe to repent of their friendſhip. Hannibal the Carthaginian, being come as far as Xiphonia with his ſea forces, to raiſe the ſiege of Syracuſe, having intelligence of the Peace, returned with greater haſt then he came. The Romans being now ſtrengthned by Hiero their aſſociate and fellow ſouldier, made no delay, but quickly reduced many Cities from the Carthaginian Juriſdiction. From Adranon, a fenced village, and Macella, after many dayes ſiege they returned without effecting their Purpoſe: But the Segeſtans they received into protection, when they had ſlaine the Carthaginian Garriſon and voluntarily revolted to them: Among other Conſiderations, they ſaid they Loved the Romans for Kindred ſake, deriving their Pedigree from Æneas after his flight from Troy. And not long after the Alienæans came into the Romans; But at Hilarus, Territus and Aſcelus they were faine to uſe force and Engines, and therefore dealt the more ſeverely with the vanquiſhed party. Whereupon the Tyndaritans, being terrified, ſeeing themſelves next to danger, and help far from them, Entred into Conſultation about yielding themſelves to the Romans, but were prevented by the Carthaginians; for they, ſuſpecting what was in hand, ſent away the cheiſe of the Citie as Hoſtages to Lilybæum, and took in good ſtore of Corne and wine and other proviſions. About this time the ſeverity of Octacilius Craſſus the Conſul was of much advantage to the Roman Diſcipline, for thoſe ſouldiers who being taken by Hannibal, had baſely, for ſafeguard of their lives, ſubmitted themſelves to bondage, he cauſed to continue without the Camp to receive the firſt charge from the enemy, that ſo, having no fence but their own courage, they might be the more valiant, truſting only in their own courage, and not to any ſecurity of the place they ſtood in.

After theſe and other exploits of no greater moment, winter now approaching, the Conſuls diſpoſing ſeveral Garriſons in convenient places, returned into Italy and ſo to Rome with the reſidue of their Armies. There was a Triumph decreed to M. Valerius (whoſe ſucceſſe and pains had been moſt remarkable) over the Carthaginians and Hiero, which was performed the ſixteenth of the Calends of April. Among the ſpoils was brought a Clock, which is therefore taken notice of, becauſe it was the firſt which was ſeen at Rome; it was taken at Catina, and by

This Valerius had his Sirname Meſſalla from Meſſana; but I wonder that ſome Authors of no ſmall note ſhould imagine it was derived from his taking that City, whereas the ſeries of affairs doth evidently demonſtrate, that it rather proceeded from his delivering that City from the troubles it ſuſtained (after Appius Claudius his departure) from the Carthaginians and Hiero, removing the one enemy and reconciling the other.

Varro apud Macrobium Saturn

In the mean while the Peſtilence ſtill rageing, a Dictator was named for the knocking in of a Nail, who was Cn. Fulvius, Cn.F. Cn.N. Maximus Centumalus, he choſe for Maſter of the Horſe Q. Marcius. Q.F. Q.N. Philippus. In the ſame year the Æſernian Colony was planted, whereas the year before one was deduced to Firmum, or as ſome will have it to Caſtrum. After this L. Poſthumius, L.F. L.N. Megellus, and Q. Mamilius, Q.F. M.N. Vitulus were created Conſuls, and both of them had Sicily allotted for their Province: There were but two Legions allowed them, which were thought ſufficient, becauſe now having Amity with Hiero the war was more eaſie; they conſidered likewiſe that proviſions would be the better procured if the Army were but ſmall. The Conſuls having tranſported their forces into Sicily, and being joyned with their aſſociates, paſſing by things of leſſer moment, thought fit with their whole ſtrength to beſiege Agrigentum, which City the Carthaginians had plentifully furniſhed with all manner of accommodations, intending it for the Magazine of their wars. For they ſeeing Hiero had forſaken them, and that the Romans made Sicily their chiefeſt care, they thought it behooved them to make the more diligent preparation for the war. In the firſt place therefore they ſent the greater part of their forces into Sardinia, to lie in wait againſt the Italian ſhore, by that means to divert the Romans from Sicily, or at leaſt to compel them to ſend the ſmaller forces then otherwiſe they would have done.

Zonaras

But being fruſtrated of their hopes (for the Romans had ſtrength ſufficient, both wherewith to guard their own Coaſts, and invade Sicily with a new army) they hired many Mercenary ſouldiers of the Ligurians and Gauls, but more out of Spaine, whom, together with great plenty of proviſions, they ſent to Agrigentum; reſolving to make that their Magazine of Corne, and the Receptacle of their Armies; being, by reaſon of its conveniency of ſcituation, and multitude of buildings, fitter for ſuch occaſions then any other Citie of Sicilie of their Juriſdiction. The onely ſeat of War therefore being about that Citie, the Romans, having confined the Carthaginians within their works, pitched their Camp within a mile thereof. The grain was then ripe in the fields, and becauſe they foreſaw the ſiege would prove long, the ſouldiers ſent out to reape and bring in Corne, wandred ſomewhat too far and more careleſsly then ought to have been done having an enemy ſo near. The Carthaginians omitted not to make uſe of this occaſion, and had indeed given a great overthrow to the Romans, but that they regained as much by their courage, as they had loſt by their negligence. For, when they who were ſent out to forrage were not able to reſiſt the aſſault of the Enemy, the Carthaginians purſued them even to the Camp, where deviding their forces, ſome prepared to ſtorme the workes, while the others maintained the fight with the guards without. Then, as often at other times, the Laws of warfare duely obſerved and the incorrupted Rigour of the Roman Diſcipline ſaved them from an hazard tending to the deſtruction of their whole army. For (it being a deadly crime among the Romans for any cauſe whatſoever to forſake their ſtation) the guard without, knowing it was to no pupoſe to fly back, though they were much overpowred in number, maintained the fight with wonderful courage, loſing many of their own men, but killing more of the enemies, till the Troupes had time to arme themſelves and come to their Relief, ſo the Enemie being there repulſed, and thoſe who had now almoſt entred the workes ſurrounded, the Romans made a very great ſlaughter of them, and purſued the reſt even to the Citie. This accident made both the Enemie more fearful of Iſſuing out, and the Romans more wary in their Forrage. Henceforth the heat of their Contention being not ſo great as before, (for the Carthaginians ſeldom made a ſally, and then only in manner pickeering and light skirmiſh) the Romans thought fit to divide their forces, and plant their Camps on two ſides of the Citie, on the one ſide near to Æſculapius his Temple, on the other in the high way leading to Heraclea. Their Camps were fenced with Trenches on both ſides, toward the Citie, againſt their Sallies, and toward the Country both to ſecure themſelves from any invaſion, and to hinder Relief from entering the Citie. The ſpace between the two Camps was guarded with many companyes of ſouldiers.

Polybius

In all theſe affaires they were much aſſiſted by the Sicilans, who lately had made friendſhip with them, of whom together with the Romans there were an hundred thouſand; They brought proviſions as far as Erbeſſus, from whence (it being not far off) the Romans fetched it into their Campe. Whereby they had very great plenty of all Neceſſaries. At this ſtay the ſiege continued for almoſt five moneths, neither much prevailing over the other (for they attempted nothing but light skirmiſhes) till at length the Carthaginians began to have the worſt on't. For a great number of men, little leſſe then fifty thouſand warriers, having been ſo long ſhut up in one town, had ſpent almoſt all their corn, and ſaw no likelyhood of procuring more, the Romans guarding all the paſſages; ſo that they were much afflicted both with their preſent miſery, ſerie, and expectation of future. Therefore Hannibal the ſon of Geſco (who was Commander in chief at Agrigentum) by many meſſengers craving relief againſt hunger and other dangers, Hanno the elder was ſent into Sicily with ſome Elephants and Souldiers which were for that purpoſe raiſed. His Army conſiſted of fifty thouſand foot, ſix thouſand horſe, and threeſcore Elephants, with which forces he ſailed to Lilybæum, thence he marched to Heraclea, whither forthwith came meſſengers promiſing to deliver up Erbeſſus to him: Being by their means made maſter of Erbeſſus (from whence the Romans hitherto had all their proviſions) he ſeemed to have effected a buſineſſe of great moment, as much afflicting the Romans now for want of neceſſaries as they had done the Agrigentines. Polybius Diodori Eclog. b. 23 Polybius

Zonaras

And now the Romans began to conſult about raiſing the ſiege, which they were very near giving over for a deſperate buſineſs, had not the King of Syracuſe, by trying all wayes, made a ſhift by ſtealth to convey to them ſome corn and other commodities, whereby their preſent want was in ſome meaſure relieved. Hanno conſidering the Romans now to be faint with hunger and other infirmities following it, whereas his own men were well and luſty and in perfect ſtrength, approached near the Romans, reſolving, if occaſion were offered, to fight them. Marching therefore with his fifty Elephants, and whole army from Heraclea, he ſends his Numidian horſmen before to play about the enemies Camp, to provoke the Roman horſmen, and, if poſſible, to draw them out into ambuſh. The Numidians according to order careleſſely flying about the Conſul's Camp, the Romans iſſue out, beat back thoſe who oppoſed, and purſued them as they fled out of order, that way which they knew Hanno to be coming. The further they followed the purſuit, the more difficult was their return to their own works, inſomuch that many of them were loſt after they had met with freſh forces, which cauſed thoſe who fled likewiſe to turn and fight. Hanno being by this much encouraged with hopes of the main Victory, placeth himſelf upon an hill called Torus, about a mile and a half diſtance from the Roman Camp; nevertheleſſe the battel was deferred longer then was expected between two Armies ſo near one the other; ſometimes the Carthaginian, ſometimes the Roman unwilling to hazard their whole fortune in one battel; while Hanno was deſirous to fight, the Romans contained themſelves within their Trenches, becauſe they were exceeded by the enemy both in number and chearfulneſſe, being themſelves terrified and dejected with the loſſe their horſemen had ſuſtained. Zonaras

But when they, (ſeeing their aſſociates troubled and daunted at this their fear, the Enemy on the contrary grow more confident, and thinking it better to fight with the Carthaginians then endure ſuch want) were reſolved upon the Battel, then Hanno began to fear, and decline the encounter. Two months were thus ſpent; nothing of greater moment being performed, but light skirmiſhes which happened every day. At length, being moved with frequent entreaties from Hannibal, who had daily ſent out Meſſengers, and by lighted fires given him often notice, That the beſieged were no longer able to endure hunger, and that many were thereby compelled to flee to the enemy; Hanno was reſolved no longer to defer the battel, giving order to Hannibal at the ſame time to iſſue out of the City. The Conſuls having intelligence hereof, kept themſelves very quietly within their Camps; Hanno the more furiouſly preſents himſelf in Battel-array, marcheth up to their very Works, boldly provokes them to fight, reproaching them with fear and cowardize. They on the contrary being content to repulſe the enemy from their Trenches, neither ranged battel againſt them while they ſtood, nor purſued them when they retreated. When things had been thus tranſacted for ſome dayes together, and the Carthaginians were fully perſwaded the Romans durſt not venture on any further action, L. Poſthumius the Conſul wiſely made uſe of the enemies ſecurity and contempt to his own good. For ſilently ordering his whole battel within the works, when the Carthaginians according to their cuſtome came up to the works, he iſſued out with a few and held them in action with light skirmiſhes from day break till noon, then the enemy withdrawing themſelves, he brought forth his Legions and made a charge upon them. Polybius Zonaras Frontinus Strat. 2.1

Hanno, though he ſaw a neceſſity of fighting contrary to his expectation, ſtoutly entring into battel, maintained it doubtful till the day was almoſt ſpent. But the Romans, having on purpoſe well refreſhed their bodies and prepared them to fight, were not ſo much troubled with heat, thirſt and Labour as were the Carthaginians, who, before the battel, being weary with faſting and ſtanding all day, the longer they fought, were the leſſe able to reſiſt by reaſon of the weakneſſe of their Bodys. At length the Mercenary ſouldiers who ſtood in the front were no longer able to endure the brunt, and did not only give back themſelves, but falling in diſorderly upon the Elephants and other Regiments behind, routed the whole battel and cauſed them to fly before the enemy who ſo hotly charged them. Things were managed with the ſame ſucceſſe in the other place, for Hannibal, iſſuing out to fight, was beaten back with the greater loſſe, and forced into the City again. The Carthaginian Camp was taken, three Elephants wounded, thirty ſlain, eleven came alive into the Romans hands: The men had the ſame fortune, for of ſo great an Army very few eſcaped with their General to Heraclea; they who were ſhut up in the City, ſeeing no way or means of ſafety left them, were afflicted with very great terror and deſpair: When Hannibal following the beſt counſel his ill fortune had left him, obſerving that the Romans, what with wearineſſe of their late fight, and joy of their Victory, kept not their guards ſo ſtrickt as heretofore, about the third watch of the night went out of the Town with his Mercenaries, and having croſſed the Trenches filled up with boats ſtuffed with Zonaras Diodori Eclog. b. 23 Oroſius 4. 7 Polybius. Zonaras Polybius ſtraw (which he had beforehand prepared for this purpoſe) he was a good way on his journey before the Romans, at break of day perceiving what was in hand, ſurpriſed part of the hindmoſt Troops; Hannibal with the reſt betook himſelf into places of ſecurity. The Agrigentines ſeeing themſelves forſaken by the Carthaginians, either out of anger, or to curry favour with the Conqueror, ſlew many of thoſe who remained in the City. The Town was not therefore ſaved from deſtruction, above five and twenty thouſand Free-men were ſold into ſlavery.

In this manner was Agrigentum taken, in the ſeventh moneth after it had been firſt beſieged, to the great profit and glory of the Romans, but with the expence of much blood, for of the Conſul's Army and his Auxiliaries, there periſhed by ſeveral means above thirty thouſand during this ſiege; for which cauſe, and by reaſon winter now approaching, nothing of moment could be undertaken, they returned to Meſſana. Theſe Commanders going to Rome in hope of Triumph the next year L. Valerius, M.F. M.N. Flaccus, and T. Otacilius, C.F. M.N. Craſſus being made Conſuls went into Sicily. The Carthaginians in the mean time made no reſiſtance, for beſides their late ill ſucceſſe they were vexed with the ſedition of their Mercenaries, the Gauls being chief in the Mutiny for want of many moneths pay; for the puniſhment of whom, Hanno deviſed this ſtratagem, firſt ſoothing them with fair ſpeeches he deſires them, At preſent for a while to be quiet, telling them, He was in certain hopes of ſuddenly ſurpriſing a very rich Town, by the plunder whereof the Gauls ſhould be ſufficiently ſatisfied, both for their pay, as alſo for the forbearance of it. Having by this means at preſent appeaſed them, and moreover received thanks, he takes a convenient time to treat with his Treaſurer, (who was moſt faithful to him) That he would, as a Runegado, flie over to Otacilius the Conſul, under pretence of having perverted his Accounts, and inform him, That next night he might circumvent four thouſand Gauls, who would come to Entellia to take it with the help of ſome Traitors within.

The Conſul though he gave not much Credit to a Runegado, yet thinking it a buſineſſe not to be neglected, did ſend a Choice Brigade of ſouldiers upon the deſign; the Gaules came accordingly as they had been deceived by Hanno, and the Romans ſuddenly ariſing out of ambuſh to receive them, there was between them a very fierce and cruel fight, wherein every one of the Gaules were ſlain, and becauſe they died not unrevenged, Hanno was doubly pleaſed, both that he was rid of his inſolent Mutineers, and that he had cunningly puniſhed them to the no little loſs of the enemy. At Rome, in the mean time, Minucius the Prætor propounded in the Senate, the bringing of the water of the River Anien to the Citie; which work M. Curius the Cenſour had deſigned out of the enemies ſpoiles, but ſeveral impediments ariſing, the buſineſs for nine years deferred, was now again conſulted about: and two men appointed as ſupervisours, Curius and Fulvius Flaccus; but Curius dying within five dayes, the Glory of finiſhing the work was attributed to Fulvius alone. About the ſame time Hamilcar came from Carthage into Sicilie as ſucceſſour to Hanno. For the Carthaginians, when Hanno returned after his overthrow, received him with Ignominy, fined him in his ſix thouſand pieces of Gold and removed him from his Government. Some Authors being deceived by the likeneſs of Names, have delivered, that this Amilcar was Father of Hannibal who managed the ſecond Punick War againſt the Romans; but not rightly, for Hamilcar the Father of Hannibal came into Sicilie with command, being but a young man, at the latter end of this War, but his great fame prevailed, that the acts of another leſſe known Amilcar were aſcribed to Amilcar Barcas the moſt Noble and Egregious of that Name. Hamilcar therefore the ſucceſſour of Hanno ſeeing the Romans far ſtronger then himſelf in their land army, durſt not aſſault any In-Land Cities, nor deſcend out of the Mountaines and difficult places into the Campagne: but having a ſtrong Navy whereby he was doubtleſs Maſter of the ſeas, made diligent uſe of thoſe his Forces, and, having ſent Hannibal againe to plunder the Coaſts of Italy, himſelf ſailing about the Sicilian ſhore, eaſily recovered many Port Townes which had joyned themſelves with the Romans. Whereby it came to paſſe, that the Romans eaſily taking and defending the In-land places, the Carthaginians the Maritime, the Feare and hopes were on both ſides very equal, and it was hard to Judge to which of theſe two Nations the Victory of the whole War would eneſine.

BOOK VII.

FOUR years were now expired ſince the Carthaginian war began, neither had the Romans any cauſe to complain either of their own courage or fortune; for they were Victors in every battel, both over Carthaginians and Syracuſans as often as they durſt encounter: They had taken many rich Cities by ſtorm, and others upon Articles ſubmitted themſelves; but as long as they waged war in an Iſland, they could not at their pleaſure ſend proviſion and recruits when need required. And the Carthaginian ſhips with free and unexpected arrival being themſelves ſecure, did not only moleſt and vex the Sicilian Cities upon the ſhore, but likewiſe waſted the coaſts of Italy, both to the loſſe of the Roman Empire, and likewiſe to their diſgrace; whereas the Affrican ſhore was clear and free from the enemies invaſion. The Senate therefore and people of Rome diligently conſulting upon the matter, did reſolve to prepare a Fleet, and fight the Carthaginians not only by land, as hitherto they had done, but to try their fortune at ſea alſo. This was the very firſt ſerious thought the Romans had concerning ſea affairs, which they accompliſhed with as much Courage and good Fortune, as they had conceived it with Wiſdom and Reſolution: Inſomuch as the Empire of the whole world might well be judged due to the Romans, who being willing by ſea to encounter a people moſt skilful in ſea affairs, wanted neither Boldneſſe to attempt it, nor Diligence to manage it, nor Conſtancy effectually to perform it. For the Romans to that day being ſo utterly ignorant of ſea affairs, that there was not a man amongſt them who ever had ſeen one, neither had any one Man of War of their own, or any Carpenter who knew how to build one, yet having with great confidence undertaken the deſign, they did in a very ſhort time both learn to ſail and venture to fight and overcame thoſe people who for many ages had had experience in ſea affairs. Polybius.

The care of building the ſhips was committed to Cn. Cornelius L. F. Cn. N. Scipio Aſina, and C. Duilius, who had newly entred the Conſulſhip. They had one Carthaginian ſhip of five Oars, which Claudius took with his foot army (at what time he was ſtudying to paſſe over into Sicily) while in heat of fight it came too near the ſhore and was grounded upon the ſands in a ſhallow place. The Conſuls ordered the whole Navy to be built after that Patterne, and ſo diligently proſecuted the work, that in threeſcore days after the timber was felled, they had threeſcore ſhips ſtanding at Anchor. But the Conſuls haſtned their expedition no leſs by their wit, then by their Induſtry, For, (being neither willing to hazard to fight with men unskilful at the oar, nor yet to ſtreighten the time allotted them for action in training up and exercifing men on purpoſe) they contrived a device, which though it may at firſt ſhew ſeem ridiculous, yet in the uſe and event proved exceeding Commendable, That, while the ſhips were in building, their Men ſhould ſit on ſhore and there be taught their office how to Rowe. For being placed in the ſame order as they were to obſerve in the ſhips, and a Boatſwaine being ſet in the midſt of them, they were commanded, at his word given, to move their Oars, and again to forbear, even as if they were ſailing. Oroſius. 437 Auct. de viris Illuſ. c. 37 Plinie 16.39 Florus 2.2

By this exerciſing themſelves in fancy onely they were ſo improved, that when the ſhips were ready, after a few daies real paines-taking, the Conſuls were willing to truſt themſelves and

and the ſafety of all their Legions to their care. When lots were caſt for the Provinces, the Land Army fell to C. Duilius, the Fleet to Cn. Cornelius; who, taking along with him ſeventeen ſhips, ſailed before hand to Meſſana, to make preparation for the coming of the Fleet, which he ordered ſuddenly to follow him: but before it came, he fell into the hands of the Enemy, which came to paſſe by the cuuning of Boodes, Hanniball's Vice-Admirall, and his own Credulity, giving credit to ſome Liparæans, who were ſuborned by the Enemy, to put him in hopes of taking the City of Lipara by Treachery. There being circumvented by the Carthaginian ſhips, he nevertheleſs reſolved to encounter them, and ſeek his ſafety by fighting: but that Boodes by another fraud, trained him and his Colonells into his own ſhip, under pretence of Treating on Conditions of Peace. They were no ſooner come but clapt up in chaines, the others being hereby terrified did without blowes yield themſelves up; Boodes gaining all the Veſſels, ſent the Priſoners to Carthage. Soon after the Carthaginian Commander committed the like fault to his greater ſhame, in that the freſh example of the Conſul's incogitancy did not learn him to be more circumſpect. He had underſtood that the Roman Navy ſailing by the Italian ſhore, was putting forth to ſea, and that they could not now be farre off. Deſiring therefore, as neer as might be, to obſerve it, that he might accurately know the number of their ſhips, their ſwiftneſs, and in what faſhion and plight their new made Veſſels were in, he ſailed forward with fifty ſhips, not foreſeeing any danger, his ſhips being confuſedly mixed without any order, as when they ride in Harbour or any ſafe place: At the turning therefore of a certain Promontory, ſuddenly falling into the Roman Fleet, which came prepared and ſailing in good order; he was vanquiſhed before he could prepare himſelf to fight, and having loſt the greater part of his Navy, himſelf likewiſe being in great Danger, he very hardly eſcaped with the reſt. The Victorious Navy, underſtanding Cornelius his miſhap, ſent Meſſengers to C. Duilius to give him notice of their approach, and prepared themſelves for fight, having intelligence that the other Carthaginian ſhips were not farre off. There while they deligently conſidered the inconvenience of their own Veſſells, that they were rudely made, and farre inferiour to the Carthaginians in ſwiftneſs, it came into the mind of a certain ingenuous man to invent an Engine, whereby to lay hold and keep faſt the Enemies ſhips; which Engine they afterward called a Raven, or Crow; the faſhion of it was this, There was a ſtraight round piece of Timber, four ulnes long, ſome nine inches Diameter, having at the end thereof a pully or windlaſe, to which, being fixed on the foredeck, there was fitted a bridge, ſix ulnes broad, and four feet long, made of plankes faſtned together with iron nails. In this Engine there was left a long hole whereby it might be fitted to the piece of Timber, by the ſpace of four ulnes, even the whole length of the Timber. The other part of the bridge or ladder, which was not inſerted in the Timber, being of two ulnes long, was ſo faſtned by hinges, that it might be pulled up, or let fall; to the end of the bridge was affixed a ſtrong ſharp piece of iron, with a ring at it's head, whereto a rope being tied, through the pully of the timber, it might be drawn down into the Foredecke; Then as they lifted, by the Rope they could draw it up, or let it fall down, with its ſharp piece of iron laying hold on and keeping faſt whatſoever it fell upon. In the mean time the Conſull C. Duilius, committing his foot Army to the Charge of his Colonells, came to the Navy, and underſtanding that the Enemies ſpoiled the Region of Mylaites, ſailed with his whole fleet to that ſhore.

The Carthaginians were glad of this, aſſuredly promiſing themſelves victory over Inland-men, altogether unskilfull in ſea affaires; whereby they became an example, That no Enemy whatſoever ought ſo to be deſpiſed, as to cauſe one to remit ordinary diſcipline, and grow ſecure. Hanniball the Admirall, who had conveighed his Forces out of Agrigentum, was in a Veſſell of ſeven oares on a ſide, which formerly belonged to King Pyrrhus, the other ſhips followed him: not as to a fight, in any diſtinct order, but, as every one thought fit, making haſt to their deſpicable Enemy. But, when approaching neerer, they ſaw the Engines hanging at the foredecks of the Roman ſhips, wondring at the novelty of the buſineſs, they pauſed a while; at length the moſt Couragious men laughing at the rude invention of an unskilfull Enemy, the foremoſt ſhips with all the violence that might be flew upon them. Then the Crows being let down, into what ſhips ſoever they light, ſo pierced the planks thereof that they held them faſt againſt their wills; The Roman ſouldiers, if the ſhips were faſtned ſide to ſide, did on every part leap in and aſſault the Enemy; if they were joyned onely in the foredecks, they went two by two over the bridge annexed to the timber, with ſo much the more facility, becauſe on each ſide of the bridge a little fence knee high, made their paſſage ſafer, and their footing more ſecure: They who went foremoſt, holding their bucklers before, defended their faces from the Enemies darts, thoſe who followed held their ſhields down to the little fence, ſo guarding their ſides, and entring the Enemies ſhips; ſo that the fight was not performed with the Beakes of ſhips, but with ſwords and hands, like to a ſet Battell; The Romans therefore excelling in ſtrength and Courage, had an eaſy victory over men lightly armed, and truſting more in the nimbleneſs of their ſhips, then in their hands; They quickly forced thirty Carthaginian ſhips, among which the Admiralls frigot was taken, but Hanniball leaping out of his ſhip, when it was now taken, into a Cock-boat eſcaped Captivity, and ſending a truſty friend in poſt-haſte to Carthage, to prevent the News of his Overthrow, did thereby cunningly decline that Capitall puniſhment which otherwiſe had attended him. His friend entring the Senate, as if all things had been well, well, asked their Advice, whether they thought it fit that the Roman Navy ſhould be fought withall? and every one unanimouſly agreeing, That there was no ſcruple to be made, and that the buſineſs ſhould not be deferred; he told them, 'Tis already done, and we are beaten; whereupon, no body daring to accuſe the Fact, whereof every one in his own Perſon would have been Author, Hannibal eſcaped the ſentence of Death, but was deprived of his Admirallſhip. The reſt of the Carthaginian ſhips, (for the greater part was left) after the Flight of the Admirall, were very much troubled and doubtful in Counſell what to do; they were aſhamed to fly having received no harm, the Enemy not ſo much as preſſing upon them; on the other ſide to ſet upon the Roman ſhips they were afraid, by reaſon of their Engines; At length ſailing round about, and finding on every ſide the foredecks of the ſhips oppoſed againſt them, with thoſe formidable Engines, having uſed all the art they could, they deſpairing of the victory went their way. Zonaras Auctor de viris Illuſ. 138. Zonaras

'Tis reported that fourteen Carthaginian ſhips were ſunk in that fight, one and thirty taken, with ſeven thouſand men, three thouſand having been ſlain. With this ſucceſs did C. Duilius fight with the Carthaginians neer the Liparæan Ilands, where the Romans got much prey, but much more ample Glory and Renoun. The Conſull taking charge again of his Land Army, Marched to Segeſta, and delivered it from danger, it having been brought even to the utmoſt extremity by the Carthaginians; after that he took Macella by ſtorme, Hamilcar never daring to encounter with him: and ſo having confirmed the mindes of the Aſſociate Cities, Summer being paſt, he returned to Rome: After his departure the Carthaginian affaires began again to proſper. For firſt the Romans after ſeven moneths continuance were fain to raiſe their ſiege of Mutiſtratus, having loſt many men before it. When afterward a Diſſenſion aroſe between the Romans and their Auxiliaries, and that the Aſſociates encamped themſelves apart between Paropus and Thermæ: Hamilcar thought fit to make uſe of this their madneſs, and falling on them unawares ſlew four thouſand of them: and it wanted little but that the whole Roman Army had likewiſe been involved in the ſame overthrow. Eutropius b. 2. Oroſius. 4. 7. Florus 2. 2. Zonaras. Polybius. *Dioder. Then again many Townes were taken by Hannibal, ſome by force, ſome by Treachery: which though it was no good newes at Rome, yet the loſs was counted ſmall in reſpect of their Navall Victory. For the Roman courage having already approved it ſelf invincible by Land, they had great cauſe to rejoyce, that by this Fight they had gained reputation of ſtrength by ſea alſo. Whereupon wonderfully encouraging themſelves as to the whole Warre, they judged the Author of this their New Glory worthy alſo of new Honour; Duilius therefore was the Firſt who ever made a Navall Triumph, which was on the Intercalary Calends over the Sicilians and the Carthaginian Navy. They likewiſe bore with him, when, not content with this Honour, he did without all precedent aſſume another to himſelfe, that returning from ſupper, a light Torch was carried before him while the Minſtrells Sang; A Beaked Pillar likewiſe was by decree of the Senate erected in the Market-place, of white Parian Marble, which is yet to be ſeen (but many of the Letters worn out with Age) conteining the Number of ſhips taken and drowned, the Summ and Weight of the Money taken. There were taken of Gold three thouſand ſeven hundred pieces, of ſilver above an hundred thouſand, of heavy Braſs ſeven ſcore hundred thouſand pounds. The Triumph being accompliſhed, Duilius called an Aſſembly, wherein L. Cornelius, L. ſo. Cn. N. Scipio and C. Aquilius M. F. C. N. were choſen Conſulls. The Senate ordered their Provinces to be Sicily, and the Navy. The Admirall had permiſſion, if he thought it for the Publick good, to touch upon Sardinia and Corſica. This Charge happening to L. Cornelius, having prepared his ſhips he failed away. Eutropius b. 2. Tacius 2. 49. Colum. Triumph Cicero Cato c. 13. *Livie. This was the firſt Roman expedition into Sardinia and Corſica; the Iſlands are ſo near adjoyning that they ſeem but one and the ſame, yet much unlike, as in the temper of the Air and Soil, ſo in the Diſpoſitions of the inhabitants. Sardinia as bearing the ſhape of a mans footing, was by the Ancients called Ichnuſa and Sandaliotis, afterwards 'tis ſaid, That Sardus the ſon of Hercules of Lybia much frequenting the Iſland, gave it the name it is now known by. Old Fables affirm that the Grecians came into thoſe places with Ariſtæus, and after the Trojan war the Trojans. For extent of ground and fruitfulneſs of ſoil, it yieldeth not much to the biggeſt and beſt Iſlands of thoſe ſeas. It breeds excellent cattel, very fruitful it is of the beſt Corn, rich in Metals, eſpecially Silver. But the air is not ſo wholſome, inſomuch as foreign Nations commended not ſo much its Fertility as they diſpraiſed its Peſtilent air; for in Summer it is ſickly, eſpecially in the moſt fruitful places. It produceth likewiſe an Herb, much like the Bee flower, of very violent Poyſon, being eaten it diſtracteth the mind, and forcibly attracting the Nerves diſtorteth the lips as in laughter: the juice of it is mortal, unleſs after vomiting you drink good ſtore of milk and honyed water: the preſent force of the diſeaſe is ſo remedied, the other incommodities thereof are cured by the ſame means as other Convulſions of the Nerves. *Saluſt. Brest-plates they sew together the out skins of their Rams, which they call Musmones, bearing not wooll as others, but in stead thereof hair like Goats. Their chiefest City is Caralis, looking towards Africa and from thence built, with a very fair Haven. Corsica is not to be compared with Sardinia either for largeness of Territorie, or for Riches, yet is thought to be the third in bigness of all those Islands; The inhabitants derive the name from one Corsa a woman, out of whose Heard a Bull crossed over into this Island from Liguria; the Greeks called it Cyrnus. It is Mountainous and Rugged, in many places almost impassible; and the people like to the earth are very rough, without ordinary civility, as untractable as the wild beasts. When they are taken prisoners they hardly grow gentle, but either out of impatience of labour and servitude kill themselves, or by their contumacy and stubbornesse are troublesome to their masters.

The Island is plentiful in Honey, but it is of a bitter taste, much like the flower of Box, which tree in great number groweth there; yet it is very wholsome, and many think your Corsicans to be therefore long-lived, because they ordinarily use that Honey. Their Towns are not very great nor very populous, yet there is above thirty of them, the principal whereof are Aleria a Colony of the Phocæans, and Nicæa of the Etrurians. The Air is here very troublesome, and therefore the seas rough. The Carthaginians therefore had long wars with these nations, and obtained the dominion of both Islands, except places inaccessible. But because wild and rude men were easier to be vanquished then tamed, they bethought themselves of many means whereby to keep them under, they likewise corrupted all the fruits of the Island, and under pain of death prohibited the Natives to sow or plant any such thing, that they might be forced to fetch all necessaries from Africa, till at length grown somewhat more gentle they learned with patience to bear the yoke.

Aristotle περὶ θαυμασίων ἀκουσμάτων.

To these Islands at this time did Cn. Cornelius steer his course, and first in Corsica stormed the City Aleria, after which without much labour or danger he took the rest. From thence as he sailed towards Sardinia, he met the enemies Fleet, which he presently put to flight before they came to grapple. After this he went to Olbia, where seeing many Carthaginian ships in the Haven, and thinking himself not strong enough in foot to storm a City so well scituate, and defended by a great multitude, for the present he omitted the business, and sailed home for a recruit of men.

Zonaras.

About the same time a servile Commotion, in the Citie, which was in the beginning happily suppressed, did both afflict the Commonwealth with great fear, and likewise secure it. Many out of the new conquered Nations, were pressed for sea service, whereof there were then four thousand in Rome, most of them Samnites; these men abhorring the sea, did secretly bemoane their own Condition and so far exasperated one another that they were resolved to burn the Citie and plunder it: They had already drawn in above three thousand accomplices into the conspiracy, which daily gathered more strength, when Erius Potelius, Commander of the Auxiliaries, did by his wisdom prevent all danger. For he feigning himself engaged in the same faction, was made privie to all their Contrivances, he was acquainted with the number of them, nay, with the nation, and name of every particular person in the conspiracy; he knew the place and the time where and when they intended to act any thing. He now wanted nothing to the accomplishment of his own private design, but onely to discover theirs to the Senate, but thither he could not find no opportunitie of going, because the Samnites would never suffer him to walk alone; at length having devised this trick, he perswadeth them, That when the Senate next met, they should come by bands into the market-place, and complain that they were cheated in the Measure of their Corn, that then they should have occasion offered of executing their Purpose, or at least understand of what mind and opinion the Fathers will be in upon such sudden motions and stirs. And to gaine the more Credit in the business, he went along with them, manifesting himself not ony a Companion in the Tumult, but the Author and Ringleader of it. Whereupon being called into the Senate he discovered to them the danger of the secret Plot and cause of his own dissimulation. The Fathers, taking no notice of what they knew, sent Messengers with good words to pacifie the Rout, and command them home, assuring them with all, That the Senate would take order for Redresse of their Grievance, and that every one should enjoy his Right. The Conspiratours, thinking their Designes was still kept close, went their way: The night following every Master bound his servants, whom according to Potilius his Information, he knew guilty of the treason, the Samnites also were most of them seized upon in their Quarters. Either the care of this or some other business, or sickness was an hindrance to C. Florus, that he did not goe into Sicily so soon as ordinary, whereby Hamilcar after his last Victorie had time much to encrease the Carthaginian Power there. For having taken Camarina and Enna by Treachery, he fortified Drepanus, where was a very fair Haven, and enlarged it in forme of a Town, bringing the Erycines thither to Dwell, whose Citie, lest it should be servicable to the Romans he totally demolished, excepting the Temple of Venus. After this he reduced many other places under his power either by deceit or by force, and was in a likelyhood of conquering all Sicilie, but that Florus, for this reason not daring in winter to forsake the Iland, tarried to oppose him. The other Consul had an Easier Taske with the Sardinians and Carthaginians at Olbia; whether being returned with encrease of strength, he found Hanno there, who after the removal of Hannibal was made Admiral. The battel waxing

ing vehemently hot, Hanno couragiously fighting, seeing his own party worsted, rushed in to the thickest of the Enemies and was there slaine: After which the Town yielded it self. The Consul much graced the fame of his Victory by his singular humanity toward the Enemie. For he took care to have the Body of Hanno to be conveighed out of his Cabbin to Burial, and made a large Funeral for him, laying aside hatred after Death, and rightly judging that virtue is to be honoured even in an enemie. Then not suffering the Terrour of his late Victorie to grow stale and be forgotten, he took many other Cities of Sardinia, furthering his Courage with Counsells and stratagems. For he used in the night time to land some choice bands not far off those townes he meant to assault, who conveniently placing themselves in Ambush lay quiet, till the Consul coming to the walls and giving an Alarum, had under pretence of Flight drawn the Townsmen a good way out of their works, then they in Ambush hastily arising took the Citie void of Defendants: By this wile he obtained many places, and so prosecuted his Atcheivements, that the Carthaginian armies had no abiding place either in Sardinia or Corsica. For which cause, at his Return, there was no doubt made, but a most ample Triumph decreed him, which he made over the Carthaginians, Sardinia and Corsica the fifth of the Ides of March, having brought great store of plunder out of those Islands and many thousands of Captives. But in Sicily C. Florus besieged Mytistratus, which was attempted in vain, neither could it be gained till the new Consul A. Atilius A.F. C.N. came thither; For to him was allotted Sicily for his Province, the Navy was committed to his Colleague C. Sulpitius Q. F. Q. N. Paterculus. They understanding that Panormus was the Carthaginians winter Quarter, marched thither with all their Forces, and, ordering their Men, presented Battel to the Enemie, but no man coming out against them, they went thence to Hippana, which Citie in their jorney they stormed and presently mastered. Thence Atilius marched to Mytistratus, which being stoutly defended, at length the Garrison souldiers, being wearied with the cries and Lamentations of women and Children, forsook it. The Carthaginians went out in the night time; at break of day the Townsmen opened the Gates. But the Romans bearing too much in mind the Incommodities they had endured in the siege thereof, slew every one they met without destinction of age or sex, till A. Atilius the Consul caused proclamation to be made, That both Plunder and Prisoners should belong to those who took them. Then at length Covetousness overcame Cruelty, and the rest of the Citizens were saved and made Captive: The Citie was plundered and demolished. The Army being thence led towards Camarina, fell into very great danger, for want of knowledg in the Country. For the Carthaginian General meeting them had first possessed the higher places, and as it were besieged the Romans rashly entred into a disadvantagous vallie; every one thought they saw before their Eyes the very picture of the Caudine overthrow; but the wisdom and Valour of M. Calpurnius Flamma a Colonell in the army, in their utmost point of dispaire did releive them. For he following the Example of P. Decius, who being a Colonell in Samnium had done the like, taking three hundred souldiers along with him, went up to possess a certaine Hillock, not out of hope to escape, but both he and his souldiers being animated with the Love of honour, and desire of saving the whole army; 'Tis said when he had brought them thither, he thus spake unto them, Let us die fellow Souldiers, and by our death deliver the Legions now round besieged. And so it came to passe, for while the enemy converted themselves wholly upon these men, they being resolved to die, did so long maintain a sharp fight with the greater number, that the Consul had time to explicate himself out of that unhappy place. The Carthaginians having slain those who did indeed on purpose offer up themselves (putting no hope in their ambush which was now discovered) departed. The fortune of Calpurnius was next to a Miracle, for he being found among the heaps of his own and the enemie dead bodies, was the only man had breath left in him; and being carryed away and diligently fomented (among many wounds having not one mortal) he recovered, and afterward did great and faithful service to the Commonwealth, and proved of great terror to the enemy. If he had among the Grecians performed such a deed of Valor, they would not have known how to have bestowed rewards, or have decreed Monuments enough to his Honor: But being a Roman all the reward of such an exploit was a Garland made of Grass; nay, they were so negligent in the memory of the very Fact, that the name of this valiant man is scarcely known: Most Authors call him Calpurnius, but M. Cato calls him Q. Caditius; Claudius Quadrigarius gives him the name of Laberius. But the Consul being freed from those straits he was in, made his error an argument of shame, and his danger of watchfulness and circumspection. Therefore with the greater courage and care he proceeds to the assault of the City, and being not able to prevail against it without Engines of battery, he borrowed some of Hiero. With them he brake down the walls, and reduced Camarina into his power, the Citizens for the most part he sold for slaves. Thence he marched to Enna, and had that by treachery delivered to him; the Garrison souldiers were part of them slain by the Romans after they were entred, the rest fled away and betook themselves to places possessed by their own party. Sittana was obtained not by craft but courage, the defendants being driven back and the City stormed. Some smaller Towns in that part of Sicily made no delay, but forthwith sent messengers with promise of submission. The Consul placing Garrisons in all places convenient, marched into the Agrigentine Territories, and by treachery had the Castle Camicus delivered to him. Where-

Whereupon the Garriſon of Erbeſſus being diſheartened, forſook the Town. So Erbeſſus Polybius came again into the Romans hands. The Conſull Encouraged with this ſucceſs, and thinking the ſame fight, he was by them Crucified, ſaying, that his Folly and Raſhneſs was the cauſe

Zonaras. afterwards. For being freed from fear of the Carthaginian Navy, while they boldly and ſecurely waſted the Grounds, they were ſuddenly routed by an unexpected incurſion of Sardinians Capitolina and Carthaginians, one Hanno being Commander. C. Duilius was this year Cenſour, and Magiſt. Tacitus 2. 49. built the Temple of Janus in the Herb-Market. After this two Triumphs were made, the

BOOK VIII.

AFterwards L. Manlius, A. F. P. N. commonly called Longus, did enter upon the Conſulſhip, and L. Cadicius, Q. F. Q. N. after whoſe death, M. Atilius, M. F. L. N. Regulus, who had been ſometimes Conſul, ſucceeded in his Office. Then onely in this year Africa, which hitherto had been free from any miſeries by an Enemy, began to be ſenſible of a war, when the Romans had made an invaſion therein-to, after they had in a great Sea fight gained the Victory over the Carthaginians fleet; which exploits, as they were atchieved, we ſhall in this Book ſet forth, and both the one and the other fortune of that ſame Regulus, and his end not ſuitable to the gallantry of the man; The year before when the Carthaginians, C. Atilius being Conſull, did ſo ſtrive to get the beſt in a Sea-conflict, that when they had loſt many ſhips, they firſt gave over fighting; yet becauſe they had ſunk ſome certain of the Roman Veſſels, they would not take themſelves to have been of leſſer reputation; On the other part, the Romans did judge that event as an undoubted Victory. So it was that the vaſt multitude on both ſides did bend their mindes with greateſt emulation to the ſtudy of Sea-Affaires. And therefore the Conſulls being charged to remove the warre into Africa, when they were come to Meſſana, with an Armado of three hundred and thirty ſhips, and from thence paſſing by the Coaſt of Sicily on the right hand beyond Pachinus, to take in the Foot Forces, they having alſo ſome Forts near the Hill Ecnomus, they ſailed forward. And about the ſame time Hamilcar General of the Carthaginians, and Hanno the Admirall, being Commanders of a Fleet of three hundred and ſixty ſhips, having paſſed by Lilybæum in Carthage, and then Heraclea Minoas, in that bay they conſult of caſting Anchor, obſerving the motions of the Romans, and if they durſt bend towards Africa, they were in a poſture to ſtop their courſe; which when the Conſulls were informed of, they with good advice make all things ready for either chance; that they might not be to ſeek for Counſell, whether they were to engage in a Sea-conflict, or to draw ſome whither for ſafety: therefore committing the ſhips to ſome of the ſtouteſt Souldiers, they make four Squadrons, as ſo many parts of the whole fleet; the choiceſt men they ſet in the firſt Squadron, the two next Squadrons they place in their order, in the Reare-guard they put their chiefeſt men for ſtrength, the Triarii, theſe forces they diſpoſe of in ſuch array, that each ſhip did carry 300 rowers, and ſix ſcore Souldiers. So the Muſter-Roll in the whole Navy did amount to an hundred and forty thouſand men.

From the foundation of the City. 497. Capitolina Tabulæ.

Polyb. 1. 25 Oroſius 4. 8. Polyb.

The Carthaginians did ſomewhat exceed that number, leading more ſouldiers then an hundred and fifty thouſand. And indeed the Conſulls did ſcarce eſteem of any other ſort of ſouldiers in compariſon of their own. There was ſo much the more conſulting, when it did appear, they muſt needs fight in the deep Ocean; where the ſwiftneſs of the ſhips, and the skill of the Pilots are of much advantage, to the fit ordering the front of the battell-aray againſt that danger; finally they conſider of placing the whole Fleet aright. They ſet two Gallies wherein the Conſulls themſelves were carried, very even in the Van, to both thoſe Gallies they joyn on this ſide the firſt Squadron, on that ſide the ſecond in a long continued row; the ſhips being placed in ſuch manner, that the fore caſtles of them all were turned outwards, and the Gallies did move almoſt joyned together, the ſhips next to thoſe did keep from each other more apart, and ſo conſequently the ſpace left between the oppoſite ſhips did grow wider according to their being ſet in order. So when the form of the Van in manner of a wedg was ſhaped, with ſmall diſtance between the firſt ſhips, and with great ſpaces between the laſt, then did they cauſe the third Squadron to advance, which bearing that open ſpacebetween the two firſt ſhips, did meerly by their order, exhibit a triangular form of the whole array; behind this, at the third Squadrons back, the long boats were drawn by a Barge with Cables to pull with, reaching to the ſhips of the Tertian ſouldiers. The Triarii the ſouldiers ſet in the Rear-ward, did ſo inviron the former, the ſhips being ſtretched out into a halfe circle, that from each Wing they did appear; So the whole body with a deep hollow front, the hindmoſt parts being firmely ſolid, did reſemble the ſnout of a ſhip, not leſs able to receive a violent aſſault, then fit to give one.

But the Carthaginian Captains having intelligence by their Scouts of the approach of the Roman fleet, when they conſidered, the paſſage to their City was not difficult, the common ſort were nothing manly, the bordering Neighbours inconſtant, and very prone to fall from their fidelity, they conclude to go out to meet them: being reſolved firſt to try all that might be, rather then they would ſuffer, that the Roman Veſſels ſhould have a ſafe Voyage into Africa. Therefore they betake them to their ſhips, incouraging their men in ſhort, That they would undertake the fight with mindes firmely bent and chearfull, well remembring they were to fight, not only touching things preſent, but in reference to all things, which each one held precious at home; and with their own good hope, and that of their fellow Seamen, they lanch forth out of the Harbour; nor was the Romans fleet far diſtant, therefore not far from Heraclea they give the ſhock againſt each other with equall ſtoutneſs; The Carthaginian Captains did ſo provide, that Hanno ſhould charge on the Right Wing, (but it was he that had been unfortunate at Agrigentum) Hamilcar ſhould be Commander over the reſt. And they alſo divide their ſhips into four Squadrons, having obſerved the array which the Romans had made uſe of; Of theſe, that which was the left Wing of the whole array being crooked like a bow, did make towards the ſhore, the reſt were extended in their plain order, and turned upon the firſt Squadron of the Enemies ſhips. Hereupon the Right Wing in which there were very ſwift Veſſells with ſnouts and five oares in a ſeat, Hanno did ſtretch it out all he could towards the main Ocean, being ready to ſurround the Enemy, if the ſkirmiſh ſhould begin at any other part. And the Conſulls not ſtaying long did venture themſelves with their two Squadrons into the midſt of the Carthaginian ſhips; Hamilcar that he might break the array of the Romans did charge his ſouldiers, when the Conflict began, they ſhould preſenly take their flight, which being done, and the Romans eagerly purſuing them, the Carthaginians indeed had no hurt by their flying, in regard their ſhips were ſwift: but the array of the Romans, as Hamilcar wiſhed, and had foreſeen, was rent aſunder, when yet the Triarii, and the third Squadron did keep their places, which, when he ſaw it performed, he ſuddenly gives a ſign out of his own ſhip, that their fore-caſtles being turn'd, they ſhould encounter thoſe that did purſue them: the fight was doubtfull, the Carthaginians excelling in ſwiftneſs, and in skill for Navigation. The Romans being farre tranſcendant in the ſtoutneſs of their ſouldiers; Therefore ſo long as the fight rather of the ſhips, then of the men, did laſt, the Carthaginians had the better clearly: But when they began to fight hand to hand, the ſhips being faſtned cloſe with grapling irons, then the Victory did certainly incline towards the Roman party: When the ſouldier full of confidence through his hand-ſtrokes, and fighting before the Conſulls, did ſtrive to approve his valour to them with a more notable endeavour: while the skirmiſh was ſo managed in that part, Hanno with the Right Wing, which hitherto he kept unmov'd, made a fierce aſſault, being carried by the tide amongſt the ſhips of the Triarii, and did create them much troubleſom work, when they were brought to great diſtreſs; At the ſame time almoſt, the Left Wing alſo of the Carthaginians, the firſt poſture being changed, and with a front made even, does aſſail with dangerous beaks the third Squadron of the Romans, which drew their long boats by a Barge. The Romans having ſlipt their Cables, did prepare themſelves for reſiſtance; Here alſo they ſhew much Gallantry: So in three places, there do happen even juſt ſo many Sea-fights, far diſtant from each other.

Zonaras. Polybius. 1. 7.

When they had fought ſo hard, the Victory long enough inclining to either ſide, at laſt it chanced, as needs it muſt, where there is fierce bickeering in ſundry places at once, with equall force and vehemency, that the ſelfe-ſame part which is firſt routed, ſhould cauſe the whole Victory. For when Hamilcar was utterly unable any longer to withſtand the Violence of his Enemies, his ſingle flight did immediately diſperſe even the whole fleet of the Carthaginian. For L. Manlius one of the Conſulls, being very much buſied about bringing together the ſhips that were taken, and chaining them to his own, M. Regulus eſpying the fight to begin afreſh in another place, he made haſte to relieve his own ſide, taking to him the ſhips of the ſecond Squadron, all that eſcaped out of the former fight ſafe and unſhattered; The Triarii did ſoon perceive that reliefe, and recollecting their Spirits, which had even failed them in extremity of Danger, they began to oppoſe their Enemies with great undauntedneſs. Hanno, when he ſaw that both thoſe before him made ſtout reſiſtance and that himſelfe was ſo over-charged on the Reare with freſh ſupplies, hoiſing up ſail he did his beſt to avoid his approaching overthrow. And when L. Manlius

Zonaras. Polybius. 1. 28.

lius amidſt theſe tryalls beheld the third Squadron of the Romans to be enforced towards land by the Carthaginians Left Wing, he ſteer'd that way, and M. Regulus overtook him unawares, who had even now ſet the long boats and the Triarii out of harmes reach. So the ſtate of things is ſoon quite changed, and they are ſurrounded very cloſe, who but juſt before had hemmed the Romans in. Whom indeed being ſtrangely encompaſſed, and in a manner ſtraightly beſieged, they might e're this have utterly deſtroyed, unleſs not daring to go near them for fear of the iron raven-beaks they were wont to grapple with, they gave the Conſuls time enough, that themſelves being ſafe they might even ſecure their own ſide, and the Carthaginians, that were environ'd by a ſudden ſurprizeall, had leiſure to take, as with a net, fifty ſhips, and all that were therein, ſo the other few ſtealing away by the very ſhore ſide did make their eſcape.

This Sea-conflict as well in regard of various ill accidents, and the eagerneſs of the encounter, as alſo for the number of ſhips loſt on both ſides, was of fair remark. Of the Carthaginian ſhips ſixty and three were taken, above thirty were ſunk. The Conquering Romans Oroſius 4.8 loſt four and twenty by reaſon of foul weather, but not one of them did fall into the hands of the Enemy.

When this victory was over, returning to Meſſana they allotted certaine daies to mend their ſhips, and refreſh their men, and to take in ſtore of new proviſion. Amongſt which, Hamilcar when he would not yeild by any means, the Romans ſhould go to Africa, but wanted ſtrength to ſtop their march, he betook himſelf to ſtratagems, and ſought, by ſending Hanno to them to ſue for peace, to prolong the time, till the arrivall of the forces which he lookt the Carthaginians would ſend him. Hanno when he made his addreſſe to the Conſuls, and heard the exclamations of the people, that the ſame decree ought to paſs againſt him, which five years before the Carthaginians had deſign'd againſt Cornelius Aſina then Conſul, he ſhifted off the threatned miſchief with a ſubtill anſwer, Verily if ye ſhall do ſo (ſaies he) ye ſhall not be better at all then the very Africans; and preſently the Conſuls well reſented what he ſaid, commanding thoſe to be ſilent that had voted him to chains, and there was a voice heard well beſeeming the gravity of the Roman ſtock, O Hanno, the faithful dealing of our City does quit thee from that fear. It was in vain to move for peace becauſe the Carthaginian did not deal ſincerely, and the Conſuls did rather aim at Victory then at Peace. Therefore they had no mind to defer any longer their intended voyage to Africa; Neither did the Carthaginian Commanders croſſe the deſign, though they engaged to each other, not to endure the enmy ſhould march without diſturbance, but to infeſt him from ſundry quarters, and to bar his paſſage. But Hanno making haſt to fortify Carthage beforehand, Hamilcar not daring to attempt ought, tarries at Heraclea. The Romans ſhips made a ſafe voyage free both from enemies and from tempeſts. And there wanted not ſome that did ſtrangely abominate any travelling far by ſea, and the enemies coaſt, and the very name of Africa. Mannius, an Officer among the ſouldiers, did firſt begin to ſpeak ill of government, but Regulus was ſo incenſed againſt him, that he threatned him that ſcourges and the axe ſhould be his lot, unleſs he would ſubmit. So at length the Conſul was obeyed, and the nearer and the greater fear did expel the dread of travelling by ſea. The Promontory is called Hermæum which from the boſome of Carthage does ſtretch very far into the Sicilian ſea. That coaſt was firſt found out by the Roman ſhips, then after a little ſtay while the whole fleet came up together, the Conſuls having paſſed by the coaſt of Africa, they arrived at the Citie Clupea. Here the ſouldiers are expoſed to hazard, and when the ſhips were put into harbor, there was a Trench drawn round for the more ſecurity. The Citie becauſe it refuſed to ſurrender, was beſieg'd, and preſently through the timerouſneſſe of the Citizens it being either yielded or deſerted (for 'tis reported either way) it was reduced to the obedience of the Romans.

But the Carthaginians though they did endure things truly harſh, and very ſtrange, yet they rejoyced at their weal, that they fared ſomewhat better then they expected: for when they heard what iſſue the Sea-fight had, they were ſore afraid, leaſt preſently the conquering forces would have been drawn even againſt Carthage it ſelf. Therefore re-aſſuming ſome courage after their former fright, they were fully bent to make what ſtrength they could to defend their City and the Suburbs thereof. Mean while the Conſuls having ſent meſſengers to Rome which would acquaint the Senators what exploits had been atchieved already, and ſhould beſeech their advice touching new attempts, they make Clupea a Garriſon, that they might make uſe of that ſeat of war. And having ſet a guard to defend the City and field adjoyning, they marching a great way forward with all their other forces, they utterly waſte a very fruitful Country, which from the dayes of Agathocles had not ſeen the ſword of an enemy; they deſtroy many goodly Villages, they force away whole droves of cattel, moreover they lead away by force above twenty thouſand men, no man daring to gainſay; they alſo take many Towns by ſtorm or by ſurrender, wherein they apprehend ſeveral Revolters, and ſet free many Roman Captives, that were taken in the late wars, amongſt whom I believe even Cn. Cornelius to have been, that was choſen Conſul again after two years were expir'd. While things are thus acted, they that were ſent to Rome by the Conſuls, return with Orders from the Senate. One of them was commanded to quarter in Africa, with ſuch conſiderable forces as they held needful to be kept there. The other was required to bring back the reſt of the fleet, and the reſidue of the army

Manlius* having ſafely paſſed by the Coaſts of Sicily, he carried back to Rome. I find he led along with him to Rome twenty ſeven thouſand Captives, and the Navall Triumph over the Carthaginians was ordain'd for him. Afterwards Ser. Fulvius, *M. F. M. N. The Government of Sicily and the Command of the Fleet are committed to the charge of thoſe two: They were not minded to call back Regulus from amidſt his Victories, while he went on proſperouſly in Africa; and he was ordered by the Proconſul to manage the War there That decree of the Senate no one did worſe reſent, than he himſelfe, for whoſe honour it was made. Therefore in his Letters to the Senate he made that his grievance, and ſet it as the main ground of his ſuit, that another might ſucceed him in his Office, upon the death of his Bailiffe (he undertook to manure a piece of ground of ſeven Acres, which his Maſter had in Pupinia) having gained an opportunity, he thence delivered up his Commiſſion, and left his charge; wherefore he muſt needs depart, leaſt in his abſence, when his ground lay untilled, his wife and children ſhould want bread. And the Senate did ordain, that M. Regulus his ground ſhould be dreſſed at the Publick charge, that what damage he had ſuſtained ſhould be made good, and fair proviſion ſhould be made for his wife and children. Such good orders were then in uſe! But when I read of or relate theſe things and the like, I cannot chuſe but recollect with my ſelf, which is the more laſting recompence for virtue, a reward by Coin, or by commendation; by pounds, or by praiſe. M. Regulus his renowne does endure many ages after his death; the wealth of others hath periſht with their Maſters, and oftentimes before them: In the mean ſeaſon the Carthaginians having choſen two Generalls at home, Aſdrubal, Hanno's ſonne, and Boſtar; they ſent alſo for Hamilcar their third Commander in chief to come out of Sicily. Who with five thouſand Foot, and five hundred Horſe came in all haſte from Heraclea to Carthage. Theſe having called a Councell do decree, that the Army ſhould not be kept within Walls, as the manner heretofore had been, neither ſhould the Roman ſouldiers be permitted to do what they liſted without any puniſhment. So when they were encouraged to wage War, the Army was drawn out.

In the mean time M. Regulus did march to all places near adjoyning, through which the River Bagrada does ſlide, ſubduing all before him, not far from which the Romans that held certain Caſtles, were ſmitten with a ſudden peſtilence, and loſt many, and were ſore amazed. A water-Serpent of huge bigneſs did ſet upon the ſouldiers, and they being much afrighted, and reſiſting all in vain, the Serpent did ſwallow down many of them with his wide yawning jawes, others he bruiſ'd to pieces with his furious windings, and with the ſtrokes of his tail, ſome again he poyſoned to death with the blaſting of his peſtiferous breath, and he made ſo much ado for M. Regulus, that with all his forces he muſt fight with the Serpent for the poſſeſſion of the River, which when it was done with the loſs of many ſouldiers, and the Dragon could neither be overcom, nor wounded, he with his extream hard cruſt of Scales eaſily repelling, what ever darts they did throw at him, they muſt make uſe of Engines, and without great Guns and Mortar-pieces, like a well fenced Tower, the Enemy is not to be overthrown; After ſeverall hurlings that were made in vain, a great ſtone being caſt, did break his back-bone all to ſhivers, and did diſſolve the vigorous violence of the formidable Monſter. And the buſineſs was effected with ſo much difficulty, and with ſo great terrour to Horſe and Foot, that the ſouldiers did averre they had rather oppoſe Carthage it ſelfe, then ſuch another Monſter. And the Camp could ſtay there no longer, but muſt ſhun the infected waters, and all the Country round about, which was blaſted with the contagious ſtink of his lying there. This was ſome ſhame to the pride of men, which are wont to think very fondly, that they can Conquer all things. Truely when M. Regulus was Generall, that had been Conquerour by Sea and Land, one ſingle Serpent when he was alive, did hold the whole Roman Army in plea, and being killed he made the Army draw off. And therefore the Proconſull did hold it no immodeſty to ſend the ſpoils even of this very Enemy to Rome, and to acknowledg with a publick Monument the greatneſs of his own fear, and his rejoycing at the victory. For he took order the skin of the beaſt ſhould be taken off and carried to Rome, which is reported to have been an hundred and twenty foot long, and being hanged up in a certain Temple to have laſted even till the Wars at Numantia. When the Camp was remov'd from Bagrada, the Conſull commanded the Army towards the City Adis, all Towns and Caſtles being won and demoliſht that lay in their road.

But to Adis, which was hard to take, there was a certain way of laying ſiege by the help of warlike engines. To the croſſing of which, when the Carthaginian Captains did ſpeedily make haſte they ſate down on a certain hill, but full of wood and full of other impediments that was very near the Roman Camp. M. Regulus having well conſidered the nature of the place, and what manner of enemies he had to deale with, when he ſaw their foot were not comparable to his, but that they put much confidence in their Elephants and horſemen, but ſuch forces being very formidable in open fields by the inequality of the places would not be come at, and would be made very uſeleſs; he wiſely taking ſome advantage by the folly of his enemies, before they could perceive and correct their error, determines to fall upon them in their own Tents. Wherefore encouraging his ſouldiers, and diligently obſerving what reaſon did ſuggeſt, he goes out of his Camp before the dawning of the day, and does cauſe his army to advance towards the hill directly oppoſite, where the Carthaginians had pitcht their Tents. Firſt of all, the audacious confidence of the Romans did even amaze the Carthaginians, which being far leſſe in number did ſet upon ſuch a vaſt army even in their own trenches, from a low place, and of great diſadvantage. Then they were in the greater confuſion even in this reſpect, becauſe the horſemen and Elephants, from which they did hope for moſt aſſiſtance, were not only of no advantage, but did extremely hinder and diſturb them, and the very time did augment their trembling, that the Romans did ſet upon them unawares, and moſt of them, as yet, being faſt aſleep, therefore many of them are put to the ſword even in their huts, the others ſtragling in their amazed flight, and not knowing where to hide themſelves, were taken by parties ſet on purpoſe to way-lay them. Zonarus

Nevertheleſs the Carthaginians Mercenary ſouldiers, the Spainards and the French, being inſtantly in a good poſture, and fighting Couragiouſly on the other ſide of their bulwark it was doubtful a great while which would get the upper hand. The forlorn hope even now being put to the run, the whole Roman army had been overthron, if the horſe from another quarter that were commanded to wheele about had not in the very nick of time charged the enemie on the reare that were purſuing thoſe which fled. Then they alſo which a little before had deſerted their ſtation might now be rallied up and encouraged to fight afreſh. So the enemy being ſet upon on both ſides, when he had for a long time with much gallantry made reſiſtance, he was conſtrained to cry quarter. When the Carthaginians ſaw what was done, immediately they fling themſelves out of their Sconces, and fall to running with all the ſpeed they could make, and indeed the Elephants and the horſemen when once they came into plaines they could retreat well enough and ſafely too. The Conquerors having purſued the infantry ſomewhat far, they turn back at length to throw down their fortifications. In this Battel there were ſeventeene thouſand of the Carthaginians that were ſlain, five thouſand are reported to be taken priſoners, and eighteen Elephants. The ſucceſſe of this battel did purchaſe the Romans much friendſhip not only from all the Countryes round about, but even from people that were moſt remote. And in few dayes about fourſcore walled towns vowed fidelity to the Romans. Whereas upon the newes that Tunis ſuch a fenced City was taken by Regulus, did even aſtoniſh the Carthaginians that were greatly ſtraitned before, and which was built twelve miles from Carthage, leaſt it ſuffer what ever they did there to be kept ſecret from the enemy, then being a fair proſpect both to the very City it ſelfe, and to the ſea hard by. Polybius Oroſius. Eutropius b. 2 Zonarus Oroſius. Livie, 30. 9

And the terrible dread of their war with the Romans did not onely dance round the Carthaginians, but the Numidians alſo, out of an old grudge being ſtirred up by a freſh opportunity, took up arms, and by ſpoiling and fireing the Carthaginian towns, brought more terrour and miſery upon them, then the Romans did. And the Boores from all parts flying for refuge to the City, did cauſe not only a huge dread, but alſo a great dearth, when ſuch a multitude of people did devour a world of proviſion, and the avarice of the owners did conceale the plenty as yet in ſtore, who gaping greedily for gain by that Common Calamity were full of hope the price of victuals would raiſe daily according to the decreaſe of their moſt neceſſary food. Whereupon it followed, the Embaſſy of Marcus Regulus was hearken'd to with greater heed, who aiming at the honor of finiſhing the war, and fearing leaſt ſome one that might ſucceed him with a new commiſſion from Rome ſhould prevent him, he moves the Carthaginians to Conditions for peace. To that purpoſe ſome of the prime Senators are ſent unto him; but when they ſaw ſtrange harſh conditions offer'd, and their buſineſſe at a ſtand, they took their leave of M. Regulus, who was verily perſwaded he had Victory by the hand. Sicily forſooth, and all Sardinia were commanded to yeeld, to ſend freely home what Romans they had taken, to ranſome their own men, to bear the whole charge of the war, and to pay beſides a penſion by the year. They had other impoſitions, full as burthenſome as theſe; That they ſhould be confederates with the Romans for offence and defence; that they ſhould uſe but one great ſhip; But ths Romans they ſhould aſſiſt with fifty gallyes well appointed as oft as they ſhould be required. The Embaſſadours being tranſported with wonder at ſuch Articles, and that Regulus might grant his vanquiſht ſuppliants more milde conditions, he made this anſwer, Men muſt either Conquer or crouch to thoſe that ſubdue them. By the return of which words the Carthaginians were much incenſed, though they had often made ſuite for peace, yet they are fully bent, rather to endure the worſt that could happen than to embrace thoſe Conditions, which they held no other than the bondage and ſervitude of their Citie. Zonaras Dio. apud Fulvium Urſinum, Diodori Eclog. b. 23 Polyb. 1. 31

In that ſtate of affairs certain ſhips which were ſent to waft ſome ſouldiers into Greece, did return when they had gathered up no ſmall body of Mercenary ſouldiers; Among theſe there was one Xanthippus, by race a Lacedemonian, who did couple the noble exerciſe of warfare with the diſcipline of his Country, wherein he had been well trained up from his youth. He ſufficiently underſtanding what feats had been done already, and having inſight enough into the other furniture of the Carthaginian forces, of the Elephants and Horſemen, he made bold to ſpeak a proud word openly, that the Carthaginians were not ſubdued by the Romans, but by themſelves, by the weakneſs of their Commanders, that knew not the duty of their places. This rumor being ſoon diſperſ'd, when Xanthippus was call'd before the Magiſtrates, he does produce Polybius Florus. 2. 2 Polybius

ſuch evident reaſons of that his judgement, that ſcarce ought could be more manifeſt; he ſhews them that in all their expeditions, in making their Fort, in joyning Battell, it was their manner ſtill to pick out places utterly unfit, if they would liſten to his advice, he does aſſure them not Zonaras onely of ſafety, but alſo of Victory. When ſeverall of the Chiefe Citizens do approve of his judgement, and the very Commanders alſo themſelves, and with beſeeming modeſty preferring the welfare of their Country before his ſingle opinion, they agree and ordain that the guidance of his Army ſhouldbe committed to a foreigner; Xanthippus having undertook his charge,
Polybius. dayly drawing his ſouldiers out of the City, he does accuſtome the field Forces to obſerve and change their ranks, and inſtantly to do what they are commanded, and the confidence of better ſucceſs does fill the ſouldiers with admiration of him, the whole City being cheriſhed even in deſperation, is raiſed up to expect joyfull things to come. When the Commanders behold this Univerſall Cheerfulneſs, they alſo taking heart thereby, reſolve to give the Enemy another charge, and encouraging their ſouldiers, as opportunity did require, they march out againſt the Romans, even with almoſt twelve thouſand Foot, with four hundred horſe, and well nigh as many Elephants; that thing alone did perplex the Romans, that they ſaw the Carthaginians make their inroads through the plain fields, having changed their firſt deſign, avoiding all ſteep and craggy places: But being puffed up with pride through their conſtant felicity, they ſet at nought the ſouldiers that Zonaras. were wont to vanquiſh, and Graculus their Leader. And Regulus was not corrupted with that fawning poyſon of fortune waiting on him. When he well conſidered that he had routed the Sea-Forces of the Carthaginians, and the foot Souldiers too, that he had taken almoſt Author de viris Illuſtr. c. 40. two hundred Townes, two hundred thouſand men, and that Carthage being ſore ſtreightned, might be enforced to ſurrender, he denied them peace when they ſued for it on reaſonable termes, Zonaras and wrote to Rome, That the very Gates of Carthage which he had begirt did tremble at him. So alſo moderation hath oftner deſerted great Spirits in proſperity, then conſtancy in adverſity: But the Carthaginians having pitcht their tents in a plain field, M. Regulus whoſe chiefeſt ſtrength was in his infantry, and thither he could not be followed but over Mountainous and ſteep difficult places, thinking it all one to his Valour where he fought, he was not afraid to truſt himſelf in the Camp, even to the greater vanting of his confidence, paſſing over the river that was in the Apian. Zonaras. midſt, and diſtant from the Enemy even two hundred thouſand paces. Xanthippus perceiving the indiſcretion of the Roman Leader, did avouch this would be the very time, wherein he would performe what he had promiſed the Carthaginians; for he had got the Romans even tired with long Marching, where his heart could wiſh them; he nothing doubted the Victory would be certainly his own; the time alſo did ſeem moſt commodious for the fight, becauſe the day now drawing towards the evening, the Africans knowing well all places thereabout, if they ſhould be overcome, they might make their eſcape the better in the night, or if they ſhould conquer, the night would not hinder the purſuit of the Victory. Therefore the Carthaginians conſulting what was to be done, Xanthippus calling for the help of Gods and Men, that they Polyb. might not loſe ſuch a ſingular opportunity, he did earneſtly perſwade his men to undertake the Battell, ſo much the eaſier, becauſe the ſouldiers themſelves crying out to Xanthippus, they did of their own accord with unuſuall cheerfulneſs deſire to encounter with the Enemy, therefore the charge of the main affair is granted to the Spartan, he drawes out the Army, and does exerciſe them after this manner. A four ſquare body of 8000 Carthaginians, which were the prime Choſen
Frontinus Stratagem. 2. 2. Polybius. men of all their foot, was ſet for a reſerve; before this body, a convenient ſpace being left between, the Elephants are ſet in order, being drawn up as broad as that ſquare body; on either Wing the Horſe are placed, behind theſe on the Right Wing, ſtands the main body of hired ſouldiers. The Army being ſet in ſuch array, he commanded the skirmiſhers, that having thrown Frontin. 2. 3. their darts, they ſhould ſtand in open order for the advantage of their own ſide, and when their main body ſhould joyn with the Enemy, they ſhould violently break out again from the Wings, and ſhould on a ſudden furiouſly flanke the Romans, when they were charging the oppoſite reſerve. On the contrary part Regulus having well drawn up his Army, when he ſaw the Ele-
Polybius. phants in the Front of the Carthaginians, he ſoon takes advice, he brings his ſouldiers lightly armed to the Van, he ſets the well Compact foot-Companies in the Reſerve, the Horſe are drawn up in the Wings, the Army is firme in reſpect of depth, but much narrower then before; ſo that the chiefe danger being feared from the Enemies Elephants and Horſemen, they did indeed take a right courſe againſt the Elephants, but being in an open and Champain Country, there was room ſufficient for the Horſe to ſurround, the whole Army being ſo cloſe compacted. The Fight was began by the Elephants, which Xanthippus commanded to be led againſt the oppoſite Regiments, and the Romans making a great ſhout, ſet forward to meet them. The Horſe were likewiſe engaged in both Wings; but there the Romans being much inferiour in Number, and not able to reſiſt the Enemies charge, fled away. But the Foot which were of the Left Wing, (whether it were to avoid the Elephants, or that thereby they thought the more eaſily to obtain the Victory) charged the Mercenaries, and putting them to flight, purſued them to their very Camp. The reſt of the foot had an harder taske againſt the Elephants, by whoſe vaſt bodies
Frontin. Stratagem. 2. 2. Polyb. their ranks were diſordered, themſelves trodden under foot, and whole Companies like a falling houſe, ſtruck down to the ground, yet the very thickneſs of the Battell hindred them from breaking through; till at laſt they were diſtreſſed on all parts, for the Flanks and Rear were galled by the Horſe, the foremoſt who made a ſhift to break through the Elephants, were ſlain by the Enemy

Enemy ſtanding yet Entire, and the light-armed men flying in upon them. There was no leſs execution done in the Flight, the Elephants and Numidian Horſe purſuing them in an open plain place. Regulus with almoſt five hundred ſouldiers was taken alive by the Enemy; of the whole Army there eſcaped but about two thouſand (who had charged and put to flight the Mercenaries) who beyond all Hope, by their haſt, got ſafe into Clupea; of the Romans and their Aſſociates were ſlain about thirty thouſand. Of the Carthaginians there were not many wanting beſide eight hundred of the Mercenaries, who had fought againſt the Left Wing of the Enemy. When the Army returned to Carthage after ſo great a Victory, carrying the Roman Generall Priſoner, a multitude of Citizens came out to meet them, others ſtanding in the ſtreets, or in their houſes, beheld the ſpectacle with wonderfull Pleaſure, which they durſt lately ſcarce hope for; their mindes being not capable to believe ſo great an Happineſs attending them; For being of late ſo neer deſpair, giving not onely their Country, but very City for loſt, they durſt ſcarce believe ſo great a Change, though they ſaw it with their eyes: But they took moſt ſpeciall notice of the Generalls, every ones eye and thought being ſettled on them, looking ſometimes on Xanthippus, ſometimes on Regulus, Extolling the greatneſs of their own Commander, by the Eſtimation they had of the other. He muſt of neceſſity be a gallant Man who hath overcome ſo ſtout a Generall, ſo fortunate a Warriour, a proud Conquerour, an implacable Enemy, the Terrour and Plague of Carthage, now of a ſudden bereaved of a numerous Army, having loſt his antient Fame and Liberty together. Their Admiration was encreaſed by the habit and Garbe of the Man, who under a ſmall body, and none of the beſt lookes, carried a large and virtuous mind. For this Exploit Xanthippus had much glory, and withall as much envy, to avoid which he uſed as much art as in finiſhing the Warre, for whereas he might juſtly expect an everlaſting reward of his good ſervice at Carthage, yet he reſolved to leave thoſe doubtful hopes and full of Treachery, and return home, before other mens affections, or his own fortune were altered. For this is for the moſt part the diſpoſition of men, that openly they profeſs the love of their Country, but really ſtudy their own private good; as long as their City being in ſafety, they can obtain and quietly enjoy Honour and Riches, they pretend mighty love to their Country: But where there is danger leſt they ſhould beſtow the ſame benefits on others for their egregious merits, they had rather want a man who doeth good to the Common-wealth, then have him in the leaſt way hinder their private commodity: As long as they think themſelves able to equall others, their envy is hidden and more remiſs, but when they ſee themſelves farre exceeded, and that Honour duely given to others which they deſired for themſelves, then what they were not able by virtue to obtain, they ſeek it by Calumnies and Criminations. So that the beſt men have ordinarily moſt Enemies and are moſt ſubject to Treachery; But a Native of the Country hath ſome remedy againſt this Evill in his Friends and kindred; A ſtranger being voide of all helpe and aſſiſtance encreaſeth the Malice of degenerate mindes by his being eaſy to be hurt, in that he is more expoſed to Treaſons, and may without any great labour or danger be offended, affronted and undone. That Xanthippus apprehended and conſidered theſe things, the ſequel doth evidently demonſtrate, 'Tis reported he was drowned by ſome ſent after him from the Carthaginians, who after ſo great a benefit received, hated the Author of it, who being once dead, they thought it would quickly be forgot that their Countrey was preſerved by a Forreigner.

Others deny Xanthippus thus to have periſhed, yet confeſs the Treachery of the Carthaginians, who at his Departure allotted him an old ſhip, full of Leakes, fairly pitcht over as if it had been ſound, but that he diſcovering the Cheat, went aboard on another ſhip and eſcaped the danger. About the ſame time they committed another fact of no leſs Treachery, but much more cruell, by reaſon of the number that periſhed thereby. The Mercenarys in ſomewhat a tumultuous manner claiming a Reward of their paines taken, and happy Valour, were put into ſhips being made believe that in ſome other place they ſhould have their Deſire: But the Captains of the ſhips who had ſuch private Order, landed them and left them in a Barren Iland, where being deſtitute of all helpe from man, without food, without ſhips, having famine on one ſide, and the Sea on the other, they pined away and periſhed; a fowl and horrid kind of Death. Others referre this Fact to former times, when there was warre between the Syracuſans and Carthaginians, and that the Iland was thereupon called Oſtodes, or the Bonie Iland, it lieth in the main Sea beyond Lipara Weſtward. Theſe deeds whenſoever and howſoever performed, do nothing diſagree with the Carthaginians uſuall Cruelty. And if thus they ſerved their Friends and Aſſociates, it is no wonder, they were more then ordinarily ſevere againſt their Enemies. Other Priſoners indeed were ſomewhat tolerably well uſed, for they likewiſe had many Captives at Rome, for whom they intended to make an Exchange. But againſt M. Regulus they could neither cover nor moderate their Anger, but vexed and afflicted him all manner of wayes; they allowed him food which was neither pleaſant to the Palate, nor ſtrengthening to the Body, but which with much adoe by a ſlitgh nouriſhment ſerved to produce his Miſerable life. But more grievous were the Contumelies and Reproaches daily heaped upon him, amongſt the reſt, they would frequently on a ſudden introduce an Elephant, to fright him with the noiſe and ugly ſhape of it, not ſuffering him to reſt neither in Mind or body, and being thus miſerably handled, and brought low, they caſt him into the common Gaole.

Livie 28. 2. Zonaras Diodor. 5. 11.

When these things were heard at Rome, the City was filled not only with great grief but with fear also; for they mistrusted least the Carthaginians, provoked with the sense of their own calamities, and encouraged by this victory, should recompence them in the like kind and dare to come even to the walls of Rome to inflict on them the same mischiefs themselves had suffered. The Senate therefore commanded the Consuls, To strengthen Italy as diligently as might be with sufficient Garrisons, themselves with a vast Navy to sail into Sicily, and thence if they thought fit into Africa, to divert the Carthaginians from any expedition into Italy. But the Carthaginians in the first place made it their care to reduce those Cities which the Romans had possessed, to punish those Africans who had revolted from them, and by strength of arms to vanquish those who persisted in rebellion. Clupea was indeed by the Romans stoutly defended, but in Numidia, and over the other Africans (though their war was great) their victory was easie.

Polybius 1.36. In the mean time, understanding that a great Fleet was preparing in Italy, they left the siege of Utica which they had commenced, trimmed up the old ships, built new ones, and studiously endeavour'd to prevent the Romans from landing on the African shore. The Consuls used such Zonaras incredible diligence, that by the beginning of Summer they had three hundred and fifty ships ready fitted and laden, with which sailing to Sicily, when they found all things safe there, and no danger, but that they were full of expectations and fears, they left Garrisons where most need was, and with the rest of their army steared towards Africa. But being by a tempest forced upon Cossura (an Iland between Africk and Sicily, near the Promontory of Lilybæum) Strab. b.17 Zonaras. Polybius. Strabo they wasted the grounds there, took a City of the same name, and placed a Garrison in it. Then they set forward to the Promontory of Hermæus, which being in the mid-way between Carthage and Clupea, shutteth in one side of the Carthaginian Gulf. At this place the Carthaginian Navy met them, and a very sharp fight was entred into on both sides, when help came to the Romans from Clupea, which totally inclined the victory, being before doubtful. An hundred and four of the Carthaginian ships were sunk, thirty taken, and fifteen thousand souldiers lost; Eutropius Orosius Polybius Orosius Zonarus on the Roman side eleven hundred men were lost, and nine ships. The fleet then sailed to Utica, where they landed their men, and pitched their Camp near the City; The Carthaginians likewise brought their forces thither under the conduct of Hanno, where in a land fight they were overcome with the loss of above nine thousand men. There were some Noble men taken prisoners, whom the Consuls reserved whereby to redeem M. Regulus and others who were in the like condition. They then consulted on present affairs, and conceived great hopes Polyb. they might keep Africk in possession: Nevertheless the country round about being plunder'd and spoiled, they, fearing a famine, thought fit to return into Sicily, together with those Ro- Eutropius, Polybius mans who had defended Clupea. They carried away very vast and rich spoils, which had been laid up in Clupea in the time of Regulus his prosperity, and much encreased by late victories. They had a safe Voyage into Sicily, and sufficiently fortunate had been the Consuls if they would have set a bounds to their happinesse. But because in their return to Italy they thought by the by to take some Port towns of Sicily, not regarding the ship-masters counsel (who advised them, Not to sail in those dangerous and rough seas against the coast of Africa, now Orion and the Dog Star were rising) they suffered such shipwrack by tempest as hath hardly been heard Eutropius Diodorus. of, of three hundred threescore and four ships, scarce fourscore, having cast out all their lading, were saved; much about the same number of horse-boats and other sorts of vessels were lost, b.13 Polyb.1 insomuch as the whole shore, even from the coast of Camarina (where the storm began) to Pachynus, was filled with the Corps of dead men, and horses, and pieces of broken ships. In Diodorus. this their hard distresse the humanity of King Hiero was no small comfort to them, who bountifully entertained them, furnishing them with cloths, and victuals, and tackling for their ships, and conducted them safe to Messana. But the Carthaginians made no delay to take advantage Zonarus of this their misfortune, they presently regained the Iland and City of Cossura; and forthwith Diodorus crossing over into Sicily besieged Agrigentum under the command of Carthalo, and no relief coming, they took it and demolished it: A great multitude of persons were here slain and taken prisoners, the others, who escaped through the midlands into the territories of Syracuse, planted themselves in a Village near the Temple of Jupiter Olympus. Neither were they out Zonarus. of hopes of recovering the whole Iland, but that the Romans associates confirmed and strengthened themselves against present fears, hearing what diligence was used in preparing a new Navy; Polib. for the Consuls were so intent upon the work, that with wonderful speed, in the space of three 499. moneths, an hundred and twenty ships were built. With these Cn. Cornelius L.F. C.N. Scipio Asina, and A. Atilius A.F. C.N. Calatinus being Consuls again, having made a new leavy of stout souldiers, were commanded with the first opportunity to set to sea. This Cn. Val.Max.6.9.11 Cornelius was a great example of the Inconstancy of Fortune, and of Patience in Adversity, for having seven years agoe, when he was Consul, been circumvented by the craft of the Carthaginians, and suffer'd captivity, imprisonment and chains, and whatsoever misery is incident to mankind, he now resumed not only the other Ornaments of his degree, but likewise the Consular Dignity with so much the more joy, by how much the sadder misfortune he had been before bereaved of them.

The Consuls having arrived at Messana, and joyned to themselves what ships they found there, being chiefly the Relicks of the last ship-wrack, sailed with two hundred and fifty ships to the mouth of the River Himera, and took by treachery the Town of Cephalœdium, ſome eighteen miles diſtant upon the ſame ſhore: From Drepanus (for thither they had ſteared their courſe) they departed without effecting their purpoſe, being not able to take it on the ſudden, and Carthalo having ſent thither ſupplies in caſe of a ſiege. Being not thereby diſcouraged from farther attempts, they happily accompliſhed another deſign of greater moment. They directed their courſe to Panormus, the principal City of the Carthaginians juriſdiction, and poſſeſſing the Haven, ſate down under the very Walls, and the Panormitans refuſing to yield, they encompaſſed the City with a Ditch and Bulwark. The nature of the ground favour'd their intendments, yielding plenty of materials and wood for their works, which being finiſhed, they began the aſſault, and battered down with their Engines a Tower by the ſea ſide, and the ſouldiers entring by the breach, with great ſlaughter of the enemy, took the outward City, which was called New Panormus; the old City did not long hold out, for a great number flying thither out of the new City, bringing along with them more terror then proviſions, they were dejected with conſideration of their preſent danger, and fearing ſudden ſcarcity, ſent meſſengers to the Conſuls with propoſals to yield up all but their bodies; the Conſuls knowing the wants of the beſieged, accepted not the conditions unleſs they would redeem themſelves at a certain price. Every head was valued at two Minæ, fourteen thouſand perſons were ranſomed, the reſt, being thirteen thouſand were ſold together with the plunder. This Victory was very glorious, of great and ſudden concernment, for hereupon many Towns on that coaſt, ſome alſo far diſtant, caſt out the Carthaginian Garriſons and ſubmitted themſelves to the Romans. The Jetines began, and their example was followed by the Soluntines, Petrines, Tyndaritans and others. Affairs being thus tranſacted, and a Garriſon left at Panormus, the Conſul returned to Meſſana and ſo to Rome. The Carthaginians lying in wait for them at their return, ſurpriſed ſome ſhips of Burthen with mony in them.

to

At Rome there was two Naval Triumphs made immediately one after another, by the former year Conſuls (whoſe command was prorogued) over the Coſſurans and Carthaginians; Serv. Fulvius triumphed the thirteenth of the Calends of February, and M. Aimilius the day after. The five hundreth year after the foundation of the City a fruitleſſe expedition was made into Africa. Cn. Servilius Cn.F. Cn.N Capio, and Cn. Sempronius Ti. F. Ti. N. Blæſus being Conſuls, croſſed over into Sicily, where having in vain attempted Lilybæum, they directed their courſe to Africk with two hundred and threeſcore ſhips, and ſailing along the coaſt and ſometimes landing, they took many Towns and got great plunder. They effected nothing of greater moment, being hindred of entring into the moſt convenient Towns by the Carthaginians who every where met them with very good courage, having recovered whatſoever M. Regulus had poſſeſſed, and puniſhed the revolters. For Hamilcar having ranged through Numidia and Mauritania, had reduced and quieted all that Tract, impoſing a fine of a thouſand Talents of ſilver, and twenty thouſand Oxen, and puniſhing the prime men who were thought to favour the Romans, three thouſand whereof were Crucified. But the enemies encounter was not ſo formidable to the Romans as their own ignorance in the places, and their dangers in the ſea; for ſailing to Meninx, an Iland of the Lotophagi, near unto the leſſer Syrtis, they ſtruck upon ſhallow places, the Tide going out, and were detained till the ſhips being emptied of their burthens, were by the Tide coming in again relieved from extreme danger. Having therefore eſcaped ſo great a diſtreſſe, and fearing thoſe dangerous places, without delay they ſailed away as if they fled, not that no leſſe a calamity attended them then what they had avoided. To Panormus indeed they returned very ſafe; but in their Voyage to Italy, as they ſailed about the Promontory of Palinurus, which reacheth out into the ſea from the Lucanian Mountains, a terrible ſtorm ariſing ſank above threeſcore great ſhips, together with many horſe-boats and veſſels of Burthen. The City being exceedingly grieved at ſuch frequent loſſes, as if the very winds and water denyed the Romans the Soveraignty of the ſea, the Senate decreed that their Navy ſhould conſiſt but of threeſcore ſhips, for the guard of Italy and tranſportation of proviſions to their Army in Sicily. Nevertheleſſe this misfortune hindred not one of the Conſuls C. Sempronius from his Triumph over the Carthaginians on the Calends of April, ten dayes after Cn. Cornelius Proconſul had made the like Triumph. There were Cenſors that year created at Rome, but L. Poſthumius L.F. L.N. Megellus (who was likewiſe then Pretor) dying in his Office, the other Cenſor D. Junius D. F. D.N. Pera did alſo lay down his Office.

Yet it was a great advantage to have the poſſeſſion of ſo conſiderable a place, and hereby the Romans wiped away that diſgrace they had heretofore received at this City, for they had failed of their expectation of taking this City (named likewiſe Thermæ) by the covetouſneſs of their ſouldiers. [For a certain Captive within the City, to whom was committed the cuſtody of one of the Gates, that he might thereby recover his liberty, did upon an appointed night give admittance to the Roman Souldiers, who were ſent to take poſſeſſion of the City. When the chief of them were entred, they deſiring to ingroſs the richeſt ſpoils unto themſelves, gave order, To have the Gates ſhut again and no more men to be let in. Whereupon the Thermitans receiving an Alarme took arms, and the Romans by reaſon of their ſmall number not able to reſiſt, and having no relieſe from their Friends, whom they had ſhut out, were rewarded according to their Folly, being every man of them ſlain.] Himera being thus reduced into the Roman Power, C. Aurelius the Conſull thinketh of beſieging Lipara, which had been ſo often in vain attempted; And in order thereunto gathereth together the choiceſt ſouldiers they had in all Sicily, and borrowing ſhips of Hiero, tranſporteth them into the Liparæan Iland. From whence having occaſion to return to Meſſana, to conſult the Entrailes of Sacrifices, he deputed his Lieutenant in the ſiege his Kinſman P. Aureolus Pecuniola (ſome ſay Q. Caſſius a Colonell) with order, diligently to defend the Workes, but otherwiſe not to fight at all: But he, not obſerving the Conſulls advice, and thinking it would much redound to his Credit, to take Lipara in his abſence, made an Aſſault upon the City, and that to his Coſt; for, not being able to Maſter it, he loſt many men, and by a ſally out of the Town had one of his Forts ſet on fire, having alſo much adoe to defend his Camp. But upon the return of Aurelius, Fortune wheeling about, there was a very great ſlaughter made at the taking of the City, after which he proceeded to the puniſhment of the Colonell, whom he commanded to be beaten with ſtripes, and take pay among the common ſouldiers; a very remarkable ſeverity, whereof he made ſome other proofes in the time of his Conſullſhip. When Lipara was taken, an Immunity was granted to the Poſterity of Timaſitheus (once Governour of theſe places) that they ſhould for ever be free from all Taxes and Tribute; wherein the Romans manifeſted the conſtancy of their Thankfulneſs, not to be outworne by time; becauſe when the Pirates of Lipara had taken a Golden Cup, which they had ſent to Apollo of Delphos, Timaſitheus cauſed both it, and the Embaſſadours who conveighed it, to be ſafely conducted into Greece, and the Men back again to Rome.

Diodorus

The Romans afterward beſieging Ercta a very ſtrong Caſtle, with forty thouſand foot, and a thouſand Horſe, were neither able to take it, neither durſt they fight with the Carthaginians: For ſince the misfortune of M. Regulus, the Romans ſtood ſo much in fear of the Elephants that they alwayes avoided Battell. Oftentimes within the Territories of Lilybæum, and often in the Selinuntian fields, they have ſtood in Battell-array about halfe a mile from the Enemy, yet durſt neither venture according to their wonted Courage, to begin the Charge, or deſcend into plain and open ground, but ſtill kept themſelves in craggy and difficult places. The Carthaginians hereupon erecting their Spirits, (ſeeing they now had Confidence in their land Army, and knew the Romans had had greater loſſes by tempeſts at Sea, then themſelves by unluckie fights, eſpecially having intelligence of the Senates Reſolution to ſet out no more Navies) conceived hopes of recovering Sicily, if they did but ſend good ſtore of land and ſea-forces thither. But their main impediment was want of Money, the late continuall Warres having exhauſted their Old ſtore, and conſumed their new raiſed Taxes. They ſent therefore Embaſſadours to Ptolomy King of Egypt, to borrow two thouſand Talents of Money. The King being loath to offend either them, or the Romans (being both in League with him) offered himſelf as a Mediatour of Peace between them: But notwithſtanding all importunities he denied the Carthaginians Requeſt, ſaying He would willingly helpe a Friend againſt an Enemy, but thought it not fit to aſſiſt one Friend againſt another. About the ſame time at Rome Tib. Coruncianus was the firſt of the Plebeians who was created Chief Prieſt. The ſame year alſo Cenſors were created, becauſe the Duties of that Office could not laſt year be performed, one of the Cenſours dying, and the other laying down his Commiſſion, M. Valerius M. F. M. N. Maximus Meſſalla, and P. Sempronius P. F. P. N. Sophus made the ſeven and thirtieth Luſtration. Two hundred ninety ſeven thouſand, ſeven hundred ninety ſeven Citizens were rated. This was a ſad and ſevere Cenſourſhip, for in taking a view of the Senate, Thirteen were degraded, four hundred young Knights had their horſes taken away, and made common ſtipendarie ſouldiers. This came to paſs by the Complaint of C. Aurelius the Conſull, who informed the Cenſours, That in Sicily, when need required, being commanded to their Duty, they had refuſed to obey. The Conſull, not content with this Revenge for their contempt of Diſcipline, prevailed likewiſe with the Senate to keep back their Pay. And truely as times then went, the conſideration of his ſeverity and ſtrictneſs of Diſcipline, as well as his exploits performed, was occaſion of his Triumph made over the Carthaginians and Sicilians upon the Ides of April. The next year was fuller of Threats, then action: For great preparations being made on both ſides, and each ſtanding in ſome fear of the other, the whole ſummer paſſed away without any conſiderable thing done. L. Cæcilius L. F. C. N. Metellus, and C. Furius C. F. C. N. Pacilus, being Conſulls, tranſporting their Legions over into Sicily, neither themſelves much provoked the Enemy, or were provoked by them, though Aſdruball a new Carthaginian Generall was lately come thither with two hundred ſhips, an hundred and forty Elephants, and twenty thouſand Horſe and Foot. This buſineſs cauſed the Senate to enter into Conſultation of preparing another Navy; for the Publick Treaſures began to be exhauſted by protracting the Warre, and ſince the Misfortune of M. Regulus, the Legions degenerated from their wonted Valour, and though all things ſhould ſucceed proſperouſly at Land, yet 'twas manifeſt, the Carthaginians could not be kept off Sicily, ſo long as they had the ſovereignty of the Seas. Reſuming therefore their former reſolutions, they began to put confidence again in their ſhips, and with all care to trimme the old, and build new ones. In the mean time L. Metellus being left at Panormus, C. Furius returned to Rome, to the chuſing of the new Conſuls, who were C. Atilius M. F. M. N. Regulus, and and L. Manlius A.F. P.N. Vulſo, to theſe was committed the charge of preparing the Navy and men for the ſhips; L. Metellus was continued in his Command, with Commiſſion to manage the War in Sicily as Proconſul. 503 Polyb. 1. 39

Aſdruball underſtanding that one of the Romans Generals was abſent with half their forces, and computing with himſelf, that though the Armies had long ſtood in Battel-aray one againſt the other, the Romans had out of fear declined fight, being now no longer able to bear the complaints of his own ſouldiers who accuſed him of cowardize, he drew all his forces out of Lilybæum, and after a long and difficult march through the Selinuncian Territories, he invaded thoſe of Panormus and there pitched his Camp. It fortun'd, that the Proconſul, with the remainder of the Roman ſtrength was then at Panormus to guard their Aſſociates, now harveſt grew on, in reaping and carrying in their grain. He, having inteligence that ſome of the enemies ſpies lay ſecretly at Panormus, commanded every man in the City to meet together in an Aſſembly, then giving order they ſhould examine one another, and queſtion thoſe who were leaſt known, What they were, or what buſineſs they had at Panormus, found out the ſpies and ſeized on them. By them he underſtood the enemies deſigns, and obſerving there was more raſhneſs then good counſel in their expedition, pretended great fear, and kept himſelf within the works of the City, that ſo he might encreaſe their fooliſh confidence. Whereupon Aſdruball growing bolder, advanced his forces, ſpoiling and burning all the corn in the fields, and marching up even to the walls of the City. The Proconſul regarded neither the loſs ſuſtained nor the diſgrace thence redounding, foreſeeing that if he did a little longer forbear, the Carthaginians would ſufficiently ſatisfie him for both with good Uſe. Above all, he thought good to expect till they croſſed the River Orethus, which runneth on the South ſide of the Town, and then he had contrived a ſure and ſudden Victory. To effect this, as all other things were ordered to ſignifie his fear, ſo he placed but few ſouldiers upon the walls, deſiring that the enemy ſhould not underſtand either the courage or number of his men. This counſel ſucceeded according to his expectation, both the enemy by his confidence, and fortune by a ſudden chance furthering the deſign: For Aſdruball Forded the River with his Foot, Horſe and Elephants, and planted his Camp cloſe under the walls of the City, with ſo much contempt of the enemies Cowardize, that he pitched his Tents without any works of defence about them, thinking there was no need of ditch or bulwark.

Thither the Sutlers and Merchants bringing great plenty of Corne and Wine, the Mercenaries drank ſtoutly, and elevating their voices according to their ſeveral diakects, in much noiſe and confuſion gave good notice of their preſent temper, that they were not very ſober. Then did the Proconſul think the fitteſt time to ſend thoſe his men who were ready armed to provoke the enemy to fight, and it ſucceeded ſo happily, that ſtill ſending out by degrees freſh ſupplies, Aſdrubal's whole Army at length came out of the Camp. L. Cæcilius the Proconſul placeth part of the light armed men before the Trench, giving order, If the Elephants approached to fling their darts at them, and if they found themſelves ſore preſſed to retire into the Trench, and thence come out again to a freſh charge. The mean Artificers and common rout he commanded to carry darts and weapons, and fling them over the wall that the light armed men ſhould not want plenty of them. Himſelf with his companies completely armed, ſtood in Rank and File within the gate over againſt the enemies right Wing. They who were already engaged ſometimes being overpower'd in number retreated in good order, ſometimes being aſſiſted by ſupplies from the Town did maintain the fight. When the Rectors of the Elephants deſiring in emulation to ſeem Authors of the Victory as well as Aſdrubal, and advancing with their beaſts, beat back thoſe who oppoſed them, and raſhly preſſing upon them (as they retired toward the City) came up even to the Trench. But then a ſhower of Arrows flying from the walls, and freſh light armed men aſſaulting them with Spears and Darts, the Elephants being wounded began to rage, and betaking themſelves which way ſoever anger and pain led them, turned upon their own men, trampled under foot, routed and diſorder'd whole companies of armed men.

Whereupon the Proconſul crying, This is the time of the long look't for Victory, iſſueth out, and being freſh and in good rank had an eaſie victory over the confuſed multitude of the enemy; there was a great ſlaughter made both in the field and in the purſuit, their calamity being encreaſed by a ſudden chance which one would have thought of advantage to them: For about the ſame time the Carthaginian Navy appearing at ſhore, the whole multitude trembling and blind with fear, promiſcuouſly ran thither as to the only refuge, in which hurly burly many were trodden under feet by the Elephants; many venturing to ſwim, and many too haſtily ſcaling the ſhips and tumbling down periſhed in the ſea. Neither before this time nor after it, amongſt all their proſperous exploits, had the Romans any Victory more glorious; whereby the Romans reſumed their former confidence and courage, and the enemy was ſo diſheartened with fear, that they caſt off not only all hopes but all thoughts of a land Army ſo long as that War laſted.

Twenty thouſand Carthaginians are ſaid to be ſlain, ſix and twenty Elephants were preſently taken, and afterward all the reſt. For the Proconſul thinking it hard for his ignorant men to catch the beaſts being looſe and enraged, commanded a Cryer by Proclamation to promiſe, Liberty and ſafety to any priſoner by whoſe means the Elephants ſhould be taken; hereby laying firſt first hold on those who were most gentle and familiar, by their help they easily brought in the rest. L. Metellus sent them all to Rome, having invented a pretty way for their transportation; for his ships not being fit for the purpose, he gathered and bound together many Hogsheads, fastning a Rafter between every two that they should neither dash together nor yet part one from the other, then planking them over, spreading earth and durt upon them, and erecting walls on each side in the form of stables, the Elephants otherwise very fearful of sailing by water, entred them and were safely conveighed to Rhegium.

Asdrubal from this overthrow escaped to Lilybæum, but being condemned at Carthage while he was absent, and afterward upon his return apprehended, he was accordingly executed. The Carthaginians now considering their Armies were routed, their Elephants taken, all Sicily lost except Lilybæum and Drepanus, that the Romans having again set out a Navy, were very potent both at land and sea, began to think of Peace, willing to accept of it on any tolerable conditions. Whereupon they remembred M. Regulus and the conditions he once propounded to them, and perswaded themselves that by his means they might prevail either for peace or at least for what they next desired, an exchange of prisoners; nothing doubting but that for his own sake he would effectually interpose himself in such a business: For what man can be imagined so obstinate as not to free himself from the miseries of a Gaole, and desire to see his dearest relations, and enjoy his Liberty, Country, Dignities and Honours? M. Regulus hath a wife and children at Rome, friends and kindred in the Senate and publick offices, a Cousin German now Consul, he is both much beloved by the Senate and people of Rome for his former victories, and pitied for his afflictions; if therefore he beareth any good will to himself, or findeth any respect from his friends, no man certainly will be more earnest in prosecuting, or is more likely by favour to effect such a design.

Zonaras.

He accepted the employment, not out of any hope or desire to do himself good, as afterward appeared, but that he might in person the more effectually move the Senate to have a care of the Commonwealth. So being joyned with the Carthaginian Embassadors, when he was come to the City, he would not enter the Gates though much entreated by the Romans, alledging, The Custome of his Country to give Audience to the Embassadors of an enemy without the City. The Senate being accordingly assembled, he amongst the Carthaginian Embassadors delivered his Message, That himself also being by the War a servant to the Carthaginians, had command from his Masters to propound chiefly, That the war may be concluded upon what terms should seem fit to both parties, or that at least an exchange of prisoners would be granted. The Embassadors presently withdrawing, he likewise accompanied them; neither, though he was earnestly solicited, would he be present in the Senate at the debate of the business till the Carthaginians assented to it. Then sitting silent till his opinion was required, he thus expressed himself, 'Conscript Fathers,

'I am still a Roman: my Body indeed, as Fortune would have it, is in the power of the enemies, but my Soul, not subject to Fortune, is still the same. Following therefore the reason 'of my Soul, which is my own, rather then the inclinations of my Body, which is anothers, my 'advice is, You would neither exchange prisoners nor conclude a peace. For to restore the 'Captives while the war continueth is disadvantageous: They have no Commanders in hold 'but my self who am an old man, you have many, and those young, amongst which are some 'no way to be despised. And to finish the war, unless upon very ample terms, or without a 'complete universal Victory, as it becometh not your Wisdom, so it is pernicious to the Com-'monwealth. I know you meet with many difficulties in managing the war, for no great affairs 'can be transacted without great pains and cost: But if you rightly consider the state of Car-'thage, you will find all things tending to victory to be much the better on your part. We 'were indeed once overcome in a great Battel, whether it were my fault or fortunes; but we have 'so often routed their Armies, that the confidence they had assumed upon my overthrow is now, 'by the Victory at Panormus, pressed down to the utmost despair. They have lost all Sicily, 'except one or two Cities, and in the other Ilands their condition is naught. You have a Navy 'which they dare not encounter, so that in that part of the war ye are also superiours. And 'the losses ye have sustained by Tempest hath not bereaved you of so much strength as it hath 'taught you Circumspection. The want of money perhaps is equal on both sides; but the Ita-'lians are more obedient to you then are the Africans to the Carthaginians, whom as they ne-'ver truly loved, so have they of late learn't to hate more perfectly. For not being provoked 'by any such injury they revolted freely to me, but now since their former masters have wasted 'their Grounds, plundred their Cattel, exacted their Monies and slain their Nobles, what do 'you think they can more desire, then that a new Army would come from hence into Africa? 'But that your leavyes of men are easie and large, that your souldiers are valiant, of the same 'Language, the same Mind, the same Manners, Religion, City and Kindred, I take to be so great 'an advantage, that if in all things else ye were exceeded, this one only thing would be suffici-'ent to balance the war, and make the Victory doubtful on the enemies side, for what 'help is there in a company of Mercinaries against such a force? and if there were any, the 'Carthaginians have bereaved themselves of it by their cruelty, and they have made it now as 'difficult to hire strangers, as it was before to govern them. Xanthippus to whom Carthage 'is indebted for its preservation, having been so ingratefully and treacherously used, is sufficient 'warning to others how they lend their assistance to such a people who know not how to recom-'pence the greatest desert but by the greatest injuries. Nay, the very common and meanest

'Barbarians, a Britiſh and ſlaviſh ſort of men, will be deterred by Cruelties ſo often exerciſed 'upon their Fellowes, who have been ſometimes murthered by hangmen, or their fellow Soul-'diers, ſometimes expoſed into barren and uninhabited Ilands, receiving inſtead of the pay 'they have fought for, moſt inhumane puniſhments, and horrible deaths. And this Conſcript 'Fathers is my Opinion, that neither Peace is to be made with Carthage, nor yet an exchange 'of Priſonersgranted.

This Counſell diſpleaſed not the Senate, if it could have been executed with the ſafety of him who gave it; but the more he neglected himſelfe for the Common good, the more they pitied him, and manifeſtly inclined upon any termes whatſoever to reſtore ſo Gallant and Generous a Perſon to his Country. And voices were given out, that ſeeing he was now ſo happily returned from forreign Captivity, he might lawfully tarry in the City, or be detained there. The High Prieſt likewiſe affirmed, that he might ſtay, without incurring the guilt of Perjury. But he to the Amazement of the Senate it ſelfe, with a fierce Spirit, and ſevere Countenance, proceeded, ſaying, Why do ye not reſolve this doubt? follow my Advice and regard not me. Ye in 'vain attempt that which will be neither pleaſing to your ſelves, nor profitable to the Country, 'nor honeſt in me For ſuppoſe, for a while ye would be willing and joyfull to ſee me amongſt 'you, when once the ſhort ſpurt of this affection is vaniſhed, the Baſeneſs of my Return will 'make me more odious to you, then my abſence made me deſirable. For my part I am reſolved 'not to live in that City, where after an African ſlavery, I cannot maintain the dignity of an 'honeſt Citizen, and if I ſhould deſire it, my fidelity would hinder it, the remembrance of my 'ſacred Oath would hinder it, and my Reverence of the Gods, by the Invocation of whom I 'aſſured the Carthaginians of my return: And ſhould I forſwear my ſelfe, I fear that Revenge 'would be taken not only on me, but on your ſelves, and the whole Roman People alſo. The 'Gods, believe me, are no vain things, and will not without Puniſhment be affronted by the 'Perjuries and Contempts of Man. If any one be of opinion that in Religion I may be abſol-'ved, that the bookes of the Augurs mention expiations of ſuch crimes, and that Attone-'ment may be made by Ceremonies and Sacrifices for Perjury and Treaſon; I would have him 'underſtand the Majeſty of the Gods is more ſevere, then being offended by Perjury, to be ap-'peaſed by any Inventions of Men, neither is it agreeable to Reaſon, that a Guilt contracted by 'the ſins of man, ſhould be waſhed away with the blood of Beaſts. As for my ſelfe, I am not 'ignorant that great and exquiſite torments are prepared for me at Carthage. But to deceive a 'truſt, I think to be worſe then all of them, for this would indeed hurt me, as for the Tor-'ments they hurt only ſomething about me. I hink not that man miſerable, who is able to endure 'miſery. Slavery, Reproach, Contempt, Griefe Hunger and Watching, I never yet eſteem-'ed evill, but now by a long cuſtom they have left off to be troubleſom to me. That they are 'tollerable, I have learn't by ſuffering them; and if once they be intended to that degree, as not 'to be born by Man, Death will quickly free me not only from them, but from all other Ca-'lamities. Nothing therefore is to be feared for him who feareth not Death, which is eaſie at 'any time to obtain, and truely I had inflicted it on my ſelfe, but that I thought it the part of a 'man rather to overcome ſorrow then to avoid it. I have ſpoken theſe few and confuſed words, 'that ye may underſtand, I am not to be perſwaded from my Opinion, and withall that you 'ſhould not bewaile me as an unfortunate and miſerable Man: My Reſolution is eaſy and con-'ſtant: 'Tis my care to return to Carthage, what I ſhall there ſuffer I leave to the 'Gods.

'Tis reported that the more effectually to move them he affirmed, that before he was diſmiſſed from Carthage, they had given him a gentle Poiſon, which by ſlow degrees feeding on his vitall ſpirits, ſhould conſume him after the exchange was made. Wonderfull was the conſtancy of this Man, who rather then ſwerve from the Rule of Honeſty, did with more earneſtneſs purſue Contumelies, Torments and Death, then others avoid them; a true and profitable Leſſon to Poſterity, That thoſe men only are prepared to endure any Torments, and are conſtant in their honeſt reſolutions, who have a ſenſe of their own nobility, and think themſelves borne not onely for this world For certainly M. Regulus would not willingly have undergone ſo great miſeries, if he had not thought that after Death there are great Rewards for the Virtuous, and great puniſhment for evill men. The Senate therefore having made a Decree according to the opinion of M. Regulus, he with a ſettled countenance followed his Sullen and angry Maſters, by whom it appeared that they would cruelly revenge the indignity of their repulſe upon his Perſon, inſomuch as many were moved to detain him againſt his will. Moreover his Wife Marcia, and his Children making Lamentable complaints, the Conſulls ſaid, if he tarried they would not deliver him up, neither would they hinder his going. So he refuſing to diſcourſe with his Wife, and avoiding the Embraces and kiſſes of his little Children, was carried back to Carthage, where with cruell torments he was put to death. For cutting off his Eyelids, they kept him awhile in a dark place, then in the heat of the Sunſhine they ſuddenly brought him out, and forced him to look up into the ſky, at length they put him into a Wooden cheſt (right over againſt the Sun) full of nailes on the inſide, and ſo narrow that he was forced alwayes to ſtand upright; if at any time he lean't on one ſide to eaſe his weary body he was pricked and goared with the nails, and ſo in torment and continuall watching yielded up the Ghoſt.

This was the end of M. Atilius Regulus, much more glorious then his Life, though long led with with great honesty and Honour: He was a man of great Integrity of Manners, of an Invincible Spirit, and for his Counsell not to be despised, wherein neither his own nor after ages could accuse him, but that he seemed not very moderately to bear his prosperous Fortune, and that by denying the Carthaginians request he was the occasion of the wars continuance for many years after to the great detriment of both Cities. But he wiped off this his fault by his other many egregious virtues, and chiefly by his wonderful constancy at his death, being more happy in suffering calamitie then if he could have avoided it. The Senate hearing the news of his death, and the Barbarous cruelty of the Carthaginians, delivered up the Noblest of the Captives to Marcia and her children, whom they shut up in an Engine thrust through with sharp irons, resolving to put them to the like death as Regulus had suffered; for five whole daies they had no food allowed them; in which Bostar with grief and hunger pined to death; Hamilcar being stronger in body continued five dayes longer, shut together with the carcasse of Bostar, with sustenance sufficient only to prolong his miserable life, Till at length the Magistrates understanding what was in doing, did restrain their cruelty, commanding that the Ashes of Bostar should be conveighed into his own Country, and that the other prisoners should be handled with more mercy. Whereby appears a remarkable difference of manners in the two Cities, in that the one being not unjustly offended, nor able with security to offend, with horrid punishments extinguished that virtue they ought to have reverenced; the other mitigated a most just revenge not regarding their own enraged grief, but the Rules of Humanity, and that moderation which becometh Illustrious Empires.

BOOK IX.

UPON the departure of the Carthaginian Embassadors the Consuls having Order from the Senate to transport their Army into Sicily, did very readily obey, being highly incensed against the enemy for M. Regulus his sake, and likewise provoked with emulation and conceiving great hopes from the Victory of L. Metellus Proconsul. For they measured not the greatnesse of the businesse so much by the losse of the Carthaginians, who were much weakened by the losse of an Army and so many Elephants, but chiefly they were encouraged because the souldiers, having successefully fought against the beasts, did now no more stand in fear of them. And hopes were conceived the war might suddenly be finished if opportunities were not neglected. The Consuls therefore with a Navy of two hundred ships, and four Legions sailed to Panormus, where taking in likewise the other forces and ships (unless what were left for the guard and security of some places) they went to Lilybæum with 240 Beaked ships, threescore Barks of a shorter size, called Cercuri, and many other vessels of all sorts, with resolution to make an assault upon it. This is that famous siege of Lilybæum, which beginning the fourteenth year of this war, lasted full ten years. and at length was ended, neither with the surprise of the City, nor with its surrendry, but together with the whole War. For both the Romans and Carthaginians well understanding of what concernment that City was, either to the Guard of the African Coast, or the Empire of Sicily, did with all their might, the one one assault, the other defend it. The Triumph of L. Metellus did somewhat comfort the City of Rome, after their sorrow for M. Regulus, not only with the memory and consideration of their successes, but with the sweetness of Revenge also over so cruell and inhumane a People: He Triumphed Proconsull over the Carthaginians, the seventh of the Ides of September, thirteen of the Enemies Commanders were led before his Charriot, and a great troope of Elephants, even an hundred and Twenty; some reckon many more. These being afterwards produced when the Games were celebrated, were chased up and down the Circus with speares headed with iron, that the People might accustome themselves to contemne those beasts they had heretofore so terribly feared. Verrius Flaccus affirmes they were all slain, the Romans not caring to make use of them themselves, and thinking it no way for the advantage of the Common-wealth, to make a Present of so considerable a strength to any Prince. The same yeare Corn was very cheap at Rome, a bushell for a penny, at the same price was sold a gallon of wine, thirty pound of dried figgs, ten pounds of oile, and twelve pound of flesh. For there was greater store of these Commodities then of money, which by the long continuance of warre grew very scarce. While these things hapned at Rome, the Consulls in Sicily assaulted Lilybæum with all their strength, and the besieged as stoutly resisted. The first attempt was against a Tower, which stood fartheſt toward the Libyan sea, this being demolished, they did by degrees proceed to those which were next, till they had destroyed six. For the more easy battering of the rest they began to fill up the Trenches, that they might draw over and plant their Engines. Though the labour were very great (for the ditch was threescore cubits broad, and forty deep) they did readily set upon and diligently promote the work. The Carthaginians to hinder their design, made holes on the inside of the Trench, out of which they cast the rubbidge again, but, the heapes still encreasing, and the ditch at length made even with the ground, (by reason of the multitude of Labourers) they changed their Counsell, and erected another wall within the former: Himilco being at all Workes indefatigable, who besides the multitude of Inhabitants in the City, had ten thousand Mercenaries, and did by his wisdom, Vigilance and constancy elude and overcome all the Enemies force and Stratagems. He suffered nothing to be out of order among his own men, nor any thing to be secure on the Enemies part; he built Work against Work, digged Mine against Mine, opposed Armes to Armes, sometimes he issued forth, fighting with such resolution, that in these tumultuary skirmishes there were sometimes slain little fewer, then usually fall in set Battells.

The Romans undermineing the Foundation of the Walls, Himilco made his countermine over against the place where he observed the Romans to cast out earth, and opening their Mine he sent in forthwith a Band of Armed souldiers, who set upon the naked Romans busie at work, and slew a great number; and as many were burnt with brush faggots (thrown into the Trench and set on fire) while they approached the Walls to helpe their fellowes. Notwithstanding feare and consternation of mind encreased among the besieged, whereby some Mercenary Commanders taking advantage, and pretending want of pay, plotted to betray the City to the Romans, nothing doubting but that they could easily induce every man his souldiers to approve of the design. On a certain night therefore slipping out of the Town into the Roman Camp, they declared the state of the City, and what they had intended; Amongst the other Mercenaries at Lilybæum, there was one Alexon an Achaian, a Man not unskilfull in Martiall Affaires, and of singular Integrity: He understanding the Traytors design, without delay discovers it to Himilco, Himilco as in a great and imminent danger, immediately summons together all the Mercenary Commanders, who were yet in the Town, declares to them what was in agitation, and by whom, and vehemently inveighing against them, he exhorteth those who are present, not to become partners in the rashness and Treachery of others, that persisting in their Duty, they should find all fair dealing from the Carthaginians, their Pay should be certain, and great Rewards moreover accumulated, that if they tainted themselves with the infamous crime of Treason, they would be hatefull to God and man; withall, as much money as in hast and fear he could at present raise, he distributes among them, promising that, himselfe would take care to set the Common souldiers pay assoone as may be discharged.

Polybius. 1. 43 Zonaras. Polyb.

An Oration made in season, hath certainly great power over the Minds of men, especially if the gravity of the speaker be mixed with truth and sincerity to be relied upon; Every one assented to what Himilco spake, and chearfully offered their utmost endeavours to continue their souldiers in their Duty. Himilco commending them, and furthermore encouraging them with hopes, commands every one to apply himselfe to his own Companys, and endeavour to keep them in subjection: He sendeth likewise along with them Hanniball, the son of Hannibal, who perished in Sardinia, and Alexon the Achaian; Hanniball to the Gaules, with whom he was acquainted, and very gratious, by Reason of his former conversation with them in the Wars; Alexon to other Marcenaries of severall Nations, by all whom he was equally beloved. These engaging their Words, that whatsoever Himilco had promised should be performed, so effectually made up the business, that the Traitors a while after returning to the Walls, were not onely kept out, but beaten back with darts, and reproached for their Villany. So they returning to the Consulls without effecting their Design, were nevertheless rewarded with Gifts, and had Land in Sicily bestowed on them.

Polybius. Carthaginians, though they were ignorant of what hapned at Lilybæum, did judge it fit to carry on affaires with much Vigour, therefore they commanded Adherbal the Admiral to provide a Navy and convey Men, Money, and Corne to Libybæum. By him was ſent Hannibal the ſon
Zonaras. Oroſius 4.10 of Hamilcar, who having a freſh gale of wind, from the Ægatian Ilands, ſailed directly into the Polyb. port of Lilybæum, his men ready armed for fight, and reſolving to break through all oppoſition. The Romans had from the beginning of the ſiege ſtopped up the mouth of the haven by ſinking fifteen ſhips, which they had for that purpoſe laden with ſtones, being therefore ſuddenly overtaken with the Enemies haſt, and fearing leſt themſelves might by the force of the winds be driven into the Port, a place made unſafe for Navigation, they did not at all oppoſe the Enemie. Hannibal ſafely entred the Harbour, and landing his men to the number of ten thouſand, was received into the City with very great joy of the Lilybætans. The Romans ſeeing they could not prevent the Enemies Arrival, entred into Conſultation how to defend their Works, which they thought Himilco would not delay to ſet upon, having ſo great a recruit of freſh ſouldiers; neither were they deceived, for Himilco intending to make uſe both of his new ſtrenght and of the Courage of the others now revived, ſummons all his forces together, and by hopes of Victory and ample rewards perſwades them to make a ſallie, and haveing diſpoſed his Companies as the Occaſion required, by break of day he aſſaulteth the Romans works in many places. The Romans were provided for them, and where they feared moſt danger had placed ſtrong Guards, with theſe a very ſharpe fight was begun, many fell on both ſides, for they fought with great Courage and Reſolution, and the number of men was great on each part, no leſs then twenty thouſand iſſued out of the City, and were oppoſed by a greater Multitude of the Beſiegers.
Diodor. For the Conſulls having raiſed Auxiliaries from their friends in Sicily, were above an hundred thouſand ſtrong, whereof threeſcore thouſand were imployed in the ſiege, the Reſidue being ſent abroad to bring in Proviſions. The fight therefore being very hot in every place, the ſharpeſt Contention was about the Engines, ſome ſtriveing to ſpoile them, other to defend them,
Polyb. 1.45 with ſo great Vehemence, that they ſpared their own lives no more then their Enemies. A great number of ſlaine men lay in that ſtation where the Aſſault firſt began, the Clamour and noiſe of the Warriours, and Terrour of the Battel were much encreaſed by another Company, which brake out, with links and torches, ruſhing, through all dangers and Deaths, to ſet fire on the Engines; and the Roman ſoulders were very neer giving place to the fierceneſſe of the Enemie, as no longer able to defend their Engines. But Himilco ſeeing many of his men periſh, and the Romans as yet nothing to remit of their Courage in reſiſting, ſounded a Retreat, and went firſt out of the Battel. Neither did the Romans purſue him, being content they had preſerved their works which were almoſt given for loſt.

The next night Hannibal, while the Enemy was weary after the fight, and obſerved not his Motion, ſecretly ſtole out of the Harbour with the ſhips he came in, and went to Adherbal
Diodor. at Drepanus, carrying along with him the Horſemen, who being of no uſe to the beſieged in a cloſe place, he rightly judged might otherwiſe be better employed. Theſe making frequent ex-
Zonaras curſions from Drepanus, infeſted the high ways, obſtructed the Conveiance of proviſions, ſurprized many forragers who ſtraggled far from the Campe, afflicted the Roman Aſſociates with all kinds of miſery, and very much confounded the counſells and deſignes of the Conſulls. Adherball likewiſe much perplexed them at ſea, ſuddenly falling ſometime on the Sicilian, ſometime on the Italian ſhore, leaving nothing unattempted whereby he might miſchief the Romans.
Diodorus Hence it came to paſs that there was great ſcarcity in the Roman Camp, for they had almoſt no food left but onely the fleſh of beaſts, many died of Famine, and many more, as is uſuall in ſuch caſes, of Diſeaſes; whereupon many thouſands periſhed, and therefore it was concluded that one of the Conſulls with his Legions ſhould return to Rome to the Aſſembly Zonaras of the People, that the other Beſiegers might have the greater Plenty. After this the Diodorus Romans again with greater pains and deligence endeavoured with earth and ſtones to ſtop up the mouth of the Haven, fortifying the Damme on both ſides with ſtrong pieces of timber joyned together croſs-wayes, and faſtned with iron Anchors, to conteine the heap of earth and Polyb 1.47. ſtones from waſhing away: But their labour though great proved fruitleſs, for the ſea was ſo deep, that whatſoever was flung in, was carried aſide before it lighted right, and upon the ariſing of Tempeſts, the Tide being very violent, deſtroyed their Work.

Diodorus. But the very fame of the Work did for a time keep the Haven block't up, which very much troubled the Carthaginians: that they could now by no means hold intelligence with their Polyb. 1.46 friends, neither durſt any man undertake to viſit the Lilybætans and give an account of their Condition, till at length one Hannibal ſirnamed Rhodius ingaged himſelf to enter the City, and having viewed all things, to returne with a faithfull Account. The promiſe pleaſed the Carthaginians: but they had little faith in it; becauſe they knew beſide the heapes of rubbiſh, that the Haven was watched and warded by the Roman ſhips at Anchor there: But he having rigged a private ſhip he had, ſailed to one of the Ilands over againſt Lilybæum, and the next day having a favourable wind, at ten of the clock in the day time, openly in the face of the

the enemy wondring at his confidence entred the Haven. But the Conſul to intercept him in his return, in the night time placed ten choice ſhips on each ſide the Haven, five as near the mouth as might be. Hannibal truſting in the ſwiftneſs of his Veſſel came out in the day time; the Romans were ready in the expectation of him, and with all their endeavours ſet forward againſt him, but he was ſo much too quick for them, that not contenting to eſcape he moreover inſulted over them, ſometimes ſailing, ſometimes wheeling about as if he would challenge them to fight. When he had often uſed this bold exploit, it proved of great advantage to the Carthaginian affairs, in that the Beſieged were infinitely comforted with meſſages from their friends, in that at Carthage they daily underſtood the ſtate and progreſſe of things at Lilybæum as occaſion required, and in that the Romans were ſo much aſhamed and madded at the raſhneſſe of the men which they could not revenge. He was much helped in his deſign by his knowledge of the Channel and the paſſages thereabouts; for between thoſe Fenny and mooriſh places whereby is the paſſage to Lilybæum, he diligently obſerved a very ſafe and ſure courſe for his ſhip. For when he came from the main Sea within ſight of the City, he ſo turned his ſhip, that the Stern of it was toward Italy, and from the Foredeck the Tower of Lilybæum which was upon the ſhore, hindred the ſight of all other Towers toward Africa, and this is the only ſafe way of entring the Harbour with full ſail.

And now many more being encouraged by the boldneſs aud ſucceſs of Hannibal, began to correſpond with Lilybæum, till at length by a certain chance a veſſel of great ſwiftneſs was taken. For though in other places the Romans Dams were carried away by the winds and water, yet in one place, where the Sea was ſomewhat ſhallow, they ſtood firm; there the ſhip ſtriking and being detained was taken by the Romans, and being furniſhed with ſtout ſouldiers and good rowers proved the ruine of Hannibal alſo. For having entred the City in the night time and returning in the open day, he ſpied this ſhip every where waiting upon his motion, whereupon apprehending danger, at firſt he fled, but that being in vain, he made ſome oppoſition and was taken by the Romans.

The Romans being poſſeſſed of this ſhip, and obſerving the ſame courſe of entring the Haven, did afterward eaſily hinder any other veſſels from ſailing to Lilybæum. The Beſiegers began now very fiercely to intend their main buſineſs, and aſſaulting one of the Works near the Sea, drew the whole company of the beſieged to defend that ſide where the ſtorm was made, whereby opportunity was given to other forces who were reſerved for that purpoſe to make an aſſault upon the contrary part and take the outward wall; but this proved in vain, for the Carthaginian General ſeaſonably coming with a ſupply of choice men, beat the Romans out with great ſlaughter. Another greater fortune gave the Beſiegers hope of the univerſal Victory; there aroſe by chance very great guſts of wind, which as it were on ſet purpoſe blew hard upon the Romans works, ſhaking their very Rampires, and tumbling down the Towers built thereon. The townſmen were not ignorant of this, and thought now an opportunity given them by the gods of firing the Romans Engins, which they had ſo often in vain aſſaulted. The ſubſtance of the Engins was very apt to take fire, having been long felled and dried with the heat of the Sun. The Romans were not ſlack in defending themſelves, but not to much purpoſe, for the enemy was directed by the light of the fire which had ſeized on the Engines, and aſſiſted with the ſtrength of the wind to caſt their darts more ſurely and with greater force, the others received no leſs hinderance and danger thereby, then by the weapons of the enemies, for the wind being fierce and againſt the Romans blew ſmoke, and flame, and aſhes into their mouths and eyes, and brought the enemies darts with greater violence upon them, whereas themſelves by reaſon of darkneſſe were uncertain whither to direct their ſtrokes, and by reaſon of the vehemency of the guſts were not well able to ſtand. So that all the Roman Engines and works either for digging of mines or battering the walls were every one conſumed by this fire.

Diodorus

Then was all hopes laid aſide of taking Lilybæum by force, and the ſiege had been preſently raiſed but that Hiero, ſending plenty of Corn and proviſion, perſwaded the Romans to ſtay; where not intending to make any more ſtorms upon the City, they did on every ſide fence their Camp, reſolving to commit the iſſue of things to Time and Fortune. The Beſieged likewiſe building up what part of their walls had been battered, were now the more encouraged to endure the ſiege hereafter. Theſe news were very ſadly entertained at Rome, nevertheleſs they determined by war to make up what loſſes by war they had ſuſtained: and their reſolution herein was ſo immoveable, that, 'tis ſaid, a Senator was ſlain in the very Court becauſe he made mention of Peace.

Polybius

Great preparations were now made, and a new leavy of ten thouſand Rowers ſent into Sicily, for they had ſuſtained a great loſſe of them. The Conſuls were P. Cladius Ap. F. C. N. Pulcher, and L. Junius C. F. C. N. Pullus. 'Tis falſely by ſome delivered, that this Cladius was the ſon of Cæcus. He, when he was come into Sicily and had taken poſſeſſion of the Army at Lilybæum, aſſembled the Souldiers together, and ſharply reprehended the former Conſuls, That by their idleneſs and luxury they had triſled away time before Lilybæum more like men beſieged then beſiegers, without any fruit, and to the loſſe and diſhonour of the Roman Majeſty. He was a very crabbed ſowr man, and being Violent by Nature, and Arrogant by reaſon of his Nobility, he was apt to let fall Speeches and perform Actions not well becoming a ſerious ſober man. He was very ſevere in puniſhing, letting paſſe no crime with pardon, but proſecuting even the very ſmalleſt with too great ſeverity; himſelf in matters of the greateſt moment miſerably failing, even to madneſs. For he followed the former Conſuls courſe which he had ſo ſharply condemned in damming up the Haven, and (what argued greater folly) he raſhly and inconſiderately aſſaulting Drepanus loſt a very gallant Fleet, no leſſe by his own indiſcretion then by the valour of Adherball. He perſwaded himſelf and his ſouldiers, that the enemy not having intelligence of what ſupplies were come from Rome, might be unawares ſurpriſed at Drepanus; not believing that the Romans had either courage or ſtrength ſufficient to provoke them at ſea. So that making choice of two hundred and twenty of the beſt ſhips with the ſtouteſt Rowers, and moſt valiant men out of the Legions (for they offered themſelves freely as to a ſhort buſineſſe and certain prey, Drepanus being not above fifteen miles from Lilybæum) he privately ſet ſail about the third Watch, and had in the night time a proſperous Voyage, not being ſeen by the enemy. But at day break the ſhips being diſcovered not far from Drepanus, gave an Alarm to Adherball, becauſe ſuch a ſight was there unuſual, inſomuch as no doubt was made but that it was the enemy who approached; the Carthaginians were forced either preſently to encounter and enter fight, or to ſuffer themſelves to be ſurrounded and beſieged by the enemy; this latter they reſolved againſt, becauſe as it would have involved them in much trouble and danger, ſo it would have been imputed as a crime upon their miſcarriage. Adherball therefore on a ſudden called together his Sea-men, and by a Cryer ſummoning the Mercenaries to an Aſſembly, in a ſhort but very pithy ſpeech admoniſhed them what hopes there were of victory if they would readily and chearfully take Arms, and what danger of a ſiege was imminent if they declined battel. When every man with one conſent had agreed to follow his counſel, Adherball commending their obedience, forthwith gives order that they ſhould take ſhip, and obſerving what courſe the Admiral ſteered (wherein himſelf ſailed) to follow it. Whereupon he before the reſt ſaileth toward the main ſea, going out of the Haven juſt under the Rocks hanging over it at the ſame time when the Roman ſhips entred on the other ſide. P. Clodius finding the enemy no whit diſmayed, or declining fight, as he had hoped, but ſtoutly prepared to defend themſelves, was much troubled, and retreated back with his ſhips to encounter the enemy in the open ſeas. But his were in no good order, but as chanceably they had outſailed one another, ſome were entred the Haven, others were making toward it, and ſome were juſt in the mouth of it: Whereupon it came to paſſe, that while they all endeavour'd to make a ſudden return, they daſhed one againſt another, and ſtruck their Oars together, till being got out of the Haven as well as they could, becauſe they wanted time, they ranged themſelves in Battel-array juſt under the ſhore.

Polyb. 1. 49

Diodorus. 24. 1 Polybius Polib. 1. 46 Polyb. 1. 49

The Conſul, who had ſailed in the Rere before, now changing his Station, came before all and placed himſelf in the left Wing; but the Carthaginians ſailing by the enemies left Wing with five Beaked ſhips, tacked about facing the Romans, and had the open ſea on his back, other ſhips as they came he commanded to place themſelves at a convenient diſtance, and when all were order'd according to his mind he ſetteth forward againſt the enemy. And now ſign of Battel being given from both the Admirals they fiercely encounter on all ſides, at firſt with equal hopes, but afterward to the Carthaginians better fortune. For though they had the leſſer number of ſhips, to wit, but ninety armed; in other reſpects they did exceed, for their ſhips were better and their water-men more skilful; they had likewiſe made choice of a moſt convenient place of fight, for as often as they were hard put to it they had free egreſſe into the open ſea, where they could eaſily by their ſwiftneſs avoid the enemy, or if he long purſued them, return and encompaſſe him. But the Romans being ſo near the ſhore had not the like convenience, they could neither ſail into the main nor with ſafety well retire, but as often as the enemy preſſed upon them, they either ſtuck in the ſands or endanger'd themſelves upon the ſhore. Being therefore unable to break through the enemy by force and charge him in the Rere, by reaſon of the ſlowneſs of their ſhips and unskilfulneſs of the Rowers, and being cooped up in a narrow place not able from the Stern to help their fellows who were in danger, they were beaten to the Carthaginians little loſs.

Diodorus 24. 1 Polybius 1. 51.

To theſe difficulties was added another cauſe of deſpair from their Religion, and they thought themſelves worſted by the anger of the gods, becauſe the Conſul undertook to fight contrary to the indication of the Birds, adding likewiſe a Jear to his neglect; for becauſe the Chickens did not eat, he commanded them to be flung into the ſea, that they might drink though they would not feed. This occurrence made the ſouldiers more ſlack and faint-hearted, fighting, as they thought, with the ill will of the gods. But the author of all this calamity, when he had loſt every thing elſe, he wanted neither wit nor boldneſs to preſerve himſelf; for when he ſaw his ſhips in ſuch numbers ſank and taken, he ſlipt away between the ſhore and the enemy with thirty ſhips which ſtood next him. And that he might ſafely arrive to his Army at Lilybæum, being to ſail by ſome of the Carthaginians Guards, he adorned his ſhips in token of Victory. The Carthaginians therefore imagining the Conſul had been victorious, and that his other ſhips would ſuddenly follow, ſuffered him ſafely to paſſe by, being themſelves much terrified and dejected. The enemy took all the ſhips the Conſul left behind, even ninety and three, together with the Souldiers and Rowers, except only thoſe who ſtriking upon the ſhore, caſt themſelves on land and fled. But in the fight a greatnumber were ſunk; for Clodius brought above two hundred from Lilybæum. This great victory coſt the Carthaginians very little, for they loſt not not a man, much leſs a ſhip, and very few are ſaid to be wounded; of the Romans eight thouſand men were ſlain, and twenty thouſand taken.

About the ſame time likewiſe the Carthaginians took ſome ſhips laden with Corne from Panormus, and carryed them to Drepanus, and carrying proviſions into Lilybæum from the Territories of Drepanus, did plentifully relieve the beſieged with accommodation of all ſorts. Neither here did this yeares fortune make a ſtop, but afflicted the Romans with another great calamity, whereby they loſt not onely the preſent poſſeſſion of the ſeas, but all hopes of regaining it. For the other Conſull L. Junius coming out of Italy with many ſhips of burthen, laden with Corn for the Army, and fifty beaked ſhips arrived at Meſſana, where he wet mith a great number of other Veſſells, from the Army, and other parts of Sicily. Joyning himſelf with theſe, he made up a Navy of an hundred and twenty long ſhips, almoſt eight hundred ſhips of burthen, and ſaileth to Syracuſe. Being arrived thither, he ſendeth the Queſtors before with part of the Navy to Lilybæum; himſelfe remaineth at Syracuſe, expecting thoſe others from Meſſana, who were not able to overtake him, and taking in grain which his Midland friends brought down to the ſea ſide. In the mean time Adherball having ſent the Roman ſhips and Captives to Carthage (Fortune and Glory putting him forward to action) delivered thirty ſhips more to Carthalo, who had brought ſeventy, with as many ſhips of Burthen from Africa, and ſent him to drive out the Roman ſhips from the Haven of Lilybæum, or to fire or ſink them. He at break of the day entring the Haven with great Terrour, ſome ſhips he boorded, and others he fired; in the mean time Himilco Governour of the City, made a ſally with the Mercenaries upon thoſe Romans who went to defend the ſhips, which cauſed great fear in the Camp. In fine Carthalo having deſtroyed not very many, carried away five, and directed his Courſe to Heraclea. Lying there in wait to obſtruct the Romans Voiage to Lilybæum, he heareth newes of a conſiderable Navy of all kinds of ſhips ſailing by.

He therefore joyning other Commanders with himſelfe, made up a Navy of an hundred and twenty good ſhips, confiding in which ſtrength, and animated by former ſucceſs, he preſently maketh out of the Haven to meet the Enemy. By the ſhore of Gelus the Navys came in ſight one of the other, but the Roman Quæſtors fearing a diſadvantageous encounter, diverted their courſe to Phintiades, a Town in League with the Romans, at Phintiades there is no Haven, onely the rocks running out into the ſea afford a pretty ſafe riding for ſhips. Here the Romans larding, prepared themſelves for the Enemies coming, having brought Engines of offence out of the Town, and placed them on the ſhore for ſafeguard of the ſhips. The Carthaginians at firſt reſolved to have beſieged the Enemy, thinking that out of fear they would have fled into the Town, and have left their ſhips for a Prey: But when the Romans ſtood ſtoutly to their own defence, and that they found the fight full of danger, likewiſe not much truſting in a place ſomewhat inconvenient for the ſhips they deſiſted; and having taken a few Veſſells laden with proviſion they ſailed to the River Halycus, not farre diſtant, there they healed their wounded men, obſerving the motion of the Enemy. Other Writers following, I believe, Philinus, affirme, that the Romans ſuſteined greater loſs; that the Quæſtors being daunted at the firſt ſight of the Enemy, in their flight to Phintiades left behind their ſhips of burthen, and all other Veſſells but men of Warre, that in the fight fifty round Veſſells, and threeſcore long ſhips were ſunk, and thirteen ſo ſplitt and ſhatter'd that they were made unfit for ſervice.

Not long after the Carthaginians ſtill abiding at the River Halycus, L. Junius the Conſull, having done his buſineſs at Syracuſe, ſailing toward Lilybæum, about the Promontory of Pachynus, was diſcovered by ſome of Carthalo his ſhips, who thereupon with all ſpeed makes out to meet him (being ignorant of all paſſages at Phintiades) that he might fight him as farre from Quæſtor's Navy as might be, leſt they ſhould come in for his ſuccour. The Conſull ſeeing the Enemy make up toward him, not daring to fight, nor being able to avoid them, drives his ſhips into a rough and troubleſome creeke, neer Camerina, a greater fear overcoming this leſſer, leſt his whole Army ſhould fall into the Enemies Power. Carthalo not daring to venter into the ſame place, takes up his ſtation at a certain Promontory, from whence he might equally intend himſelfe againſt either Navy. A while after, when the Winds blew high, the Carthaginian ſhipmaſters (skilfull in ſuch Affaires) foreſeeing a tempeſt, perſwaded Carthalo to forſake that ſtation, and ſteere to Pachynus, and ſo the Carthaginians, but not without great paines, avoided the force of the Tempeſt; But both the Roman Navys utterly periſhed upon the Rocks, inſomuch that of the whole ſhipwrack there remained not a piece of board of any uſe, excepting onely two ſhips, wherein the Conſull with the ſmall remainder of his men arrived at Lilybæum. All the ſhips of proviſion were loſt, and above an hundred long ſhips; but part of the Armie was ſaved, leaping into the ſea and ſwimming to ſhore. The Senate, who had lately called home P. Clodius the Conſull, for his miſcarriage in Sicily, hearing alſo of Junius his misfortune, gave over all confidence in the ſeas, reſolving nevertheleſs with all their ſtrength and Counſell to proſecute the Warre by land. They thought good to continue the ſiege of Lilybæum; appointing certain men to take care of conveighing neceſſary accommodations in good ſeaſon, to the Army there. Though the Carthiganians were Maſters at ſea, yet they were incouraged, in that at land they were ſuperiour, and that almoſt all Sicily was either under their power, or in League with them: But they were not pleaſed with their Conſulls this year, neither did they think that things would ſucceed proſperouſly under the Conſulls com-

They fled therefore to a new and unuſuall Refuge, and created a Dictatour to go into Sicily; whereas, before this time, never any one ſo impowered, had led an Army out of Italy. The Inſolence of P. Clodius the Conſull was then very notable, and almoſt incredible; For being commanded by the Senate to nominate a Dictatour, he named M. Claudius Glycias, who was either his Scribe, or one of his Sergeants; as if he had not ſufficiently offended his Countrey, by what loſſes he had brought upon it, unleſs he had likewiſe abuſed the Majeſty of the Empire with ſuch a ſcoffe. Whereupon the whole Senate being juſtly incenſed againſt him, he was forced to reſign up his Office, and was referred to the cenſure of the People. What Authors Cicero had read, report he was condemned, but others have obſerved, that when no Queſtion was to be made but that the People would condemne him, he eſcaped by a ſudden chance, a ſtorme then ariſing which diſſolved the Aſſembly; And it ſeeming hereby that the Gods interpoſed themſelves, they thought not fit to ordain any other meeting for the purpoſe. But Glycias being forced to diſclaim his Office, in that the City was aſhamed to ſee a man of mean ranke to be in Supreme Dignity, was nevertheleſs admitted to all ſpectacles after this time in a Noble Man's Robes. In his room A. Atilius A.F. C.N. Calatinus was nominated Dictatour, who made L. Cæcilius L.F. C.N. Metellus Maſter of the Horſe, he who had Triumphed over the Carthaginians. Theſe two went indeed into Sicily, but performed no very memorable action there.

Polyb. In the mean time L. Junius, much troubled at his croſs fortune, and deſirous to wipe away the blot of his ſhipwracke, by ſome noble Exploit, watching all opportunities of Action, did at length find a way to take Eryx, by the Treachery of ſome within it, whom he had corrupted by gifts and promiſes. Eryx is the higheſt Hill in Sicily except Ætna, ſcituate between Panormus and Drepana, in that part of the Iland which lieth towards Italy, being more craggy toward Drepana. In the top thereof there is a Plaine whereon ſtandeth the Temple of Venus, therefore called Erycina, the Richeſt in all Sicily, juſt under the Top of the Mount, in the midſt of the Aſſent, is a City of the ſame name, very hard to be approached unto, the way to which with much difficulty is overcome by long and narrow paſſages from the foot of the Hill. L. Junius therefore well underſtanding the nature of the place, appointeth a ſtrong guard both upon the Ridge of the Mountain, and likewiſe in the narrow paſſages below, being very ſafe himſelfe, and having the advantage with much eaſe to repulſe the Enemy. He alſo encompaſſed Ægithallus with a wall, and ſtrengthened it with a Garriſon of eight hundred men. But Carthalo landing his men there in the night time, ſtormed that Caſtle, and took and killed part of the Garriſon ſouldiers, others eſcaped to Eryx.

Diodor.

Zonaras. The other paſſages concerning L. Junius are very doubtfully reported by Hiſtorians, ſome affirm he was taken by Carthalo at Ægithallus: Others, that he killed himſelfe fearing to be condemned for the loſs of his Navy. There is no leſs uncertainty whether the Secular ſports were celebrated this year, or fourteen yeares after, when P. Cornelius Lentulus, and C. Licinius Varus were Conſulls. I think it more probable they were celebrated this year, the fear conceived from their late overthrows, and hope of better fortune, inviting them thereunto, if their Religion were diligently performed. This was a very fruitfull year, inſomuch as twelve pound of oile was ſold for an Aſſis; In the mean time the Dictatourſhip being expired, or Atilius having reſigned it up, C. Aurelius L.F. C.N. Cotta, and P. Servilius Q.F. Cn.N Geminus were choſen Conſulls. The Conſulls were prettie ſucceſsfull in Sicily, yet obtained no great Victory, nor reaped any great profit for the Common-wealth They kept in the Carthaginians of Lilybæum and Drepanum, that they could make no large Excurſions, nor ſo often as they had done, and took their Garriſons which were remote from the ſea. Carthalo having made many attempts againſt them in vain, reſolved at length to waſte the Italian Coaſts, that thereby he might divert the Conſulls from Sicily; or if they refuſed to come back to ſuccour their Country, depopulate their grounds, and take Cities. But fortune did not herein favour his deſignes. For the Prætour being ſent out with the City-forces for defence of the Countrey, compelled him to return to Sicily without effecting his purpoſe.

Where when the Mercenaries mutinied for want of Pay, he expoſed many of them in barren Ilands, and ſent others to receive their Puniſhment at Carthage. The reſt being incenſed hereby, began manifeſtly to revolt, ſo that a new warre was feared from them: But Hamilcar who ſucceeded Carthalo, coming in ſeaſon, ſet upon them in the night time, ſlew ſome, and drowned others; the remainder ſubmitting themſelves, and begging pardon he received into Grace. This is that Hamilcar ſirnamed Barcas, one of the beſt Commanders Carthage ever bred, and indeed without compare, but that Hannibal was his ſon. From this time the Warre began to be more difficult on the Romans ſide; For having ſuddenly appeaſed the Mercenarys, he ſailed to Italy, and in very great compaſs ſpoiled the Locrian and Brutian Territorys.

But the Romans having found the faith of Hiero King of Syracuſe very conſtant toward them, and his merits great, freely remitted unto him that yearly Tribute they had in the former League compounded for, and made a perpetual band of friendſhip and ſociety with him. In the interim Hamilcar being returned out of Italy landed in the Panormitan Grounds, and pitched his Camp between Panormus and Eryx, in a place by nature very ſtrong, it is called Epeirête, an Hill craggy and full of clifts on all ſides, exalting it ſelf from the circumjacent Region to a very very great height; The top of it is not ſharp, but continueth a plain of above an hundred furlongs, of a very profitable ſoil for the feeding of Cattel and bearing of Fruits, being open to the winds from ſea. and void of all harmful and venemous creatures. Therein is a certain Hillock which ſupplieth the place of a Tower, from whence may be viewed all the grounds round about. Near it is a very convenient Haven for thoſe that ſail from Drepanus and Lilybæum to Italy, with ſtore of freſh water. There are three wayes of aſcending this Mount, two from the Land, one from the Sea, but all very difficult and full of obſtructions. Here did Hamilcar plant his Camp with much confidence having no confederate City near him, and being in the midſt of his enemies: But truſting in the ſtrength of the place and his own courage and skill in Marſhal affairs, he found the Romans work enough, and very well ſetled the Carthaginian affairs, which now began to ſucceed well at home alſo. For another Carthaginian General, Hanno, who had a great emulation of Hamilcar's Virtue, to obtain honour, and employ the Army without the Commonwealths coſt out of the enemies Country, invaded a port of Lybia about Hecatompylos, and having obtained the City, ſent three thouſand Hoſtages to Carthage; yet they had ſome alay of this their proſperity; For L. Cæcilius L. F. C. N. Metellus being the ſecond time Conſul, and Num. Fabius M. F. M. N. Buteo being his Colleague, a Navy was built at the charge of private men, which waſted the Coaſt of Africa. For though the Senate had again reſolved againſt ſending out of a Navy, yet at the Citizens requeſt they gave leave to have one prepared, upon this condition, That they ſhould ſafely reſtore thoſe ſhips which were built at the publick Charge, reſerving the prey to themſelves; ſo that a Fleet was ſet out very conſiderable, which brought much terror and damage to the Coaſts of Africa and aſſaulting Kings: Hippo, none of the meaneſt Cities, they fired the ſhips of Hippo and many buildings. In their return finding the mouth of the Haven chained up, by art and counſel they deviſed a way to explicate themſelves out of preſent danger, for ſailing with all the force they could, when they came near the Chain, all the men retired to the Stern, and ſo the Fore-Deck being lightened eaſily wafted over the Chain; then ſuddenly running to the Fore-Decks and depreſſing them, the Stern likewiſe ſlid over, and they had free liberty of ſailing, having delivered themſelves from imminent danger.

After this eſcape, they fought with the Carthaginian Navy, and prevailed againſt them. The Roman Conſuls divided their forces, L. Metellus beſieged Lilybæum, and Num. Fabius, Drepanum. Not far from Drepanum, toward the South, lyeth an Iland, or rather a Rock, which the Grecians call Pelias, we Columbaria, which the Conſul ſtormed in the night time, and ſlew the Carthaginian Garriſon there. Hamilcar, who came to defend Drepanum, made no delay, but at break of day ſet forth to recover the place again, which the Conſul obſerving, being not able to relieve his own men, with his whole ſtrength aſſaulteth Drepanum, whereby drawing Hamilcar from his deſign, he kept the Iland in poſſeſſion, and afterward made much advantage of it in beſieging Drepanum, for he dammed up the ſea, and joyned it to the Continent; and becauſe the Walls of the City were weakeſt on that ſide, he there began his aſſaults. But the encounters between Hamilcar, and theſe, and the Conſuls of the following years, Polybius thinks impoſſible to be deſcribed becauſe they were ſo many, and judgeth it unfit, leſt it might give an occaſion of the like. For Hamilcar, having his Camp at Eryx for almoſt three years together, had almoſt daily encounters with the Romans, eſpecially when their Camp being before Panormus was ſcarce five furlongs diſtant from the enemy. For neither did they refrain from ſkirmiſhing, having their Armies ſo near; Neither did they ever come to the trial of a main battel having many hinderances, eſpecially becauſe their forces being equal and their Camps alike ſtrong, they were likewiſe on each ſide protected by the vicinity of their Camp, to which the party worſted might quickly retire. Hence it came to paſs that as in fight ſome were alwayes ſlain, ſo when the battel declined they had a ſafe refuge to their Works. But while Drepanum was beſieged, the Carthaginians Fleet infeſted not only the Sicilian but the Italian ſhores; and Hamilcar plundering as far as he could, waſted the Italian territories even to Cuma. Many of the Romans Citizens being fallen into the Carthaginians power by theſe incurſions, and the Sicilian fights, the Roman Commanders agreed with the Carthaginians for an exchange of Priſoners, which party received any overplus back, was to give two pound and an half of ſilver for an head, and the Carthaginians receiving more then the Romans paid down the mony accordingly.

I find two Colonies planted in Italy this year, one at Æſulum the other at Alſium. There was likewiſe a Luſtration made at Rome (being the eight and thirtieth) by A. Atilius A. F. C. N. Calatinus, and A. Manlius T. F. T. N. Atticus being Cenſors; and there were rated two hundred fifty one thouſand, two hundred twenty two, whereas in the former Luſtration there were found little leſs then three hundred thouſand; ſo great a number of Citizens were conſumed by War and Shipwracks. Nevertheleſs the Sicilian army was duly recruited, the ſupply being led by the Conſuls M. Octavius C. F. M. N. Craſſus (the ſecond time Conſul) and M. Fabius C. F. M. N. Licinus. Theſe had a very buſie and difficult warfare, but not being able to diſpoſſeſſe Hamilcar of his ſtrong holds, they performed nothing memorable. Which happened likewiſe to the ſucceeding Conſuls for the ſame reaſon, as likewiſe becauſe new Generals (being on the ſudden every year elected againſt an old experienced Commander) ſpent more time in making their preparations, chuſing their ground, and inſinuating themſelves with the ſouldiery,

There was hardly any Noble Family in Rome but had had some relation to the Claudians, either by Cognation or Affinity, so that she wanted not Patrons to defend her, declaring, The Nobility of her house, the merits of Appius her father, the frailty of her sex; that it was a thing unheard of for a woman to be called into Judgment: Neither was now the cause so great why a new custome should be begun against Claudia, which had not by any plot or practice offended the Majesty of the people, but only in a few words. On the contrary, the Tribunes alledged, 'What an 'impious and execrable speech she hath vented, ye are not ignorant, O Romans, neither is 'there any need of Witness, she her self confessing it; neither indeed can she deny it if she 'would, because she spoke openly and in publick, not reverencing either the Gods or the multitude 'of Citizens round about her. When therefore the crime is manifest, why should we doubt of 'the punishment? Have not the Laws made sufficient Provision? Or while we read the Letter 'of the Law, shall we suffer our minds to be deluded in the Sense of it. 'Tis objected, That it 'is unusual thus to accuse a woman; if it be so, why it is unusual likewise for a woman thus to 'offend: Neither hitherto did our Commonwealth ever afford so wicked and impudent a woman. And we wish that there were now no need of making a new Precedent, being desirous that '(offences being avoided) the Law might lie hidden and quiet, rather then be made use of a'gainst the guilty with a profitable severity. But a City that intends its own establishment, 'must of necessity observe the Laws, which they of all men ought least to pervert who would 'be esteemed the Princes and Pillars of the Commonwealth; who being skilful in the Laws cannot be ignorant, that though in most of them there be no mention expressly made of women, yet 'in these words, If any One, and the like, both sexes are equally comprehended. What wonder 'is it then if we believe the Law against Treason to concern both sexes, seeing this very Clau'dias is an example that both sexes may offend against it? But they Extenuate the businesse, 'and would have the crime seem small, because it was only in Words. What? this yet was 'wanting; she did not joyn her endeavours, counsels and actions with the Carthaginians; 'she did not raise Troops, arme Slaves, seize on the Capitol, nor actually with her hands effect 'that wickedness against the City which in words she expressed; Notwithstanding this, the Laws 'provide not only for the punishment of Deeds but of ill Counsels and designes also; if indeed a 'mad man or an infant do hurt to any, the Law layeth no hold on their actions: yet the mind and 'intentions of others in many causes is made as manifest by Words as by Deeds. She who made 'so detestable a wish, what would she have done if it had lain in her power to have brought it 'to pass? Unless we despise the Judgment of other men (which we have no reason to do) 'we shall find that in other places wicked wishes are accounted Crimes. At Athens, which for 'reputation of Wisdom exceedeth all Cities of Greece, there was a man whose office was to 'provide necessary accommodations for Funerals, condemned, because he wished he might make 'great gains, which could not be unless a great number of Citizens died: Yet those words 'might admit of a more favourable Interpretation. But Claudia plainly, and without any 'ambiguity wished Destruction to the Citizens, Overthrow to the whole Army, and Calamity 'to the whole Commonwealth. Would my Brother were alive again! A naughty wish it is, 'if she had made it only for her brothers sake; for why should life be restored to him by whose 'means so many Citizens lost their lives? who no lesse affronted the Commonwealth by his 'Arrogancy, then he did afflict it by his Rashness? who being by the votes of all men precon'demned, avoided not the infamy of his judgment, but by accident escaped the punishment? 'Would you, if you were wise, have this man to live again, whose memory if you could hide 'in the same Grave with his ashes, it were your duty to do it? For as other Matrons do not 'vainly glory of the Egregious virtues and merits of their Brethren, so would he be a shame to 'you if any shame or modesty be left in you. But let a Noble Lady be pardoned, though per'haps foolishly she hath desired her brothers company, if she did it out of any pious and chari'table consideration. Yea, clearly absolve her, if the cause of her wish be not more abominable 'then the wish it self foolish and insolent. For why did you wish your brother alive again? 'that you might be comforted with the countenance of a near Kinsman, that his labours might 'redound to your profit, his Authority be a protection to you, and his Honour a grace? None 'of all these. And what then? Even that he might command the Navy again: This, this, wicked 'wretch, was the reason why you desired, as much as in you lay, to raise the Dead, to reduce 'Nature to its former habit, and unlock the Cloisters of the Grave that you might find a man 'by whom we might be destroyed! What great lamentations and complaints were made when the Cen-'ſors upon the laſt Luſtration gave in the number of the Citizens? Though many things theſe 'years laſt paſt ſucceeded proſperouſly, yet good men thought the Commonwealth in no very 'ſafe or good condition by reaſon the number of the Citizens was ſo much decreaſed. But this 'woman nothing moved at the loſs of thoſe who periſhed, therefore only grieveth becauſe any 'are remaining. She complaineth of the two great crowd in the City, ſhe wiſheth him alive 'by whoſe fault chiefly the number of Citizens is ſo ſmall. But it may be ſaid, The woman 'her ſelf being indeed unworthy your mercy, will ye not yet pardon her crime for her Anceſtor's, 'for her Father's ſake? Shall we then eſtabliſh ſuch a Law in our City, That if any man by 'any means do good to the Commonwealth his poſterity ſhall have the liberty to offend it 'without puniſhment? Truly our Fathers were not of this Opinion, when they precipitated '*M. For what Appius is it they would have you remember, but him 'who alwayes with an enemies mind, croſſing your deſignes, choſe rather to periſh with his 'Army then be ſaved by his Colleague, being a Plebeian? who againſt the will of all the De-'grees and Tribes perſiſted in his Cenſorſhip beyond his due time? And now let them reckon 'up the merits of the Claudian Family, even from the time of the Decemviri, or from the firſt 'Original thereof, they ſhall find matter whereby to prove this woman like her Anceſtors in 'pride and contumacy, rather then to make it appear ſhe ought to be pardoned for their ſakes. 'What cauſe therefore have theſe, or can any other man alledge why this woman ought to go 'unpuniſhed, unleſs it be feared the City ſhould looſe a woman of ſo good example? of which 'opinion if ye alſo are, O Romans, keep her, keep Claudia amongſt you; that when our Ma-'trons kneel at the feet of the gods, ſupplicating them for the Commonwealth in time of trouble, 'ſhe may hinder their devout Prayers by her Curſes; that while they wiſh for Salvation for our 'Armies, ſhe may wiſh Deſtruction; while they deſire to ſee the ſouldiers return ſafe and ſound, 'ſhe may deſire to hear they are vanquiſhed, captivated and ſlain; that while they ſolicite the 'gods that few or none may fall in battel, ſhe may repine and accuſe Providence if any return 'home. Keep the woman, that as other Matrons provoke and encourage their children and 'kinſmen, in emulation of Illuſtrious men, to Virtue, Courage and Love of their Country, 'ſhe may inſtruct hers by the example of P. Clodius to fight raſhly, to run baſely, wickedly to 'deſtroy the Citizens, and arrogantly to have the Commonwealth it ſelf in contempt. Let her 'propound theſe things unto young Nobles to be reſolved upon from their Infancy, to be practiſ-'ed in their Youth; ſo let thoſe men be educated to whom you muſt hereafter commit the charge 'of your Navies and Armies.

Such ſpeeches being frequently vented Pro and Con, the People aſſembling in judgement, condemned her, in a fine of five and twenty thouſand pound of heavy braſs. With this and other fines, T. Sempronius the Ædile built and dedicated the Temple of Liberty. After this M. Fabius M. F. M. N. Buteo and C. Atilius A. F. A. N. Bulbus were made Conſuls. There was a Colonie this year planted at Fregenæ, a Maritime City of Etruria, nine miles from Alſium whither one was led two years ſince. Theſe Conſuls fought a very great Sea battell, the iſſue thereof was profitable to neither Party, for the Carthaginians loſt a multitude of ſhips and men; And a tempeſt bereaved the Romans of their rich ſpoils: In Sicilia affaires were managed with the ſame advice, and the ſame fortune as the year before; The Romans haveing an hard task not onely by reaſon of the Craggineſſe of the places, but of Hamilcar his boldneſſe and ſubtilty in martiall ſtratagems, whereby he ſo equally oppoſed the Romans, that he not onely defended what places he had poſſeſſed, and by frequent incurſions vexed the Enemies aſſociates both on the Sicilian and Italian Coaſts; but minding other things alſo, did every where ſupport the Carthaginian Power even ready to fall, being very induſtrious, of a reſolute minde, and of excellent judgement in takeing ſeaſonable Counſells. Deſirous therefore to relieve the Lilybætans from fear and want, being more cloſely beſiged by land, he commandeth part of his Navy to appear in the main ſea, as ſteering their Courſe to Lilybæum, which while the Romans ſailed out to Encounter, he ſlipt himſelfe into the Haven, with ſome ſhips he had for that purpoſe placed where they could not be diſcoverd, and ſo ſtrenghtned and encouraged the beſieged with his preſence, and abundance of proviſions which he brought. While the war was in this manner continued in Sicilie, A. Manlius. T. F. T. N. Torquatus Atticus and C. Sempronius T.F. T.N. Blaſus being againe Conſulls, came and tooke charge of the Army. Let her 'propound theſe things unto young Nobles to be reſolved upon from their Infancy, to be practiſ-'ed in their Youth; ſo let thoſe men be educated to whom you muſt hereafter commit the charge 'of your Navies and Armies.

Such ſpeeches being frequently vented Pro and Con, the People aſſembling in judgement, condemned her, in a fine of five and twenty thouſand pound of heavy braſs. With this and other fines, T. Sempronius the Ædile built and dedicated the Temple of Liberty. After this M. Fabius M. F. M. N. Buteo and C. Atilius A. F. A. N. Bulbus were made Conſuls. There was a Colonie this year planted at Fregenæ, a Maritime City of Etruria, nine miles from Alſium whither one was led two years ſince. Theſe Conſuls fought a very great Sea battell, the iſſue thereof was profitable to neither Party, for the Carthaginians loſt a multitude of ſhips and men; And a tempeſt bereaved the Romans of their rich ſpoils: In Sicilia affaires were managed with the ſame advice, and the ſame fortune as the year before; The Romans haveing an hard task not onely by reaſon of the Craggineſſe of the places, but of Hamilcar his boldneſſe and ſubtilty in martiall ſtratagems, whereby he ſo equally oppoſed the Romans, that he not onely defended what places he had poſſeſſed, and by frequent incurſions vexed the Enemies aſſociates both on the Sicilian and Italian Coaſts; but minding other things alſo, did every where ſupport the Carthaginian Power even ready to fall, being very induſtrious, of a reſolute minde, and of excellent judgement in takeing ſeaſonable Counſells. Deſirous therefore to relieve the Lilybætans from fear and want, being more cloſely beſiged by land, he commandeth part of his Navy to appear in the main ſea, as ſteering their Courſe to Lilybæum, which while the Romans ſailed out to Encounter, he ſlipt himſelfe into the Haven, with ſome ſhips he had for that purpoſe placed where they could not be diſcoverd, and ſo ſtrenghtned and encouraged the beſieged with his preſence, and abundance of proviſions which he brought. While the war was in this manner continued in Sicilie, A. Manlius. T. F. T. N. Torquatus Atticus and C. Sempronius T.F. T.N. Blaſus being againe Conſulls, came and tooke charge of the Army. About this time the manner of their war was changed, not ſo much as ordered more cloſely and in nar-narrower bounds. The Romans (as hath been already declared) had planted a Garrison above the City Eryx upon the Top of the Mountaine, another below at the foot of the Hill. The natural strength and scituation of the place, with the helpe of these guards, seemed sufficient to secure that City from fear of any surprise. But the boldness and Valour of Hamilcar, makeing any thing possible, which he lifted to undertake, in a very short time reduced it into his Power. For he in the night time, setting forward with his forces, and without noise ascending thirty furlongs up the Hill, himself marching in the head of the party, surprised the Romans unawares, and haveing slaine greatest part of those he found in the Towne, he sent the rest to Drepanum. From this time the face of things was very strange, and the warfare very hard and severe, for Hamilcar being now in the midst of two of the Enemies Garrisons, was himself besieged by them below while he besieged those above; both the Romans and the Carthaginians undergoing incredible paynes and danger, did for almost two years next insueing performe the office of most Valiant Souldiers; For the Camps being so neare there passed not a day, nay scarce an houre without alarmes and skirmishes, neither party all this while fainted or yielded, neither did Victory or overthrow part them; but still they continued equall and unvanquished, designeing in the mean time to prosecute the Warre at Sea also.

Vellei. 1.14. 8. Livie Epit. 19. This year a Colonie was planted at Brundusium, in the Salentine Territories, twenty yeares after that Countrey was subdued by the Romans. About this time T. Coruncianus, who was the first High Priest of the Plebeians, died in a great old age, and in his place succeeded L. Cacilius Metellus. The next Consulls were C. Fundanius C.F. Q. N. Fundulus, and C. Sulpicius C.F. Ser. N. Gallus. By them the war with Hamilcar was mannaged in the same manner, and with the same fortune as before, onely the Mercenary Gaules, and others who kept Garrison in Eryx, being discontented for want of Pay, and other injuries, endeavour'd to betray the City to the Romans, but not being able to effect it, they revolted to the Consulls, and these were the first Forreigners the Romans ever entertained into society of Armes. Notwithstanding this access of strength, they were not able by their Land-forces to finish the War, chiefly by reason of Hamilcars virtue, who could neither be circumvented by craft, nor vanquished by Force.

Once more therefore they consulted about setting forth another Navy to Sea; For by no other meanes could the Carthaginians be kept from Sicily, unless they were mastered by Sea. And they were much encouraged in their resolution, by reason of their former success, when the Navy was set forth at the cost of private men: But money was wanting, the Treasury being long ago exhausted with the charge of a continuall War. Then did the Noble Roman Spirit seasonably relieve the wants of the Common-wealth, so generous were the Senatours, that in a time of publick danger they scorned to spare their private purses, out of which on the sudden more mony was raised then the building of a Navy required. Those who were richest did every man undertake to build a Quinquereme, setting it forth compleatly manned and arm'd; others according to their estates joyned two or three together in the same design, upon this condition, that when the Common-wealth was restored to a better Condition, every man's money should be paid back again. By this meanes two hundred ships of five Oares on a side were made ready, according to the pattern of that Gally they had taken from Hannibal Rhodius. Great was now the expectation of all men, for being put to their last refuge, they resolved with this Navy of Necessity to hazard the Fortune of the whole War. While these thing were in doing, C. Lutatius C.F. C. N. Catulus, and A. Posthumius A.F. L. N. Albinus entered the Consulship. A. Posthumius was then Priest of Mars, and therefore when he desired to cast lots for his Province, L. Metellus the High Priest would not suffer him, pronouncing it unlawfull for a Priest to depart from the place of his Office, and leave the Ceremonies unperformed, which was likewise allowed of, and agreed upon by succeeding Generations. The Senate likewise at the same time shewed a like Example of defending their Countrey's Religion, for they forbad C. Lutatius the Consull to ask counsell at Preneste, and mannage the Affaires of the Common-wealth by direction of outlandish Auguries. Then intending their minds upon the War (because both the Consulls could not be spared with safety of their Religion, and one seemed not sufficient to bear the whole burthen) they ordained one of the Prætours (this being the first year wherein they began to create two) to accompany C. Lutatius, and it fell to the Lot of Q. Valerius Falto. These gathering together all the Publick and private ships to the number of three hundred, with Ferry-boats, and other Vessells to the number of seven hundred; assoon as Winter was over, sailed to Sicily, whither being come, they find both the Lilybætan and Drepanitan Havens open for them; For the Enemy not expecting any Navy from Italy, were returned to Africa with all their ships. The Consull animated with this prosperous beginning, being by nature full of spirit, hating Idleness, and desirous of Action, besieged Drepanum, raising Workes against it; in the mean time not omitting to train up his Sea-souldiers, daily exercising them (as foreseeing sudden use of them in fight) insomuch as they who were utterly ignorant of Maritime Affaires and chances, seemed sufficiently prepared for any Encounter.

The City of Drepanum being fiercely assaulted both by Sea and land, and now reduced even to the utmost danger, part of their Wall being battered to the ground; It chanced that the Consulls

Conſull Valiantly fighting in the head of his men, received a deep wound in his thigh; whereupon his Souldiers troubled at his fall, and running in to him, miſſed the opportunity of taking the place, when it was even almoſt in their hands: Before the Conſull had recovered the uſe of his foot, newes was brought of a great Carthaginian Navy approaching, to the number of four hundred ſhips, ſtored with proviſion for their Army, with a very great ſtrength of ſouldiers, and abundance of Armes and Money. Hanno, a Carthaginian Noble Man, was Commander in Chiefe; his chiefe care was to get ſafe to Eryx, eaſe his ſhips of their burden, and ſo manning them with ſtout Souldiers from Hamilcar, to return and fight the Roman Navy. His deſign was well contrived, but prevented by the wiſdom and circumſpection of C. Lutatius the Conſull, who knew it would be of great moment to the Victory, to encounter the Carthaginians while their ſhips were heavy laden, and encombred with the burthen of their own proviſions. Therefore upon the Ides of March, filling his ſhips with choice ſouldiers, he ſaileth to the Ilands Ægates, over againſt Lilybæum, where he diſcovereth Hanno coming from Hieroneſus; then encouraging his Sea-men and ſouldiers he appointeth next day for the fight: But at break of day he began to doubt, becauſe the wind was ariſen favourable to the Carthaginians, and contrary to himſelfe. Weighing then the Reaſons on both ſides, he thought it ſafer to fight with the winds, and Hanno while he was alone, and had his ſhips laden, then ſuffer him to paſs by to unlade his ſhips, and bring back into battell the flower of their foot Army, and alſo Hamilcar himſelfe, who at that time was very formidable. Obſerving therefore the Enemies ſhips as they paſſed by with full ſaile, he ſetteth forth out of the Haven, and to encourage his men, cauſeth himſelfe to be carried into the Admirall-Gally, having not recovered the uſe of his limbe: ſigne of battell being given on both ſides, Q. Valerius performed the Office of Generall, by reaſon of C. Lutatius his infirmity, not ſuffering to ſupply the place. The fight laſted not long before it plainly appeared on which ſide the Victory inclined; for the Roman ſhips being light and nimble, did on every ſide, at their pleaſures aſſault the Carthaginians, being heavy, and almoſt immoveable; they were likewiſe in every thing elſe ſuperiours, being taught by experience to avoid and amend whatſoever heretofore they had found inconvenient, and harmefull; Their ſhips were built after the beſt faſhion, they had carefully laid aſide all lumber which was of no uſe in fight, their Rowers were luſty, and well trained up, and they had a very conſiderable ſtrength of Legionaries; All theſe were very great advantages toward the Victory. On the other ſide, the Carthaginian ſhips were heavy with burden, their Rowers newly leavied, and their men negligent, as being in ſecurity; for they had hoped the Romans would no more have tried their fortune at Sea. Therefore, as it muſt needs be, where the difference is ſo great, the Victory was not long in obtaining, the Carthaginians loſt an hundred and twenty ſhips, ſeventy whereof were taken, with all the men, to the number of ten thouſand, the reſt upon an happie change of winde in the time of fight, eſcaped to Hieroneſus. This was that famous battell at the Ilands Ægates, as it is chiefly deſcribed by Polybius.

For other writers affirm, that ſeventy three ſhips were taken, an hundred and twenty five ſunke, two and thirty thouſand men taken priſoners, and thirteen thouſand ſlain, the Prizes taken were very great, not only in Proviſions and Armes, but in gold and ſilver alſo. Of the Roman Navy twelve ſhips were loſt. Tis reported that from the beginning of the fight a fiery meteor was ſeen in the aire, threatning as it were the Carthaginian Navy with it's point directed againſt it, preſignifying the event which preſently enſued. Hanno, with the reſt of the ſhips which eſcaped out of the Fight, except thoſe which fled to Lilybæum, returning to Carthage, was put to death for this his Misfortune. C. Lutatius the Conſul went to the Army before Lilybæum, where, while his wound was in cureing, he ſpent his time in takeing an account of the ſhips, and Captives, and ordering how they ſhould be diſmiſſed. Thence he went to Eryx, where he fought Hamilcar with good ſucceſſe, having ſlain two thouſand Carthaginians. The Carthaginians at home underſtanding what a great Overthrow they had received, though their ſpirits were great, yet found that they wanted ſtrength and meanes, to renew and carry on the War. For they were not able, ſo long as the Romans were Maſters at ſea, to ſupply their Army at Eryx with neceſſary accommodations; and, if that Army miſcarried, they knew not where to raiſe any more ſouldiers, or find a Generall they durſt confide in. Being by this Neceſſity driven into deſpair, they ſent to Hamilcar, empowering him with full Commiſſion to do what he himſelf ſhould think fit or convenient for the Republick: He having hitherto performed the Office of an excellent Generall, did now no leſs behave himſelfe as a good Citizen. For having duely and ſeriouſly conſidered all arguments on both ſides, when he found there was no other means but Peace, whereby to preſerve the Common-wealth; he ſent Embaſſadours to the Conſull to treat with him thereabout. The mention of Peace was not unwellcome to the Conſull, for being now ſhortly to lay down his Office, he could not by any meanes hope for the obtaining of a greater Glory, then that, of having finiſhed the War; and to tranſmit that to his ſucceſſour which was in his own power to accompliſh, and moſt properly belonged to him, he thonght both unſeaſonable and unadviſed: He was the more forward, as being very well conſcious of the wants of the Common-wealth, and that he thought it fit his Countrey, after ſo many yeares continuall labour, ſhould enjoy ſome reſt. Wherefore after a long diſpute of Articles on both ſides, it was agreed, that the Carthaginians ſhould totally depart Sicily; that they ſhould not wage war againſt Hiero, and the Syracuſans, or any of their

'Twas added, that theſe Articles were firmly concluded, if the people of* Rome would agree thereunto.

But it could by no means be obtained (though the Conſul earneſtly inſiſted upon it) that the ſouldiers within Eryx ſhould reſign up their Armes; Hamilcar proteſting, That he would rather ſacrifice himſelf and his country to deſtruction, then yield to ſuch a diſgrace: Nevertheleſſe he condeſcended, That every man at his departure thence ſhould pay eighteen pence.

Hereupon meſſengers were ſent both by the Conſul and the Carthaginians to inform the Senate and People of the Conditions agreed upon. The people did not allow of the peace, but ſent ten Delegates to take an exact account of all circumſtances, who being returned, they heightened the Conditions, That the Carthaginians ſhould preſently lay down a thouſand Talents, and within ten years after pay two thouſand two hundred, that they ſhould clearly quit not only Sicily, but all other Ilands between that and Italy, that they ſhould not ſail in a long ſhip either into Italy or any of the Romans Ilands, nor hire any ſouldier from thence.

The Carthaginians, ſo they might have peace, refuſed nothing; Hamilcar, before the Articles were ſworn unto, laid down his Command and went to Lilybæum, and from thence to Carthage, having approved himſelf, without compariſon, the moſt excellent of all their Generals in that War, both in Courage and in Counſel. After this manner was managed and finiſhed the firſt Carthaginian War, which laſted for four and twenty years with various chances and great loſſes, but to the greater damage of them who at laſt proved Victors.

Polybius 1.63. Appian. apud Fulvium Urſinum. Polybius

For they who have made a particular Account, report about five hundred Carthaginian ſhips to have been loſt, and ſeven hundred of the Romans; which is a great argument of the Romans Conſtancy and Reſolution, that, not regarding ſo many loſſes by fight, or ſhipwracks ſuſtained, they did yet with patience bear and overcome the power of their Enemy, the frowns of Fortune, the tedious labour and pains, and the poverty of their Treaſury.

512 Faſti Capitol. Zonaras

After this the Government of C. Lutatius the Conſul was prorogued, that he might ſettle affairs in Sicily; thither likewiſe was ſent his brother one of the new Conſuls, Q. Lutatius C.F. C.N. Cerco, whoſe Colleague was A. Manlius T.F.T.N. Theſe did by their wiſdom order the Province, and ſetled all things in peace and quiet, deſiding all controverſies and taking away all cauſes of quarrels and tumults, which after ſo great motions and alterations were unavoidably remaining. They diſarmed all the Sicilians who adhered to Hamilcar, as likewiſe the Gauls who had revolted from him; furthermore the Gauls were commanded to depart out of the Roman Empire, becauſe, beſides other offences, when they were in the Garriſon on the top of Mount Eryx, they plundered the Temple of Venus. The Sicilian Cities according to their ſeveral abilities were forced to pay Tribute and Cuſtom; and it was made a Province, whither a Pretor was ſent to command and govern yearly.

Polybius 2.7

Appian

Eutropius b. 2

In the mean time Embaſſadours came from Carthage to intreat, They might redeem their Captives, and by Order from the Senate they were all reſtored without Ranſome, as many as were in Publick cuſtody; they who were priſoners to private men were redeemed at a certain rate, the greater part whereof was by command of the Senate paid out of the Treaſury. But unlucky accidents at home did much diminiſh the joy of the Roman people. The River Tibur

Oroſius. 4, 10 Auſtin de Civ. Dei. 18 did this year flow higher then ordinary, and filled all the lower parts of the City with large Pools of Water. Many buildings were by the firſt force thereof waſhed to the ground, and others, having their foundation rotted (for the Inundation continued many dayes) after the fall of the water, did much decay.

Val Max. 1.4.4 Oroſius

After this there happened a greater calamity by Fire, which ſuddenly beginning in the night time, and running through many ſtreets of the City, deſtroyed an incredible multitude of houſes and men; and, not content with private harmes, conſumed all the buildings in the whole Circumference of the Forum. At length it ſeized upon the Temple of Veſta; but then L. Cæcilius the Chief Prieſt, ſeeing the Holy things and ſecret Pledges of the Roman Empire to be in danger, behaved himſelf worthy of his Office, for he leaped into the midſt of the fire without any care of himſelf, ſo he might but reſcue the Holy things which the Virgins had forſaken and left behind them, which accordingly he performed. Himſelf having his Arme half burnt and his Eye-ſight ſpoiled, beſide the comfort he received from his good act, was eminently rewarded by the people of Rome, who Decreed, That as often as he went to the Senate he ſhould be carried in a Chariot, which from the Foundation of the City was never granted to any man before.

In the mean time Q. Lutatius the Conſul, with his brother Catulus and Q. Valerius the Proprætor, having ſetled affairs in Sicily returned home to the City and made each of them them their Triumph; C. Lutatius Catulus on the fourth of the Nones of October, and Q. Valerius on the day before the Nones of the ſame moneth. There was a memorable ſtriſe between theſe two concerning the Triumph of Valerius; for Lutatius his Triumph being without diſpute agreed upon, Q. Valerius contending that his pains and labour were equal in the Victory deſired the like honour as he had undergone the like care and danger. Catulus on the other ſide alledged, That the leſſer authority ſhould not be equalized with the greater in the diſtribution of honours. Trium. Capitol

The queſtion being hotly argued, Q. Valerius challenged Catulus to ſtand to arbitration, Whether or no the Carthaginian Navy were not overcome by his conduct? Catulus refuſed not to anſwer him; whereupon Atilius Calatinus was choſen Arbitrator, who asked Valerius, Whether the Conſul's authority or the Pretors ought to have prevailed in caſe they had diſſented in their conſultation about fighting? and in caſe their Anguries had been different whether of the two ought to have been followed? To which when Valerius anſwered, That in both caſes the Conſul's authority ought to have prevailed above the Pretor's; Calatinus not expecting till Catulus ſpake, paſſed ſentence on his ſide. But Q. Valerius, though he was caſt by the judgment of the Arbitrator, did yet obtain liberty to Triumph, his virtue and courage having been very famous in that War. This year C. Aurelius Cotta, and M. Fabius Buteo being Cenſors, made the nine and thirtieth Luſtration. There were numbred two hundred and threeſcore thouſand Citizens; two Tribes being ſuperadded, the one called Velina the other Quirina, the number of Tribes was made up five and twenty, and ſo continued. Sicily being now wholly ſubdued, as much as belonged to the Carthaginians, and peace with them concluded, all things ſeemed not only quiet but very ſafe and ſecure; when behold a ſudden war, ariſing from whence it was leaſt feared, did for a few dayes aſtoniſh all Italy both with the terror and fear of an Inteſtine broil, as likewiſe with wonder at the ſpeedy diſpatch and iſſue of it. Agellius 13. 14 *Valer. The Faliſci, I know not upon what account, grew ſo mad as to riſe up in arms againſt the Romans; but the Conſuls being ſent with the Legions quelled them within ſix dayes, and reduced them to ſubjection. In the former battel, for 'tis reported two were fought, the Victory was doubtful, for their foot prevailed though their horſe were routed. But in the latter the victory being on the Romans ſide complete, cauſed the Faliſci to humble themſelves and beg peace, having loſt fifteen thouſand men: upon their yielding they were fined with the loſſe of their arms, horſe, houſhold-ſtuffe, ſervants and half their Territories. Their City in whoſe ſtrength they confided was tranſlated from a craggy difficult place into plain open ground. The people of Rome were meditating a more ſevere revenge, out of anger againſt a City which had ſo often rebelled, but reſtrainig their wrath by the advice of Papyrius (who had written the form of ſubmiſſion by the Conſuls own command) That the Faliſci ſubmitted not to the Power but the Faith of the Romans: And ſo much did the ſacred name of Publick Faith prevail with them all, that they adjudged the conquered party to no ſeverer puniſhment then was agreed upon. This war gave occaſion to have this year ended with the Triumphs of the Conſuls; Q. Lutatius Triumphed on the Calends of March over the Faliſci, *A. Italy being now once more at Peace within it selfe, their Publick Pleasures, and Delights did likewise encrease with their Power and security. When the Roman Games were exhibited, C. Claudius A. P. F. C. N. Centhe, and M. Sempronius C. F. M. N. Tuditanus being Consulls, L. Livius Andronicus, in immitation of the Græcian Comædies and Trajedies, reduced the Stage-Plays, which heretofore were onely Satyrs into Fables, and feigned representations. The same year likewise gave beginning to another sort of sports. On the fourth of the Calends of May, the Floralia were instituted out of the Sybills books, to avert the blasting of fruits and plants then springing forth. L. and M. Publicius Malleolus, Brothers and Ædiles of the People did exhibit publick shews out of the Fines raised from Herdsemen who had fed their Cattel on Commons. The Magistracy of these Brethren was in another respect very memorable; in that they caused that Clift (which from them received the name of Publicius) to be made plain and even, for the more commodious passage of Carriages into Mount Aventine, whereas before the Rock in that place was craggie and almost impassable. They likewise built the Temple of Flora in the great shew-place.

These things were acted at home, while all things were quiet abroad, onely there was a suspicion that the Gauls and Ligurians had a designe for War. That these Provinces therefore were assigned to the Consulls, and war then commenced with the Gauls, is rather a Conjecture, then a true History, there being no antient writer extant which accurately describes those things; This one thing is Certain, that a Latine Colonie was planted at Spoletium in Umbria. The next year also 'tis easier to say, there was no Peace because the Temple of Janus was not shut, then to declare where or with what successe the war was managed. And the Consulship of Q. Mamilius Q. F. Q. N. and Q. Valerius Q. F. P. N. is hardly known by any other passage then that Ennius the first Elegant Roman Poet was that year borne. But the year after, when Ti. Sempronius Ti. F. C. N. Gracchus and P. Valerius Q. F. P. N. Falto were Consulls, the Gallick wars brake out again, and the Ligurians a new Enemy, were then first invaded by a Roman Army. This Province fell to the lot of T. Sempronius. P. Valerius encountred the Gaules, at the first with ill successe, having lost three thousand five hundred men: But, entring fight again he obtained a signall Victory, wherein fourteen thousand Gaules were slain, and two thousand taken. But, by reason of the loss susteined in the former battel, the Consul was denied the honor of Triumph, especially seeing his prosperous fight was rather to be attributed to the Fortune of the Common-wealth, then to his wise management of the business. For after the first fight, understanding that assistance was comeing to him from Rome, he said, he had rather perish with all his Army, then obtain Victory by the helpe of others; and in this fury he cast himselfe and the Roman Army into the hazard of a battell. T. Gracchus had better and more happy successe, for having overthrown the Enemy in a set battell, he depopulated great part of Liguria; From thence he crossed over into Sardinia and Corsica, and bringing back a vast multitude of Captives, gave occasion to that proverb of Sardi Venales, whereby is signified any thing that is plentifull, and at an underrate to be sold.

But

But to confeſs the truth, the Romans had at this time rather a good opportunity then a juſt cauſe of poſſeſſeing Sardinia and Corſica. The Carthaginians after the Sicilian Peace, were involved in a very troubleſome war with their Mercenaries, and reduced even to the utmoſt extremity; whereupon other their Hirelings, who were in a Garriſon in Sardinia, ſlew Boſtar the Carthaginian Generall with all his men: Hanno being ſent from Carthage to puniſh their Villany, they inveigled his Army into a ſociety of Rebellion, and apprehending him, nailed him to the Croſs, and having ſlain all the Carthaginians, they had poſſeſſed almoſt all the ſtrong holds throughout the Iland, till upon a falling out between them and the Sardinians, they were expelled the Iland, and betook themſelves into Italy. Then did they accompliſh that which while they were in Sardina they could not, for at that time they had invited the Romans to the Dominion of that Iland: But being now preſent either by the importunity of their Entreatys, or by plainly demonſtrating what an occaſion was offer'd of encreaſing the Roman Power, they prevailed with them to ſail over into Sardinia. For it is a virtue of no ordinary ſtrain, to abſtain from other mens goods when they may with eaſe be poſſeſſed, neither can covetous or ambitious men well or long diſſemble their greedy deſires: But 'twill not be amiſs for the better underſtanding of this buſineſs, to relate ſome foregoing circumſtances. The Romans, that they might gain the Reputation of Humanity, did in the beginning of this Warre, very much favour the Carthaginian cauſe. And, though they ſent them no aſſiſtance as was deſired, yet they refuſed to entertain the Uticans, or any others who revolted to them: They commanded their Merchants out of Sicily and Italy to accommodate the Carthaginians with all neceſſary Proviſions, prohibiting all traffick with their Enemies; and gave licence of hiring men out of Italy for this war. They ſent likewiſe Embaſſadors, though in vaine, to compoſe the ſtrife: A little before there aroſe a controverſie, becauſe the Carthaginians had taken ſome Italian Merchants conveighing Commodities to the Enemy, and ſecured them in publick Priſons, and they had now five hundred of them in chains, and having ſlain not a few, had caſt them into the ſea to prevent the diſcovery of the thing; whereupon the Romans declared themſelves agrieved, and began to threaten War: But the Carthaginians reſtoring thoſe whom they had in cuſtody, ſo pacified the Romans, that they in anſwer ſent back without Ranſom all other Priſoners taken in the Sicilian war. Yet at length Ambition prevailed, with a deſire to cruſh that People, with whom they had for four and twenty yeares together waged war with various ſucceſs, and foreſaw, that unleſs in time they prevented it, they muſt be forced to fight again. Wherefore when the Carthaginians, (having againſt their wills loſt Sardinia, and now finiſhed their war with the Mercenarys) meditated Revenge upon the Authors of Rebellions and Revolts; the Romans laid hold of this occaſion, and decreed, that War ſhould be proclaimed againſt Carthage, unleſs they laid down their Armes, which they had taken up, ſeemingly againſt their Rebells, but indeed and really againſt the Romans. Whereupon the Carthaginians unwilling in an unſeaſonable time to undertake ſo great a War, did not only quit Sardinia, but upon the Romans demand, added likewiſe twelve hundred Talents of ſilver, to their former fine. This injury did moſt of all incenſe the minds of the Carthaginians, and is thought to be the only cauſe of that war which was ſoon after commenced, and proſecuted by Hannibal. For Hamilcars conſtant Hatred of Romans (to which the ſecond Punique war is chiefly imputed) was not by any other meanes more hotly exaſperated, or ſtrongly fomented. But theſe things happened afterwards.

In the mean time L. Cornelius L.F. Ti.N. Lentulus Claudinus, and Q. Fulvius M. F. Q. N. Flaccus being made Conſuls had Gaul on this ſide the Po for their Province. That a Colonie was this year planted at Valentia, though many affirm it is no conſtant and general opinion, unleſs there be another Valentia beſides Vibo, which Authors of better credit affirm to have been peopled fifty years after in the Conſulſhip of Quintus Flaminius and Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus. The Conſuls in Gallia, while they kept their forces united, had a ſafe and proſperous Expedition, but after they had divided their Legions out of greedineſs to waſte more places, the Camp of M. Fulvius was in the night time aſſaulted and very hardly defended. The Gauls departing without effecting their deſign, did afterward return with greater terror having their forces much augmented. For the prime men of the Boii taking counſel ſecretly together, raiſed a vaſt power of Tranſalpines againſt the Romans. In the mean time L. Lentulus the Conſul, who had marched with his Army into the Ligurian Territories, obtained there a great victory. It was ordered therefore he ſhould make a Triumph, which accordingly he did on the Intercalary Ides. Some Authors report, That theſe Conſuls were the firſt who led the Roman army over the Po, and that in divers fights were ſlain four and twenty thouſands, and taken five thouſands of the Ligurians and Inſubrian Gauls. But I rather believe, that the Po was croſſed over and the Inſubrians firſt encountred in their own Country in the next Gallick commotion. About this time Embaſſadors were ſent to Ptolomie King of Egypt to profer him aſſiſtance in his wars againſt Antiochus and the Syrians; The King returned thanks, telling them withall, That he had now no need of aſſiſtance inaſmuch as the quarrel was compounded. After this Hiero came to Rome to the great joy of the Romans, who entertained him with all the reſpect as befitted them to do, being a confederate Prince, having deſerved much of them, and a companion in their greateſt Victory. He beſtowed on the people of Rome two hundred thouſand Buſhels of Wheat; he came to behold the ſports which were prepared againſt next year.

For according to ſome Authors the ſecular ſports were celebrated in the Conſulſhip of P. Cornelius

Fasti Capitolini 417. Cornelius L. F. T. N. Lentulus Caudinus and C. Licinius P. F. P. N. The Masters of the Revells were M. Æmilius M. F. & M Livius M. F. M. N. Salinator. In the mean time the Boian Princes, confideing in the multitude of Auxiliarys they had from beyond the Alpes, sent to the Consulls demanding, That Ariminum with it's Territories, which without doubt of right belonged to the Gauls, should be restored them, otherwise a terrible and Destructive War would ensue. The Consuls, having not drawn their forces together, durst not hazard those few they had in the fortune of a Battel, neither could they consent unto the Gaules their demand, they answered therefore, They should send Embassadors to the Senate, to signifie their minds. The Gauls accepted of the condition, and a truce was concluded on for some days, while the Embassadours could go and return again. The Ambassadours at Rome received a denial from the Senate, and greater preparations were made for this War, whereof there was afterward no use, in asmuch as Fortune without the expence of Roman blood put an end to it? While the Embassadoures returned, the Boians fought a set Battel with their Transalpine Auxiliaries, upon this Occasion; The Auxiliaries without the knowledge of the Boian people, had marched as far as Ariminum, whence a suspicion arose, that their maine Errand was to possess that Territory themselves; the Boians therefore were so enraged, that having slain their Kings Ates and Galatus as Traitours, they endeavoured by force to expell these strangers out of their Land, whereupon a Battell was fought with much slaughter, and both sides being thereby much weakned; the Transalpines returned home, the Boians bought their Peace of the Romans with part of their Grounds. This war being so quickly dispatched, the Consuls went into Liguria: where P. Lentulus, having in a set Battel Overthrown the Enemie, led his Army through the whole Region, taking Castles, some by storme, some by composition. C. Licinius intending to saile over into Corsica, not having boats enough to transpott his whole Army, sent M. Claudius Glysias before, with a Party; who, being vainly arrogant, when he saw that the Corsicans were terrified at his coming, without any respect to the Consull by whose direction he was sent, or consideration of his own office and duty, made a league with them, upon certain Conditions, in his own Name; thinking thereby to attain unto himselfe the Glory of having reduced that Iland. But the Consul following with the Residue of the Army, forbore not to prosecute them with armes (notwithstanding they alledged in their own behalfe the Claudian Peace) till he brought them into subjection. The Senate to clear the Commonwealth from the Imputation of Breach of Faith, ordered Glycias the Authour of that dishonourable peace, to be delivered up into the hands of the Corsicans; and they refusing to take him, he was put to death in the Common Gaole. This year were Censours L. Cornelius L. F. T. N. Lentulus Caudinus Q. Lutatius C. F. C. N. Cerco, who made no Lustration because Q. Cerco died in his Censourship. For all Claudius was delivered up to the Corsicans, and then executed as a Malefactor, yet the Barbarians could not by any means be perswaded, that the Roman war afterward was just against them. Their minds therefore being agrieved with the memory hereof were easily tempted to break out in armes, in imitation of their neighbour Iland Sardinia. For the Carthaginians by secret promises had incited the Sardinians to Rebellion, who readily entertained the motion, as not too much hating their old Masters, nor loving their new ones.

This news being brought to Rome, filled the City both with fear and indignation, not that they much regarded Sardinia, but because they perceived the Carthaginian war would break out again; which because they believed the sooner it was begun would prove the easier; (The Carthaginians having not well recovered themselves since the last war) they resolved to prepare themselves, and commence it as soon as might be. The Carthaginians, willing at that time to endure any thing rather then a Roman war, were hereupon so terrified, that having once and again sent Embassadours in vaine, they did at length send ten of their Prime Nobility, most humbly entreating, That they might enjoy the Peace they had obtained. Nevertheless they could not receive any mild Answer; till Hanno the youngest among the Embassadours, but of an undaunted mind, and a free tongue, replied, If you are premptorily determined to deny us that Peace which we have bought, not for a year or two, but for ever, at least restore us our price we gave you, Sicily and Sardinia: In private contracts 'tis no honest man's part, when the bargain is made void, to receive his Commodities back, and not return the money laid down for them. Then the Romans, being ashamed to seem the Authors of an unjust war, dismissed the Embassadours with a better Answer. So one of this yeares Consulls C Atilius A. F. A. N. Bulbus (now the second time Consull) remained in Italy, the other, T. Manlius. T. F. T. N. went according to his lot into Sardinia. He, in many places encountring the Enemy with good success, appeased the whole Iland, subdued the Sardinians, and triumphed over them the sixth of the Ides of March.

These things being accomplished, and the Roman Armes laid down, as having no Enemy, the Temple of Janus was shut; an unusuall sight in Rome, and not seen, after the dayes of Numa, for the space of about four hundred and forty yeares. In which respect I account the City of Rome very unhappy, that being perpetually employ'd in great and difficult labours, could never obtain the fruits thereof. For, whereas no wise man wageth war but to procure Peace, this City after so many and great warres happily finished, sometimes could not obtain: but never could long keep Peace. For even then new Rumours of War, after a few moneths, were heard of, which bereaved them of the ſweetneſs of that Peace, which they had ſcarce well taſted of. The Sardinians, who had lately been ſubdued, ſhake off the yoke, and the Corſicans brake out in Rebellion, and the Ligurians raiſed Tumults, even in Italy it ſelfe. Therefore L. Poſthumius A.F. A.N. Albinus and Sp. Carvilius Sp. F. C.N. Maximus being Conſuls had order to leavy new Armies, which being diſpoſed of in three bodies to prevent the enemies from helping one the other, L. Poſthumius aſſailed the Ligurians, Sp. Carvilius the Corſicans, and P. Cornelius was deſigned for Sardinia. This Iland being of a very unwholſome aire afflicted his Army with the Plague and other diſeaſes, whereby many mortals with the Pretor alſo himſelf periſhed. Hereupon the Sardinians grew bold and high, but were ſoon quelled after the arrival of Sp. Carvilius in a great ſet battel; the Corſicans were likewiſe ſubdued by him. For which exploits it was decreed he ſhould Triumph, as he did on the Calends of April. In Ligura likewiſe affairs ſucceeded well by the management of the other Conſul with his Army. At Rome Tutia one of the Veſtal Virgins being condemned of Inceſt which ſhe had baſely committed with a ſlave, ſlew her ſelf with her own hands. After this C. Atilius A.F. A.N. Bulbus A. Poſthumius A.F. L.N. Albinus being Cenſors, made the fortieth Luſtration. 'Tis probable the number of Citizens was this year leſſe then heretofore (though I find not the number recorded) becauſe the Cenſor, in order to the encreaſe of Citizens, compelled every man to ſwear, That he would marry for the Procreation of children. This year Cn. Nevius a Campanian who had received pay in the Carthaginian war, did firſt add Fables to his Scenes. In the mean time the Ligurians and Sardinians again rebelling, were allotted Provinces to the new Conſuls; Q. Fabius Q.F. Q.N. Maximus Verrucoſus managed the Ligurian War, M. Pomponius M.F. M.N. Matho the Sardinian; whereas it was reported, That the Carthaginians were the cauſe of this commotion, by private meſſengers ſtirring up the Barbarians to Rebellion: There were Embaſſadors ſent to Carthage with very harſh inſtructions, To require the tribute due, to command them to abſtain from all Ilands under the Roman juriſdiction, adding threats of war unleſs they performed what was required at their hands.

The Carthaginians had now ſince their former calamities gathered ſtrength and courage, chiefly by the induſtry of Hamilcar, who did not only reduce thoſe who had revolted in Africa, but had further extended the Empire: They had likewiſe by his conduct acquired great Dominions in Spain. Wherefore they anſwered the Embaſſadors roughly enough to all particulars; but when they, according to their inſtructions, propounded to the Carthaginians a Spear and a Cadureus, offering them their choice of which they pleaſed, they anſwered, That they would chuſe neither, but would accept of which ſoever the Legates ſhould think fit to leave behind. Henceforward a cruel hatred began to burn between theſe two people, but neither party being willing as yet to commence the war, they contiuued in a ſhew of friendſhip, rather becauſe they did not fight, then that the peace was firm.

Dio. apud Valeſium. Polyb. b. 1 Cornelius Nepos in Hamilcar

Both the Conſuls, returning to Rome and declaring what they had done, obtained leave to Triumph. Q. Fabius had ſlain many Ligurians in battel, and had compelled the reſt to contain themſelves upon the Alpes, and made the skirts of Italy ſecure from their plundrings. He Triumphed over the Ligurians on the Calends of February. Upon the Ides of March afterwards M. Pomponius Triumphed over the Sardinians, whom he had overcome. Nevertheleſe the Sardinians did not abſtain from War, but being by their loſſes rather incenſed then broken, they renewed the Rebellion with much greater ſtrength. Therefore both the Conſuls, M. Amilius M.F. M.N. Lepidus and M. Poblicius L.F. L.N. Malleolus were ſent into Sardinia: they gathered together great ſtore of plunder and ſpoil in that Iland, which when they carried over with them into Corſica they utterly loſt, the Ilanders there taking it from them. At home likewiſe there were very vehement tumults at this time, for C. Flaminius Tribune of the people propounding an AgrarianLaw, That the Picene and Gallick grounds which belonged to the Senones ſhould be equally divided amongſt the people. The Senate oppoſed it, and not being able to perſwade the Tribune by entreaties or threats, at length gave order to the Magiſtrates to raiſe an Army for defence of the Commonwealth; Flaminius could not yet be drawn from his reſolution, obſtinate againſt all force, and inexorably by intreaties. His father likewiſe admoniſhed him, To ſubmit himſelf to the will of the Senate, and not be eſteemed an author of ſedition. But he ſtill perſiſting in his deſign, called an Aſſembly, intending to recite the Law. But then his father Flaminius in grief and anger came to the Pulpit, and taking his ſon by the hand pulled him away.

A wonderful Example was there ſhown with what Piety and Reverence all men held eſteem of the power of a Father: For he who had contemned the indignation and cruel threats of the whole Senate, now in the heat of work, in the view of all the Roman people, to whom the Conſtitution of Law would have been moſt acceptable, ſuffered himſelf by the hand of one only old man to be drawn down from the higher place. The Modeſty of the Aſſembly in this buſineſs is not to be forgotten, who though they ſaw all their hopes fruſtrated by the Tribune's departure, did not by the leaſt murmure ſignifie their diſcontent at his fathers action. But the Law was by this means rather deferred then avoided. C. Carvilius the other Tribune aſſiſting his Colleague, this as it cauſed corruption of manners amongſt the Commons, ſo it gave beginning to that moſt grievous Gallick war which brake out the eighth year after the diviſion of the grounds.

After this M. Pomponius M. F. M. N. Matho, and C. Papirius C. F. L. N. Maso, being Conſulls, had for their Provinces M. Pomponius Sardinia, and C. Papirius Corſica. In both places the Enemies gave back, betaking themſelves into woods and craggy Mountains, defending themſelves more by the ſcituation of Places then by Armes. Therefore M. Pomponius ſeeing it more hard to find the Enemy, then to overcome him, cauſed hounds to be brought him out of Italy, who by their ſcent conducted him to the men, whom he ſurprized like wild beaſts in their dens, and kennells. C. Papirius, having overcome the Corſicans, purſued them into the mountains, where both his labour and danger was very great, and many of his ſouldiers periſhed either by thirſt, or by the ſudden incurſion of the Enemy, till having found water and refreſhed his Army; the Corſicans fearing the Iſſue hearkned to the Conſul's counſel of ſubmitting themſelves.

Capitol. Marmora.

While the Conſuls were detained by theſe Employments, a General Aſſembly was called by M. Duilius. M. F. M. N. who was made Dictatour for that purpoſe; he nominated C. Aurelius L. F. C. N. Cotta for Maſter of the horſe; there were likewiſe Cenſours T. Manlius T. F. T. N. Torquatus, Q. Fulvius M. F. Q. N. Flaccus, but being not Legitimately made, they reſigned up their office. Writers doe to this year aſſigne the Original of a new Cuſtome, not unworthy to be mentioned. There had been no divorce from the beginning of the City to this time, Sp. Carvilius Ruga firſt of all diſmiſſed his wife becauſe ſhe was barren, being by the Cenſours bound in Oath, to Marry a Wife for procreation of Children. The people were much diſpleaſed not ſo much at the Novelty as cruelty of the things, for wives being joyned in a perpetual ſociety of life, they thought it unjuſt and inhumane for any cauſe whatſoever to repudiate them. They likewiſe ever after hated Sp. Carvilius though he was of neceſſity compelled by the judgment of his friends to diſmiſs his wife who was much beloved by him, and very agreeable in her Manners. From this time there was more knots in the Law, and more ſuits in the Prætours Courts, then being invented the Marriage Cautions, of which cunning there was no need before Divorces were in uſe. This yeare likewiſe began a new cuſtom concerning the Honours of their Generalls; C. Papirius perſwading himſelfe he had performed Actions worthy of a Triumph (having now at length firmely ſetled Corſica) and being denied that honour by the Senate, he did toward the End of his Conſulſhip make a Triumph in Mount Alban on the third of the Nones of March. It pleaſed many to imitate this Example when they were denied a Triumph to make one in the Albane Mount, henceforward he was preſent at all ſports in a mirtle Crown in memory of the Action, that he had overcome the Enemie in the Mirtle Fields. All things being at quiet in Sardinia and Corſica, the Ligurians ſtill held out, againſt whom were ſent M. Aimilus L. F. Q. N. Barbula and M. Junius D. F. D. N. Pera, then Conſulls. They, in their March underſtanding that the Gaules began to ſtirre, entred their Territorys with the Army. For they being incenſed and provoked by the Flaminian Law, the Romans feared leſt being Warlike, and angry men, they ſhould raiſe any Commotions; it was therefore forbidden by the Magiſtrates to accommodate any Gaule with Gold or ſilver; for the Boians, and other Gaules by ſelling of ſlaves and other Commodities had gathered a great bank of Money, and a ſuſpicion was raiſed, that it was for a Roman War. Wherefore being more incenſed, 'tis ſaid that they underſtanding the Conſulls were deſigned for Liguria, did in private meetings conclude, while the Roman Armies were far abroad, to March up to and aſſault the City it ſelfe. But, being terrified with the coming of the Conſulls, and not prepared to make head againſt them, they entertained the Romans with all ſhew of Peace and friendſhip, and counterfeit Reſpects. The Conſulls likewiſe being contented they had prevented the War, fained another cauſe of their coming thither; that through the Gallick Territories they might have a more commodious march to Liguria. The laſt year the Cenſours renounced the office; This year therefore Q. Fabius Q. F. Q. N. Maximus Verruſcoſus, and M. Sempronius C. F. M. N. Tuditanus made the one and fourtieth Luſtration, While theſe things are acting in Italy and at Rome, a new war was occaſioned with the Illyrians upon their ground. The Illyrians exerciſing Pyracy, a cruell and greedy kind of theft, had taken many Italian Merchants coming out of the Haven of Brunduſium and had ſlain ſome; at the firſt the Senate hearing this, among other complaints, did not much regard it. But the Pirates boldneſſe encreaſing by their impunity, and complaints more frequently and earneſtly made unto them, they thought fit to ſend Embaſſadours, to demand ſatisfaction; as alſo to plead the Iſſæans cauſe who had lately committed themſelves to the faith of the Romans; for they inhabiting an Iland in the Jonian ſea, were daily proſecuted with all manner of injuries by the Illyrians, from whom they had revolted. C. & L. Coruncanii were ſent on this Errand: While they were in their journey, Agron (the ſon of Pleuratus) King of the Illyrians, called Ardyæi, to whom their meſſage was directed, departed this life leaving a ſon under age, by name Pinnius, and the Kingdom was governed by Teuta, Step-mother to the young Prince, with the advice of her friends: She being proud, and puffed up with Proſperity, having given Audience to the Roman Embaſſadours with ſome contempt, anſwered, That ſhe would take care that the Romans ſhould receive no publick injury from the Illyrians; but that it was not the cuſtom of the Illyrian Kings, to prohibit private perſons from making what gain they could by ſea. Coruncanius the younger could not refrain his anger at this arrogant ſpeech but uſing an unſeaſonable liberty, though not unjuſt, replied, But 'tis a cuſtom with the Romans, Teuta, to proſecute private wrongs with publick lick vengeance, and relieve the injur'd party; and we will endeavour, by the assistance of the gods, to compel you gladly and quickly to mend and reform your Kingly Customs. The woman was above measure offended at these words, but, for the present, dissembling her mind, when the Embassadors were departed, sent some Pirates after them, who slew Coruncanius the younger with part of his Retinue, burnt the Governours of ships with fire, and clap the rest in chains. Colemporus also the Embassador of the Issæans was slain by the same Pirates. Florus 2.5.3 Zonaras.

The Romans understanding these things, did erect statues of three foot long in honour of Coruncanius the younger, and P. Junius, and decreed war against Teuta and the Illyrians. Teuta ignorant in government, having not learn't either by Reason or Custome to correct the Vices of her Feminine wit, behaved her self as timerous in bearing the anger of others, as she had been headlong in provoking it. Having therefore intelligence that a war was preparing against her, she promised, To restore those who were living, as for the dead, whom the Pirats had slain without her command, it lay not in her power to restore them. This Embassie (though it offered little satisfaction for so great injuries, yet because the Romans hoped to compose the Illyrian broils without a war) was entertained, only they required, That those who slew the Embassadors should be delivered up to them. Appian Plinie 34, 6.2 Liv. Epit. 20 Zonaras Dio.

The woman seeing the war, she so much fear'd, to be deferred, out of the lightness of her mind returned from fear to her former insolence, denying to deliver up any one; and that she might confirm her words with as much fierceness in action, sendeth forces presently to besiege Issa. Whereupon the Romans thought fit to make no more delay, but sent both the Consuls thither with land and sea forces; the Consuls were L. Posthumius A.F. A. N. Albinus, and Cn. Fulvius Cn.F. Cn.N. Centumalus. Cn. Fulvius had the command of the Navy consisting of two hundred ships; L. Posthumius was General of the Legions. Then again Teuta, being terrified, sent Demetrius Pharius to the Consuls to crave Peace. And they agreed upon a Truce, In case the Illyrians would quit Corcyra which they had lately possessed. The Romans being gone to take in Corcyra, Teuta, as if all fear were now far from her doors, returned to her former counsels, and sent Deputies to besiege Dyrrachium and Apollonia. Others report, That Corcyra was not surrendred with the consent of Teuta, but by the private design of Demetrius, who, knowing that he was secretly accused of some crimes before Teuta, thought by betraying that place he was Governour of, to find a sure refuge and protection amongst the Romans against her fury. Zonaras Polyb. 2.11 Fasti Capitol. 524 Polybius Polyb. 2.12 Dio. apud Fulvium Ursinum.

The Illyrian Garrison was no sooner surrendred, but the Corcyrians by publick consent submitted themselves to the Romans, seeing no other means left for their safety, but to be protected against the injury of the Illyrians by the power of so illustrious a City. From Corcyra the Consul sailed to Apollonia, where he met L. Posthumius having wasted over his Army from Brundusium, which consisted of twenty thousand foot and two thousand horse. The Apolloniatæ greedily entertained the Romans, and committed themselves to their Faith. This being relieved they went to Dyrrachium, which presently became the Romans: The Illyrians who had began the siege thereof, running away for fear upon the first intelligence of the Consul's coming. With the same haste also the Ardyæi were forced into subjection, and Embassadors came from divers Nations of the farthest Illyrium with promise, To obey their commands if they might be admitted into Friendship; in which number were the Parthini and Asintanes. Demetrius Pharius was a great help and furtherance in these Atchievements, for being carried up and down with the Consuls, he extolled the Strength and Integrity of the Romans, accused the Rashness and Inconstancy of Teuta; and some by reason and counsel, others by his authority he perswaded into a society and confederacy with the Romans. After this they steared their course to Issa, and in their passage landing at many places, they took most Towns without any great difficulty. Nutria was stoutly defended by the Illyrians, and cost much blood before it was taken, some Collonels also and a Questor being slain there. The Romans grief for this was the lesser because they surprised twenty Vessels coming from Peloponnesus with money and great spoil. When they were come to Issa it happened as it had done at Dyrrachium, the siege was presently raised upon the approach of the Roman Navy: The Barbarians flying this way and that way into several places, except only the Pharians, who for Demetrius sake, with the safety both of body and goods, were received into protection, forasmuch as he was born in the same Iland, and had the Government of it under King Agron. The news of these did diversly affect the instable mind of Teuta, sometimes dejected with fear, sometimes again very confident, as she considered the occasion. For as she was possessed with fear when she remembred so many Towns taken and demolished, that the sea coasts were plunder'd and wasted, that the Illyrians every where turned back and fled: On the other side she was encouraged at the stoutness of the Nutrines, and her hopes encreased considering Winter drew nigh, and that the Romans for fear of storms would suddenly depart; wherefore with a small Retinue she retired to Rhizon scituate upon a River of the same name, expecting what remedy time would afford. Polybius Zonaras Dio Polybius Dio Zonaras Polybius Appian Polybius Appian. Polybius Orosius. 4,13 Dio Polybius

Her vain opinion was confirmed by the actions of the Consuls, who having committed to the Government of Demetrius the greater part of the Country they had taken, retired to Dyrrachium with the Navy and Army. But when she saw that L. Posthumius stayed behind with forty ships, and leavied an Army out of the Neighbour Cities to protect the Ardyæans and other Illyrians who had revolted to the Romans, then Teuta began utterly to deſpair and thought of buying her peace upon any conditions whatſoever. At the beginning of the ſpring therefore ſhe ſent Embaſſadors to Rome, excuſing what was paſt as being done by the Command of Agron whoſe Acts it was neceſſary for her to maintain. The Romans granted peace, not to her, who had no proper power of adminiſtring affairs, neither had deſerved any favour at their hands, but to Pinnens the ſon of Agron, on theſe conditions, That he ſhould duely pay what tribute was impoſed on him, that he ſhould quit all Illyrium, ſome few places excepted, that he ſhould not ſail beyond Liſſus with above two Boats, and thoſe unarmed. By this peace Corcyca, Pharus, Iſſa, Dyrachium and the Aſintanes became wholly the Romans; what elſe was under Agron his juriſdiction being left to Pinneus. Teuta either for ſhame or by the command of the Romans left off the Government of the Realm, which Demetrius undertook under the name of Protector.

Thus being ended the Illyrian Quarrel, and the Limits of the Roman Empire extended even to Greece; the Commonwealth on the other hand was perplexed, for the Gauls were ready to riſe up in Arms, and the Carthaginians power did mightily encreaſe in Spain, which could not be eſtabliſhed without great danger to the Romans. Haſdrubal the Son-in-law and ſucceſſor of Hamilcar, having revenged the death of his Father-in-law, did, partly by Armes, but more frequently by his Wiſdom and Eloquence, wherein he excelled, reduce many Nations to the Carthaginian ſubjection; and built another Carthage called the New, in a gulf of the ſea by a moſt commodious Haven. But the Gallick affairs being of nearer concernment, hindered for the preſent their deſignes againſt the Carthaginians: They endeavoured therefore to ſtop the proceedings of the Gauls by leagues and Covenants; They ſent likewiſe Embaſſadors to Carthage and to Haſdrubal, warning them, To contein themſelves beyond the River Iberus, and permit the Saguntines to enjoy their liberty, and live according to their own Laws. Theſe things happened in the year when Sp. Carvilius Sp.F. Cn.N. Maximus and Q. Fabius Q.N. Maximus Verrucoſus were again Conſuls. About the ſame time L. Poſthumius Proconſul, who wintered in Illyrium, ſent Embaſſadors from Corcyca to the Ætolians and Achaians, declaring what he had done, For what cauſes the war was undertaken, with what ſucceſs managed, and upon what conditions finiſhed. They were kindly entertained foraſmuch as thoſe Nations and all other the Grecians did vehemently hate the Illyrians by reaſon of the continual Pyracies exerciſed by them under Agron and Teuta.

The Senate hearing this, did allow of what the Proconſul had done, and moreover decreed another Embaſſie in the name of the Commonwealth, to the Corinthians and Athenians, declaring, The people of Romes good affection toward them, and their equity toward all men. Hereby the Romans purchaſed great good will amongſt thoſe people, and the Corinthians forthwith decreed this honour to the people of Rome, That they ſhould be Partners in the Iſthmian Games, which was one of the four greateſt Solemnities in Greece. They were chiefly moved hereunto becauſe the Romans had ſet at liberty, as Apollonia and other Grecian Cities, ſo Corcyca likewiſe, which was a Colonie of the Corinthians; the Athenians alſo embraced the Roman Society, and decreed, They ſhould have the liberty of the City of Athens, and of the Eleuſinian Myſteries. In the mean time Cn. Fulvius Proconſul made a Naval Triumph over the Illyrians on the Calends of Quintilis, and beheaded the Illyrian Nobles whom he led in Triumph. This was the firſt Triumph over the Illyrians.

The next year P. Valerius L.F. M.N Flaccus, and M. Atilius M.F. M.N. Regulus being Conſuls, the number of Pretors was doubled, and they thought fit to create four that they might ſend ſome with command into Sicily and Sardinia. Amongſt theſe M. Valerius was Pretor of Sardinia and Corſica, C. Flaminius of Sicily. At this time there was very great fear of a Gallick war, for 'twas reported that the Boians and Inſubrians conſulted not only one with the other, but with the Tranſalpine people, and had hired a great ſtrength of Mercenaries of the Gæſatæ a people of Gallia. They uſed therefore not only ordinary remedies againſt this evil, but ſuch as a ſevere judge would by no means excuſe, but that the love of ones Country makes ſome things pardonable which in themſelves are horrid. For when (beſides other prodigies they were terrified with) they found in the Sybills books, That the Gauls and Grecians ſhould one day poſſeſſe the City of Rome; That they might by craft avert the threats of the Prediction, by the advice of the Prieſts, they buried alive two Gauls, of each ſex one, and likewiſe two Grecians a man and a woman, in the Beef-market, that ſo they poſſeſſing part of the City, might ſeem to have fulfilled the Prophecy. This was done when M. Valerius M.F. M.N. Meſſalla and L. Apuſtius L.F. C.N. Fullo were Conſuls. This year, amongſt other no conſiderable occurrences, was moſt of it ſpent in making preparation for the Gallick War. There was raiſed a moſt incredible number both of horſe and foot, toward this war all Italy in general joyning with the Romans. Q. Fabius the Hiſtorian, who was preſent at the tranſaction of theſe affairs, reports, There were in arms eight hundred thouſand men. That the number of the Romans and Campanians amounted to the number of two hundred forty eight thouſand and two hundred footmen, and ſix and twenty thouſand and ſix hundred horſemen. All the other multitude were Italians. The Veneti alſo and Cenomanni afforded the Romans the help of twenty thouſand men, who by frequent alarms and incurſions might compel the neighbouring Boians to tarry to the defence of their own Country, and not join themſelves with the other forces of the

the Enemy, becauſe they refuſed to hearken to Termes of Peace which the Romans propounded. For the Veneti and Cenomani being perſwaded to renew friendſhip with Rome, the Inſubrians and Boians perſiſted in Hoſtility; nevertheleſs their ſtrength was not great, their Kings not daring to lead out all their armed men: but being forced to leave ſome at home to defend their Countryes, with the reſt (to wit, fifty thouſand Foot, and twenty thouſand Horſe) they began their march through Etruria towards Rome. Strab.b.5

In the mean time L. Æmilius, Q. F. Cn. N. Papus. & C. Atilius M. F. M. N. had Sardinia and Ariminum, with the adjoyning Gaules for their Provinces. For the Sardinians being aggrieved at the perpetuall preſence of a Prætor, with his Virges and ſignes of Authority did again move Tumults; but C. Atilius the Conſull ſoon quieted them without any great difficulty. L. Æmilius had more to do with the Gaules, having broken through Etruria, and marching to Rome. The Prætour of Etruria being not able to hinder their paſſage, overtook them at Cluſium, and late in the Evening planted his Camp not farre from them. The Gaules invented a ſtratagem whereby to entice the Romans out to battell. In the dead of the night they marched with all their Foot to Fæſulæ, leaving the Horſe behind with inſtruction, at break of day only to ſhew themſelves to the Enemy, and preſently betake themſelves to the Foot Army, where ſhould be reception for them in a convenient Camp, from whence likewiſe they would on the ſudden charge the Romans unawares. Zonaras Polyb. 2.23. &c. Polyb. 2.25. Polyb. 2.23. Polyb 2.5.

The Romans were hereby deceived, and purſued the horſe as if they had fled, and about Fæſulæ were received by the Enemy, freſh and ready prepared, being themſelves weary and void of Counſell, as in an occurrence not foreſeen by them: Their only courſe was either by fight to defend themſelves, or to ſell their bloods at a dear rate: But the Gaules exceeding in number, beſides other advantages, ſlew of the Romans ſix thouſand upon the place, and put the reſt to flight. Diodorus 25. The Gaules endeavouring to take a fenced place upon an hill, (whither the greateſt part of them which fled had betaken themſelves) finding their ſtrength to faile with their laſt nights march, Polyb. the dayes fight, retired to cure and refreſh their bodyes, leaving a party of horſe to beſiege the hillock, not doubting to reduce it into their power the next day, either by force or compoſition. In this very nick of time came L. Æmilius, rather to be wiſhed for, then upon any reaſonable ground expected. For upon the firſt newes of the Gaules ſetting forward, he was ſent to Ariminum, to defend the Coaſts upon the Adriatick ſhore, but hearing their intention was to march to Rome, he marched by very great journeys from Ariminum, and by good luck came to this very place, and pitched his Camp not farre diſtant from the Enemy. The beſieged ſeeing fires in the night time from that part, judging, as was true, that the Roman Army was come, ſent out ſome of their men unarmed, that they might the eaſier paſs the Enemies Guards. The Conſull by them underſtanding the ſtate of Affaires, without any long deliberation, which the time would not permit, at break of day ſet forward with his horſe to the Hillock, giving order to the Tribunes to follow him with the Legions. The Gaules likewiſe were informed by the ſame fires, that the Romans were come, and entred into counſell concerning the preſent affaires. King Aneroeſtus adviſed, that they ſhould not encounter the Enemy, now their ſouldiers were laden with rich ſpoiles, but to return home, and lay aſide their plunder. and then, if occaſion were given of fighting, to return empty and nimble. Every one approving the counſell, they departed before night, taking their journey through Etruria, by the ſea ſide. L. Æmilius having taken in thoſe who fled to the hill, and having intelligence of the Enemies march, would not fight him in a ſet battell, but reſolved to follow them, laying hold of what opportunity time ſhould afford. Polybius. 2. 25 Polyb. 2. 26

In this conjuncture of Affaires fortune once more diſpenced an unexpected accident. The other Conſull C. Atilius arriving at Piſæ from Sardinia, and there landing his Army, marched toward Rome, along the very ſame Etrurian ſhore where the Gaules were returning. Neer Telamon a Port of Etruria, the Scouts of each Army firſt met one the other, and the Conſull, by ſome Priſoners who were brought to him, underſtanding of the Gaules march, and his Colleagues following them, wondred at ſo unuſuall a chance, and being confident of Victory, having the Enemy cooped up between two Conſular Armies, gave order to the Colonells, To array the Army as well as the ground would permit, and lead their Regiments in a ſquare body, and a ſlow march: Himſelfe, obſerving a piece of high ground, opportunely overlooking the way the Gaules muſt of neceſſity paſs, ſet forward with a Party of horſe to prepoſſeſſe it. For he made what haſt he could to fight the Enemy, being aſſured, if he were any thing worſted, to be relieved by his Colleague, if his undertaking ſucceeded, to carry away the chiefe Glory of the Victory. The Gaules ſeeing a troop of Enemies in the higher grounds, conjecturing it was a party of horſe, ſent round about in the night time by Æmilius, ſent out likewiſe ſome of their own horſe, with the aſſiſtance of ſome light armed men, to open the paſſage. But being informed that the other Conſull was come, he was forced to array and marſhall his foot, with their faces each way toward the Enemy, having in the middle their backs joyned one to the other: For they ſaw C. Atilius before them, and well knew that L. Æmilius followed them behind. Againſt L. Æmilius they placed the Tranſalpine Mercenaries, in the front (who from their weapons are denominated Gæſatæ) behind theſe, for a reſerve, were the Inſubrians. Againſt Atilius were oppoſed the Tauriſcans and Boians. The Waggons and Carts were placed as a rampire about each Wing: all their plunder, with a ſufficient guard, was laid aſide upon a neighbouring hill. *Cluver. Ital. hill. The fight was now begun at that hill which C. Atilius had poſſeſſed, whereby L. Aimilius conjectured that his Colleague was there, of whoſe journey he knew nothing certain, only he heard that he was arrived at Piſæ. Taking Counſel therefore on a ſudden he commandeth ſome of his own horſe to ride to the place of fight. There the horſe on both ſides had a very hot encounter wherein C. Atilius the Conſul was ſlain, and his head carried to the Gallick Kings:

Diodorus b. 25 At length the Romans fighting with all might and main, kept the place, and repulſed the enemy. The Horſe-fight being thus managed, the Foot charged each the other. There was to be ſeen a very terrible encounter, as for the number & ſtrength of both parties, ſo for the ſtrange ordering of the Battel; for the Gauls being included between two Roman Armies turned their faces on each ſide to battel; it being very doubtful whether this poſture were a greater advantage to them, in that (having to deal with two enemies) they kept their Rear ſecure, and were of neceſſity compelled to ſtand to it having no way to flee; or that it were a greater diſadvantage to be hemmed in by two Conſular Armies. But the Romans were partly terrified with the very aſpect of the men who ſtood in the front, with ſterne countenances and vaſt bodys; partly encouraged not only with the ſweetneſſe of praiſe, but of plunder alſo, for among the former ranks of the Gaules there was not a man, but gliſtred with golden bracelets and arme ſtrings.

The fight being begun, the light armed men made a great ſlaughter of the Enemie, eſpecially where the Gæſatæ ſtood, who in a barbarous oſtentation had flung away their garments and fought naked in the front. For the gallick ſheilds being long and narrow not able to cover the whole body, they ſtood like ſo many marks expoſed to the Roman darts: and they fell without revenge, being not able to ſtrike the enemie, not to come to pel-mel with light armed men. Wherefore growing deſperate ſome runing raſhly upon the enemie were killed with darts before they could come to handy-ſtroks; others by degrees retiring backward diſordered their own Battel. The Gæſatæ being thus vanquiſhed by the light-armed men, the compleat-armed did on every ſide charge the Boians, Inſubrians, and Tauriſcans and ſlew a great number; nevertheleſſe the enemie ſtood with reſolute minds, being in nothing inferriour but in their weapons; for neither did their ſheilds defend their bodys, neither did their ſwords much offend the

Zonaras by the returne of the horſe, who, having put the Gallick horſe to flight, riding down the Polybius hill made an impreſſion upon the flank of the enemie, ſo much the more irreſiſtible as coming from the higher ground. After this manner Polybius diſcribeth the Battel of the Gaules in Etruria; from whome others with little reaſon do diſſent. For who can eaſily beleive, that the Zonaras Gaules were compelled by a tempeſt to fly in the night time fearing the anger of the Gods? And that C. Atilius ſetting upon their Rear was ſlaine? That afterward, each party for ſome dayes kept within their defences, L. Aimilius fought happily with them? neither are they any more to be credited, who relate the Battel as fought, not on the ſea Coaſts, but, in the Aretine Territories. There is no queſtion made but that fourty thouſand Gaules were then ſlain, little leſſe

Oroſius 4.13 then ten thouſand taken, with Concolitanus one of their Kings: the other King Anteroeſtus who Eutropius 3 was of greater reputation for power and courage, eſcaping with a ſmall company, in his flight
Polyb. cut the throats of all his Kindred and his own alſo. There was great plunder found, which

Polyb. his own goods. Then marching with his own Army and that of Atilius, through Liguria in-
Zonaras to the Boians Country he gave it in plunder to his ſouldiers as a reward of their pains taken, and Polyb. they in a few dayes being ſufficiently laden with ſpoils, he returned to Rome, to the greater Diodorus. joy of all, becauſe the war was formidable. Scarce any mans Triumph was ever ſo much ce-
Polyb. lebrated with acclamations of the people; being otherwiſe of it ſelf very gallant and memorable as for the glory of his noble performances, ſo for the number of the Captives and the worth of the ſpoils. There were many military Enſignes, and abundance of gold Chains and Bracelets, the ornaments of valiant men amongſt the Gauls. But all mens eyes were cheifly

Faſti Capitol. made this Triumph over the Gaules on the third of the Nones of march. This year was made the one and fortieth Luſtration by the Cenſors, Q. Claudius Ap. F. C. N. Centho and M. Junius D. F. D. N. Pera. The fear of the Gallick war was over, but the deſire of revenge remained, and both the next years Conſuls had Gallia for their Province; the Conſuls were T. Manlius T. F. T. N. Torquatus and Q. Fulvius M. F. Q. N. Flaccus again. The people chear-

529 fully decreed them Armies and whatſoever accommodation belongeth to the Commencing or Faſti. Capitol. proſecuting a War. For it was hoped, that after ſo great a victory, they might eaſily drive
Polyb 2.31 away the Gauls from about the Po if they minded their buſineſs. The Conſuls being gone with Zonaras their Armies preſently terrified the Boians into ſubmiſſion; their expedition afterwards was not Polyb. ſo quick by reaſon of the Peſtilence and ſo many ſhowrs which fell. Others affirm, That theſe
Oroſius 4.13 Conſuls croſſed the Po, and in a ſet battel overcame the Inſubrians, that they ſlew three and twenty thouſand and took five thouſand. But I rather follow the authority of Polybius in theſe affairs.

In the mean time becauſe the Conſuls being in a far Country, and were hindred either by action, or by ſhowres, ſo that they could not return to the general Aſſembly: L. Cæcilius L. F. C. N. Metellus was Created for Dictatour, who conſecrated for Maſter of the Horſe M. Fabius M. F. N. Buteo, by the Aſſembly, and Flaminius C. F. N. and P. Furius Sp. F. M. N. Philus were made Conſuls. Theſe as I think were the firſt Romans, who making an invaſion into the Inſubrians Countrey, croſſed the Po with their Army, where the River Paduſa falleth into the Po. Faſti Capit. 530 Liv. Epit. 20. Zonaras. Polybius. 2. 23.

This boldneſs coſt them much labour and ſome blood; for in their paſſes over the River, and while they pitched their Campes, the enemie fiercely falling in upon them ſlew a conſiderable number. The Romans trouble and care upon this News, was mightily encreaſed by many Prodigies related, as that in the Picenian Territories, a River ran blood, that in Etruria the skie was ſeen to burn, that at Ariminum in the night time light appeared, and three Moones were ſeen at the ſame time; alſo a Vultur was ſaid to ſit many dayes together in the Forum at Rome. For though about the ſame time Caria was ſhaken with an Earthquake, and the Rhodian Coloſſus fell down, theſe things were not thought to concern the Romans at all: Concerning the other Prodigies, the Augurs being asked their advice, anſwered that the Conſuls were not rightly choſen, whereupon letters were ſent after them to recal them back to the City. In the mean time the Conſuls having made a Truce, had quitted the Inſubrians Countrey, and afterward having raiſed Auxiliaries in the Countrey of the Cenomanni, had again began to infeſt the gounds lying under the Alpes; whereupon the Inſubrians enraged with anger, carried into the field the golden enſignes (out of the Temple of Minerva) which were called Immoveable, becauſe it was not lawful to ſtir them but in the time of Extreem Neceſſity; and had now met the Romans with an Army of fifty thouſand men, ready to enter battel. At this very time came the letters from the Senate. C. Flaminius either gueſſing at the ſubſtance of the letters, or being pre-informed by his friends, perſwaded his Colleague, not to open them before battel. Zonaras Oroſius. Plutarch. Marcel. c. 4. Zonaras Marianus. Oroſius Plutarch. Zonaras. Polybius. Strab. b. 5. f. 149. Livie. 22. 63. Zonaras Polybius

Being reſolved to fight, they conſulted about their Mercenary Gaules, leſt if they were neglected, they might have cauſe to quarrel; and if admitted to the fight, they might have occaſion of doing harm. For they feared their inconſtancy, eſpecially fighting againſt Neighbours and Kinſmen. At laſt they thought fit to place them on the other ſide of the River, where the bridges being beaten down, they neither could do any harm to the Romans, nor have opportunity to flie, but to truſt in their courage: After a ſharp diſpute the Romans obtained the Victory, to the greater praiſe of the Tribunes then the Conſuls. For C. Flaminius had ordered the Battel ſo near the brink of the River, that there was no ſpace left to receive the Troupes in caſe they had been forced to Retire; which without doubt would have proved the ruine of the whole Army. But the Tribunes having had experience by former battels, that all the Gallick Valour conſiſteth in the firſt charge, which is very hot, but ſhort, and if the brunt of it be once borne, there is no more to be feared from them; did divide the ſpears of the Triarii among the firſt ranks, that with them they might receive the firſt onſet, and afterward flinging them away, draw their Swords when the fight began; the Gallick Swords were preſently blunted, and made crooked at the firſt ſtroke upon the ſpears, and while they were buſie in making them ſtraight, the Romans advancing with their drawing Rapiers, took from them the uſe of their Weapons: For this inconvenience is in the Gallick Swords, that being made only to hack, ſome time is required in lifting up the hand, and preparing for the ſtroaks, which if it be denyed, they are of no uſe: But the Romans thruſting with the point could do their buſineſs in a moment, and ſo preſſing forward to the bodies of the enemies, they did ſecurely thruſt them into the face and breaſts.

Tis reported that nine thouſand Gaules were ſlain, and double the number taken. After the Victory, they ſpoiled the grounds round about, and gathered much Plunder. Then at length they thought fit to read the Senates letters, the contents whereof Philus was ready to obey: But C. Flaminius inſiſted, that this was the envy of ſome Senators, and not the fault of the Auſpices, whereof there could be no more certain argument, then the Victory they had obtained; he ſaid alſo he would not return till either the War was finiſhed, or his Magiſtracy expired: adding moreover, that he would cauſe the Romans to leave off the fooliſh obſervation of Auguries, and ſuch other fopperies. Nevertheleſs P. Furius perſiſting in his reſolution, the Army of Flaminius, fearing that after his departure they ſhould not be very ſafe in the enemies Countrey, perſwaded him to tarry for ſome few dayes; but he did utterly abſtain from all actions; Flaminius taking in the mean time ſome Caſtles, as alſo a City of no ſmall renown among thoſe people. The ſpoiles he gave to his ſouldiers, to prepare their minds for his defence in that quarrel he knew would ariſe between him and the Senate. This City indeed was ſo moved with indignation, that none went out according to the cuſtome to meet the Conſuls, and not only Flaminius but for his ſake Philus alſo was denyed the honour of Triumph. At length Flaminius by the peoples favour entred the City triumphing on the fourth of the Ides of March. Many rich ſpoiles were to be ſeen in that Triumph: Great ſtore of Armes, and chains of Gold, out of which Flaminius dedicated a Token of Victory to Jupiter in the Capitolium, inverting the Gallicks Vow, who had promiſed out of the Romans ſpoiles to dedicate a Chain to Mars. Afterward the other Conſul triumphed over the Gaules, and the Ligurians on the fourth of the Ides of March. The Senates ill will being hereby rather intended then overcome, did not Oroſius 4. 15. Plutarch. Marcel. c. 4. Zonaras Liv. 22. 6, 3. Zonaras Liv. 22. 63. Plutarch Zonaras. *Colum. Having choſen the lighteſt and nimbleſt, not above ſix hundred, with theſe and his Horſe he marched day and night toward the Enemy, whom having overtaken at Claſtidium, he preſently encountred before he could refreſh his men, not of his own good will, but forced by the fury of the Gæſatæ, who being ſuperiour in number, and arrogating to themſelves the maſtery in horſe-

Their bodyes were now not far aſunder, when the Conſull intending to begin the Charge, his Horſe affrighted with the clamour and ſhouts of the Gaules, ſtarted aside and carried him back. The Conſull fearing leaſt this accident being eſteemed an ill Omen, Plutarch had turned about his Horſe for the ſame purpoſe; according to the antient cuſtom, men uſing to turn themſelves about when they worſhipped the Gods. 'Tis reported, that before the firſt onſet, he vowed to Jupiter Feretrius the faireſt of the Enemies Armes; And preſently eſpying Britomarus in the head of his Troopes, his armour gliſtering with Gold and Silver, and other colours, he judged theſe to be the Armes which he had vowed. The King alſo, having ſeen the Roman Generall, advanced far before his men, and by voice and geſture challenged him to Combate; M. Marcellus accepted, and immediately having run him through the breſt-plate, wounded him with the ſpeare, and with the force of his horſes Careere tumbling him to Behold, I the third Roman, as thy ſelfe canſt witneſs, a Generall having ſlain a Generall of the Enemies, doe conſecrate the Royall ſpoyls unto thee: Doe thou ſuffer our affaires proſperouſly to ſucceed even to the iſſue of the Wars.* Marcellus taking horſe again, they entred battell with all might and main, the Romans fighting moſt couragiouſly; the Conſull's boldneſs and good Fortune having filled them no leſs with Valour for the Encounter, then with hopes of Victory. Wherefore neither the Gallick horſe

After this a new enemy aroſe, the Iſtrians who infeſted the Seas with Piracy, and had taken ſome of the Roman Cornſhips. Againſt theſe both the Conſuls were ſent, P. Cornelius, and M. Minucius Rufus, who brought into ſubjection many people either by force or compoſition. Nevertheleſs I do not find that theſe Conſuls Triumphed; perhaps becauſe their Victory coſt ſo much Roman blood. In the mean time the new Conſuls L. Veturius, and C. Lutatius marched to the Alpes with their Army, but making more uſe of Treatyes then Armes, they joyned many of thoſe people with their own good liking to the Roman ſocietie. At this time the Illyrian War was renew'd, by Demetrius Pharius his fault, againſt whom many complaints were made, in as much as under pretence of the Roman friendſhip, he had vexed and afflicted the neighbour Cities according to his pleaſure. For being by the Romans inveſted with power, becauſe he had revolted from Teuta, and having the Tuition of K. Pinnens whoſe mother Triteuta he had married, he behaved himſelf like a King, and grew very heavy and intolerable both to the people of the Countrey, and to Neighbouring Regions. He endeavoured likewiſe to bring under his own Dominion, the people of Illyricum, the friends and aſſociates of the Romans, and moreover contrary to the league, he ſailed beyond Liſſus with fifty Armed Veſſel, to the Ilands Cyclades, ſome of them he plundered, from others he exacted money, and had now drawn into his party, as many Iſtrians as ſince the late War bore a grudg to the Romans, and forced the Atintanes to his ſide. Neither did he any whit fear the Romans, who being involved in a Gallick War, and fearing a Punick one, he thought had neither ſtrength nor Leiſure enough to revenge the Injuries of their aſſociates. And he promiſed himſelf any favour from Philip Kings of Macedon, whom he had aſſiſted in the Cleomenian War, being General of the Illyrick Auxiliaries: A War was therefore decreed againſt him, and preparations made. In the mean time L. Aimilius and C. Flaminus being Cenſours made the three and fourtieth Luſtration, there were numbred two hundred and ſeventy thouſand, two hundred and thirty Citizens. A promiſcuous multitude of Libertines being diſperſed amongſt the Tribes, had hitherto made great confuſion; in imitation therefore of Q. Fabius Maximus, the Cenſours reduced them into four Tribes, the Eſquiline, Palatine, Suburrane; and the Colline. C. Flaminius in the ſame Cenſourſhip fenced in the high way to Ariminum, and built a ſhew-place, both called by his name; The Flaminian ſhew place, and the Flaminian way. The ſame Cenſors committed Matilia, of the Dyers trade, to the judgment of the people; not thinking it to be beneath the dignity of ſo high a Magiſtracy to enquire into petit things. About the ſame time the Illirian rebellion cauſed the Senate to give the charge of that province to M. Livius M. F. M. N. Salinator, and M. Aimilius, M. F. Paulus the Conſuls. Demetrius on the other ſide, was not ſlack in preparing himſelf for the War, having ſent a ſtrong Garriſon to Dimalus, and providing all neceſſaries for the ſuſteining of a long ſiege. In ſome places he gave order for the ſlaughter of the prime men, whoſe fidelity he miſtruſted, and committed the Government to his own creatures. Out of the whole Kingdome he gathered a choice ſtrength of ſix thouſand men, whom he kept with himſelf in Garriſon at Pharos.

In the mean time L. Paulus the Conſul ſetting forth in the beginning of the ſpring, ſailed over into Iliricum, and underſtanding that the enemy put great hopes in the ſtrength of Damalus, which they thought impregnable; he rightly judged that it would ſtrike much terror into them, in caſe he ſhould make himſelf Maſter of it: Aſſaulting it therefore with very much courage and cheerfulneſs, he took it by ſtorm in ſeven dayes time. Neither was the Conſul deceived in his project, for the news hereof being ſpread into the neighbour Regions, meſſengers came flocking from every City, offering up themſelves, and all their goods into the hands of the Romans. The Conſul having received them into protection, ſailed to the Iland of Pharos, where Demetrius kept his Court. But underſtanding that it was well manned with a Garriſon of ſtout Souldiers, furniſhed with proviſion of all ſorts; ſtrong, both by ſcituation, and alſo with artificial works, and guarded with the preſence of the Tyrant himſelf; the Conſul unwilling to begin a tedious ſiege, contrived a ſtratagem of great uſe to the ſpeedy effecting of Victory.

Polybius 3. 16. Polybius 35. 18.

For ſending over the greater part of his Army in the night time, with order to cover themſelves in woody Tracts; Himſelf app ears in open daty with twenty ſhips making towards the Haven, whereby he drew out the Pharians, among whome was Demetrius himſelf, to hinder his landing. Upon the firſt engagement it hapned, as is uſual, that many more by degrees running to the ſuccour of their friends, the City was left almoſt naked of Souldiers. In the mean time thoſe Romans who had landed in the night time, taking their journey through covert places, poſſeſſed an hill even in the midſt between the City and the Haven; thereby rendring it impoſſible for thoſe who were come out of the Town to return ſafe back.

Demetrius obſerving what was done, tooke as good Counſel as in ſuch a dangerous caſe could be; for declining the preſent skirmiſh, and calling his ſouldiers together, Valiant men, ſaith he, it appeares that our courage is formidable to the enemie, for, betaking themſelves to ſtratagems, they declare little truſt in their force of armes. They have made uſe of the night ſeaſon to creep into this Iſland, of which, if I be not deceived in you, they ſhall poſſeſſe no more, then what they can cover with their bodys having payed for it with their lives. Only you, my Country-men of Pharos, and young men of Illyricum, be mindful of your Country, of your honour, and make the Romans know, 'twas neither their valour nor our cowardize, which gave them occaſion once to Triumph at Rome over the Illyrians. It was not Fulvius or Poſthumius with all their Counſel and ſtrength, but Teuta which conquered Illyrium by her raſhneſs and impotence of affections. And, to omit other things, ye are not ignorant, that at that time their victory had not been ſo eaſie, but that Teuta choſe to have me rather her enemie then her Protector. But becauſe I firmly truſt to you, and the time requires rather deeds then words, I ſhall ſay no more. Ye have courage, ye have weapons, ye ſee the neceſſity, which is able to make a coward fight, danger is imminent both to your ſelves, and your Citie unleſs by your valour ye repel it. Let us on then and with happy fortune charge theſe men who are newly crept out of their hiding places: We ſhall do well enough with thoſe who are landing: if we once overcome theſe, the others will flie to their ſhips in greater haſt then now they leave them:

Having thus for the time encouraged his men, he leads them on to charge thoſe who were poſſeſſed of the Hill, and they as diligently ordering themſelves ſuſtained his charge, till they, who in the meane time had landed, coming upon his Reare utterly routed his whole body with great ſlaughter. Some few by flight eſcaped to the Town, others by blind paths ſlipt away. Demetrius who in certaine by-places had boates ready prepared for all adventures, getting aboard one of them fled to Phillip King of Macedon, by whom being entertained, he did by flattery, and Tyrannical advice corrupt the young man's manners, which before were laudable, and likwiſe was authour unto him of the Roman War and many other Calamities. After this fight Pharos was taken; and by the Conſul's Command plunder'd and demoliſhed. The Illyrian affaires being afterward ſettled to his own liking, the Conſul now at the end of Summer returned to Rome to obtaine his Triumph. In the narration of this War I have likewiſe choſen to follow Polibius, being not ignorant that others attribute the glory of finiſhing this War to both the Conſuls, who having ſummoned Demetrius to appeare before them, did, upon default, War with him in the Iland of Iſſa by the ſame arts as I have related, and then taking Pharos by Treachery expulſed him out of the Dominions. Concerning whoſe end likewiſe they differ from Polybius, who lived neerer theſe times and theſe places; but thoſe things as being after this time I ſhall paſſe by. But the Romans, for King Pinneus his ſake, whoſe years declar'd him innocent of theſe deſignes, did ſpare the Illyrians, and renewed the league with him, with addition of ſome Articles. L. Aimilius made a moſt glorious Triumph over theſe people, and I find alſo that M. Livius Triumphed for this War, but moſt writers mention it not; 'tis likely, becauſe the performances of L. Paulus, being the more eminent, did obſcure the glory of his Colleague.

More notable a while after was the Judgment and condemnation of the ſame M. Livius. He and L. Paulus being out of Envy accuſed, That they had not equally diſtributed the ſpoils among the ſouldiers, but had converted many things to other uſes, did undergoe the ſentence of the people. L. Paulus hardly eſcaped, M. Livius was condemned by all the Tribes except only the Mecian, Which diſgrace and indignity he took ſo heavily, that departing the Citie, he avoyded all meetings, till the Commonwealth's occaſions recalled him to his former courſe of life. But theſe things hapened in the Conſulſhip of P. Cornelius Scipio and Tib. Sempronius Longus. But in the ſame year when M. Livius and Paulus were Conſuls, one Archagathus the ſon of Lyſanias came out of Peloponneſus to Rome, who profeſſing Phyſick was made free of the Citie, endowed with all the priviledges of a Roman, and had a ſhop bought for him at the Publick charge in the Acilian ſtreet. A thing not ſo much worthy taking notice of, but that then firſt was the name of the Medicinal faculty heard of and known at Rome; they having to this time preſerved their healths by temperance and remedies not bought. In the ſame Conſuls time Colonies were deduced to Placentia and Cremona in the Gallick Territories; Being none of the leaſt cauſes of anger which moved the Boians and Inſubrians to incline to Hannibal, who, now aſſaulting Saguntum with all might, did by the ruines thereof prepare his way to the Roman Wars. But theſe and other commotions, which in great number, and with no leſſe Terrour and violence preſently aſſailed the Romans, will the better be underſtood by relating foregoing Circumſtances.
